Vetco Gray Controls Inc. agreed to pay a $6 million fine; Vetco Gray Controls Ltd., $8 million; and Vetco Gray UK Ltd., $12 million.

A fourth subsidiary, Aibel Group Ltd., agreed to accept responsibility for similar conduct by its employees.

According to court documents, the four subsidiaries paid Nigerian customs officers $2.1 million from September 2002 to at least April 2005 to speed equipment and employees into the country. At least 378 corrupt payments were made to Nigerian officials, authorities said.

At the time, the companies were providing engineering and procurement services and subsea construction equipment for Nigeria's first deepwater oil drilling project, the Bonga Project.

The payments were coordinated mainly through Vetco Gray Controls Inc.'s offices in Houston.

This was the second time that Vetco Gray UK Ltd. pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

In July 2004, Vetco Gray UK agreed to pay $5.25 million for bribing Nigerian government officials with more than $1 million for insider bid information on oil and gas construction contracts.

Justice Department officials said their investigation was resolved due in part to Vetco International voluntarily disclosing what had happened and the subsidiaries' agreement to take steps to fix the problem.

In a statement, Vetco International Ltd. said the violations began under prior ownership in 2002 and stopped when discovered by current management in April 2005.

"Vetco International Limited and its subsidiaries fully cooperated with the (Department of Justice) by conducting a lengthy and thorough investigation of the conduct at issue, and took significant remedial action in response to its findings," the company said.

Vetco International officials said they will set up independent compliance monitors for both the Vetco Gray and Vetco Aibel subsidiaries for three years to make sure anti-corruption laws are followed.

The settlement with the Justice Department fulfills a closing condition for the previously announced sale of the Vetco Gray subsidiary to General Electric Co., Vetco International said.

Vetco International has about 10,000 employees in more than 30 countries.

Firms To Pay $26 Million In Nigeria Bribery Case (HC)

By Tom Fowler

Houston Chronicle, February 7, 2007

Three subsidiaries of Vetco International, an oilwell services firm with Houston ties, will pay a record $26 million to settle charges they violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act for bribing Nigerian officials.

Vetco Gray Controls Inc., Vetco Gray Controls Ltd., and Vetco Gray UK Ltd. will pay criminal fines of $6 million, $8 million, and $12 million, respectively. Collectively they constitute the largest such fine paid in connection with the act, the Department of Justice said today.

This is the second time in three years a Vetco-related firm has paid fines for bribery. In July 2004 Vetco Gray of Houston and Vetco Gray of Aberdeen, Scotland, each agreed to pay fines of $5.25 million. At the time the companies were owned by ABB of Switzerland.

Last month General Electric Co. said it would pay $1.9 billion to acquire Vetco Gray.

Vetco officials could not be reached for comment.

At a closed hearing this morning before U.S. District Judge Lynn Hughes in Houston, the companies pleaded guilty to violations of the anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA, as well as conspiracy to violate the federal law.

Aibel Group Ltd., another wholly owned subsidiary of Vetco International, also entered into a deferred prosecution agreement with the Justice Department .

According to the government from September 2002 through April 2005 each of the companies used an international freight forwarding and customs clearing company to make at least 378 payments totaling approximately $2.1 million to Nigerian Customs Service officials. The payments were aimed at getting customers officials to give Vetco preferential treatment.

Vetco Gray was providing engineering and procurement services and subsea construction equipment for Nigeria's first deepwater oil drilling project, the Bonga Project.

In addition to the criminal fines, the plea agreements require the companies to hire an independent monitor to oversee the creation and maintenance of a compliance program, complete an investigation of the companies' conduct in other countries and ensure that the agreements are binding to any future purchasers of the companies.

Allied Records Are Subpoenaed In 'Pretexting' Case (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed records of Allied Capital, a business development company that provides financing to smaller firms, in an effort to discover how private investigators it hired may have obtained the phone records of one of its leading critics.

Allied, which had previously denied any involvement, said yesterday in a statement that it has since become aware that an agent of the company obtained the telephone records of David Einhorn, a hedge fund manager, as well as records of calls from his fund, Greenlight Capital, during 2005.

Allied, which is based in Washington, said that it had received a subpoena from the United States attorney in Washington in December.

The statement added that Allied's management had not authorized the obtaining of the telephone records and that the company was cooperating with prosecutors.

In November, The New York Times reported accusations by Mr. Einhorn and other Allied critics that they had been the victims of pretexting — improperly impersonating an individual to obtain confidential information.

Pretexting became part of the national vocabulary after the disclosure by Hewlett-Packard in September that it had hired investigators who obtained the phone records of board members and reporters to discover the source of leaks to the media.

California's attorney general has filed criminal charges against one of Hewlett-Packard's former senior lawyers as well as its former chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, and two private detectives. All have pleaded not guilty.

In response to Allied's statement yesterday, Mr. Einhorn expressed frustration that he had brought the pretexting allegations to the attention of Allied's board several times only to be ignored.

"After five years, Allied Capital has acknowledged a tiny piece of its rampant misconduct," Mr. Einhorn said in a statement. "The evidence was clearly always there; the board simply neglected its fiduciary responsibility to supervise the company appropriately."

The Justice Department inquiry raises questions about how far companies may be going to fight hedge funds that have sold their stocks short. In a short sale, an investor borrows shares and sells them, hoping to buy them back later at a lower price to return them to the lender, profiting from the difference in price.

That war between companies and hedge funds has been nasty. Several companies, like Biovail, a Canadian pharmaceutical company and a favorite target of short sellers, have filed lawsuits against hedge funds, accusing them of disseminating false information to drive their stocks down.

Last month, Greenlight Capital and James Brickman, a retired real estate developer in Dallas who has been a vocal critic of Allied on online message boards, turned the tables. Using the "citizen suit" provision of the federal False Claims Act, they filed a lawsuit on behalf of the United States government contending that an Allied subsidiary, Business Loan Express, had submitted fraudulent documents for shrimp-boat loans to the Small Business Administration, which partially guaranteed the loans.

Their lawsuit was filed as a federal grand jury in Michigan handed up an indictment against a former Business Loan Express executive, accusing him of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years.

In an open letter to Allied's board released two weeks ago, Mr. Einhorn contended that fraudulent loan activity had occurred in several states and that the current management of Business Loan Express should be removed.

In its response, Allied went on the attack, asking Mr. Einhorn, who has sold Allied's stock short, to disclose fully his financial interests in the company over the last five years and saying that the company and the board are "exploring potential alternatives to address the damage caused by Mr. Einhorn to this company and its shareholders."

In letters written to members of Allied's board in 2005 and last September and provided to The New York Times, Mr. Einhorn detailed his pretexting allegations and asked that an independent investigation be conducted.

Mr. Einhorn says that more than three years ago someone claiming to be his wife contacted his phone company and used her Social Security number to open an online account, sending copies of his home telephone bills to an unknown AOL account.

At least four other individuals, including Mr. Brickman and Herb Greenberg, a columnist for the MarketWatch Web site, said they also discovered that their phone records had been revealed without their knowledge or approval at the same time.

In a letter to Mr. Einhorn dated Sept. 29, 2006, Anne Torre Bates, the chairwoman of Allied's audit committee, said the board had looked into his allegations that management had played a role in an attempt to access his phone records and found no evidence to support his claim.

Yet, after it received the subpoena from federal prosecutors, Allied said it established a committee, which was advised by its own counsel, to review the documents requested. While gathering documents, Allied became aware that an agent had obtained Mr. Einhorn's telephone records, yesterday's statement said.

The statement does not address the pretexting allegations made by Mr. Greenberg, Mr. Brickman and others. A spokesman for the company said it had no additional comments to make.

Allied Capital Says Its 'Agent' Got Phone Data (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And David Cho

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Allied Capital, a Washington financial services firm, said yesterday that someone it hired had obtained the phone records of David Einhorn, a hedge-fund manager who has accused the company of fraud, and Einhorn's company, Greenlight Capital.

In a statement, Allied said it had received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia in late December requesting records regarding the use of private investigators hired by the firm or its agents.

Until yesterday's disclosures, the firm and its board had denied allegations by Einhorn and other Allied critics that the firm had engaged in a practice known as pretexting, which involves posing as a person or family member of that person to trick a phone company into giving out phone records.

"In the course of gathering documents responsive to the subpoena, Allied Capital has become aware that an agent of the company obtained what were represented to be telephone records of David Einhorn and which purport to be records of calls from Greenlight Capital during a period of time in 2005," the firm said.

Allied also said that while gathering the documents for investigators, "allegations were made" that management had authorized the acquisition of its critics' phone records and that it had been "subsequently advised that these records had been obtained."

"The management of Allied Capital states that these allegations are not true," the statement said. "Allied Capital is cooperating fully with the inquiry by the United States attorney's office and will have no further comment concerning this matter until that inquiry has been conducted." The company said its board had established a committee to review the matter.

The incident echoes the case of Hewlett-Packard, the Silicon Valley computer giant whose use of private investigators to obtain personal phone records led to criminal charges filed last year by the California attorney general and a criminal investigation by the Justice Department.

Pretexting for phone records violates wire-fraud statutes, according to some legal experts and former U.S. prosecutors. A new law, signed by President Bush in January, makes the act a crime. It is not retroactive.

Allied, located a few blocks from the White House and whose board includes a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, specializes in lending to and investing in smaller companies.

The firm's disclosures raise new questions in a long-running saga that began in 2002 when Einhorn, known as a short seller of Allied stock, accused Allied of inflating the value of its assets. Short sellers borrow shares and sell them, expecting to buy them back later at a lower price.

"After five years, Allied Capital has acknowledged a tiny piece of its rampant misconduct," Einhorn said in an interview yesterday.

Left unanswered, he said, are questions about who at the firm knew about the pretexting, who hired the agent responsible for obtaining the records and how widespread the activity was.

Several journalists and analysts who were critical of Allied also claim to be pretexting victims. One of those was Herb Greenberg, a senior columnist for Market Watch, who wrote an article in 2003 questioning why Allied employed a convicted felon who had served time for securities fraud. After the story, he said, an unauthorized person opened an online telephone account using his name and got his records.

Now Greenberg wants to know if other incidents will be investigated by the Justice Department.

"The company is acknowledging that it became aware that one of its agents got records of Einhorn's calls from Greenlight in 2005," Greenberg said. "The obvious question: Anything else in the subpoena?"

The battle between Einhorn and Allied is rooted in how a division of Allied, Business Loan Express, accounted for the loans it made to small businesses. In the past two years, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Small Business Administration's inspector general opened inquiries into Allied's lending practices. Both agencies declined comment yesterday.

In December, a former Business Loan Express executive, Patrick J. Harrington, was indicted by a federal grand jury on charges that he defrauded the SBA of more than $76 million in guaranteed loans.

Einhorn said yesterday's disclosures suggest that the company had been engaged in a systematic attempt to silence critics to protect its share price. "This was an attempt to intimidate critics, chill free speech and chill investment research," he said.

Allied has long maintained that Einhorn has been deliberately spreading false information. William L. Walton, Allied Capital's chairman and chief executive, told analysts in November that Einhorn's motive is simple: "He makes money if he can drive down the price of Allied Capital stock."

Einhorn first raised concerns that Allied illegally gained access to his phone records in a March 2005 letter to Allied's board. He said that someone posing as his wife directed the phone company to send copies of their long-distance bills to an AOL account. In September 2006, Einhorn reiterated his concerns to the chairman of the board's audit committee, according to copies of letters he sent Allied.

The board dismissed his allegations, stating that it "looked into" it and "found no evidence to support" his claim, according to copies of letters he received.

Allied shares closed yesterday at $29.25, down 32 cents.

Corporate Guidelines On Pretexting Slow To Develop (NLJ)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 7, 2007

A Deloitte & Touche poll revealed that most companies have not crafted policies to ban pretexting, which exposes them to potential criminal liability if their employees or investigators use deception to gather information in a probe.

In an online poll of 230 executives during a Webcast conducted by Deloitte Financial Advisory Services late last year, 42 percent said their companies had no written pretexting guidelines, and 45 percent said they didn't know if their company had such policies.

Only 8 percent have guidelines they are satisfied with, while 5 percent believe they have unsatisfactory rules on the books.

This lack of corporate attention on pretexting is especially alarming in light of a new federal law that creates criminal penalties for illicitly obtaining or disclosing telephone records.

President George W. Bush signed the bill in January, following civil and criminal charges against individuals involved in a Hewlett-Packard Co. scheme to fraudulently obtain phone records in an effort to discover which board members were leaking stories to the media.

Several detectives and the former chairwoman of the Palo Alto, Calif.-based technology company face criminal charges, and the company paid $14.5 million in civil fines.

DRAWING THE LINE

Beyond prohibiting tactics that are clearly illegal, such as obtaining bank or telephone records under false pretenses, companies need to consider what kinds of information-gathering techniques -- pretexting as well as other methods -- are acceptable at their firms, said Ernie Brod, director of Forensic & Dispute Services for Deloitte's financial advisory services arm.

The problem is that some individuals may see nothing wrong with surveillance, for example, but "others may be appalled," he said.

"Has someone told the people who conduct investigations what they are permitted to do and not permitted to do according to the culture and ethical guidelines of that company?" Brod said.

Although companies are not detailing what kinds of pretexting tactics their employees or hired investigators can use, corporate counsel say existing ethics policies cover potential problems. Others say pretexting is rare in the daily operations of smaller and midsize companies.

Gabe Miller, the chief operating officer and general counsel of Chestnut Hill, Mass.-based digital media company STORS Digital Retail Networks, said he would be "very surprised if even 10 percent" of a 95-member Massachusetts general counsel listserv group he belongs to had inked a policy.

"It's so remote from their normal course of operations, they wouldn't find the time to deal with it," Miller said.

NOT ENOUGH DISCUSSION?

Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc. counsel Karl Chen said there hasn't been much discussion about pretexting in the Arlington, Va.-based human resources consulting company.

"We haven't taken steps toward that," Wyatt said. "It was initially a hot issue with the Hewlett-Packard [scandal] but nothing has evolved or erupted."

Brod argued that even the smallest companies investigate or conduct background checks on potential hires, vendors and business partners, and such activities are often scattered across different departments.

Sarbanes-Oxley Act policies requiring public companies to establish reporting channels or a "hotline" for employee complaints about accounting and auditing concerns will also trigger investigations, Brod said.

"It's the same as for other areas of compliance," Brod said. "Companies need these [policies] to protect the reputation of a company. That in turn protects market value."

NO GUIDELINES

Susan Hackett, general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel, has attended seminars about the issue, but she said the Washington-based organization hasn't issued any guidelines for companies or undertaken a formal review of the issue.

It's difficult to come up with hard-and-fast rules about what kinds of legal pretexting cross the line into objectionable behavior, Hackett said.

That gray zone makes it even more critical for companies to set guidelines for acceptable behavior, Brod said. A useful gauge may be as simple as considering how public exposure of the pretexting method would affect the company, Brod said.

"The key question is: How will it affect your company if you read about it in the front page of the newspaper?" he said.

Engineered Support Ex-Excutives Accused (AP)

SEC Accuses 2 Former Engineered Support Executives of Options Scheme

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Two former top executives of defense contractor Engineered Support Systems Inc. enriched themselves and others in a five-year-long scheme to manipulate the timing of stock option grants, federal regulators charged Tuesday.

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil lawsuit in federal court in St. Louis against Gary Gerhardt, former chief financial officer of the company, and Steven Landmann, the former controller, over the alleged options backdating scheme. Employees and directors of Engineered Support received some $20 million in unauthorized compensation as a result of the backdating, while Gerhardt and Landmann reaped $1.9 million and $518,972, respectively, according to the SEC.

Landmann agreed in a settlement with the agency to pay a $259,486 civil fine and $627,071 in restitution plus interest. He also was barred from serving as an officer or director of, or as an accountant for, any public company. Landmann neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations under the accord.

The SEC's case against Gerhardt is still pending. His attorney, Eugene Goldman, said he hadn't yet read the agency's complaint against his client and therefore had no immediate comment.

It was the third case by the agency since last summer involving alleged options backdating, in a scandal in which more than 100 public companies are under investigation by the SEC and the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit has been erased by restatements and 18 CEOs have been swept out of office.

Federal prosecutors issued a subpoena last June in the matter to Engineered Support, a St. Louis-based company that supplies electronics for the military and some government agencies. The SEC also began its investigation around that time.

The SEC said that from 1997 through 2002, Gerhardt instructed Landmann to make company stock options more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a historically low point in the stock's value. Usually, a stock option's exercise price coincides with the market value at the time of a grant to give the recipient an incentive to drive the price higher.

If companies backdate options without accounting for the move, it can cause profits to be overstated and taxes to be underpaid.

In the Engineered Support case, the improper backdating was worsened by the fact that the options vested immediately -- enabling the recipients to instantly cash in, according to the SEC.

As part of the scheme, the agency said, Gerhardt and Landmann prompted the company to misstate in its regulatory filings that all stock options were granted at the fair market value of the stock on the date of award.

"Gerhardt and Landmann undermined the company's stated goal of using stock options to tie management's compensation to shareholder return," Merri Jo Gillette, director of the SEC's Midwest regional office, said in a statement. "Instead, they granted themselves and others instant compensation that was entirely unrelated to the future performance of the company's stock."

Landmann's attorney, Robert Schultz, declined to comment.

Engineered Support was acquired by DRS Technologies Inc., another defense contractor, in January 2006.

SEC Alleges Fraud At DRS Unit (WSJ)

By CHARLES FORELLE And JAMES BANDLER

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Federal regulators charged two former executives of Engineered Support Systems Inc. with a long-running scheme to backdate stock options at the defense contractor, saying that the pair improperly increased their own pay and that of other top officials by a total of $20 million.

Yesterday's civil charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission come as the pace of governmental investigations into the backdating matter appeared to be quickening. Criminal charges in other cases are likely to be filed in coming weeks or months, according to people familiar with the matter.

The SEC complaints, filed in federal district court in Missouri, allege that at least 10 option grants at Engineered Support were backdated, in some cases by more than two months, and depict rampant problems with the company's options-granting process. The SEC charged former finance chief Gary Gerhardt and former controller Steven Landmann with securities fraud, misleading investors, and other securities violations. Mr. Landmann settled the SEC's charges and agreed to surrender $518,972 in backdating profits and pay interest and penalties of another $368,000. A lawyer for Mr. Landmann declined to comment.

Engineered Support, St. Louis, was acquired last year for about $2 billion by DRS Technologies Inc., of Parsippany, N.J. The conduct in question allegedly occurred prior to the acquisition.

Federal prosecutors in St. Louis also are investigating Engineered Support's options practices. People familiar with the matter say prosecutors are looking closely at Messrs. Gerhardt and Landmann, and former chief executive, Michael F. Shanahan Sr. and his son, Michael Shanahan Jr., who had been a director.

In one instance, the SEC alleges, Mr. Gerhardt sent a list of potential option recipients to the younger Mr. Shanahan on July 12, 2000. The list indicated that the options' date would be two months earlier, May 4, the day the stock reached a quarterly low.

In other instances, the SEC complaint alleges Mr. Gerhardt instructed Mr. Landmann to cancel already backdated options and reissue them -- backdated a second time -- to land at another low point.

Mr. Gerhardt, the SEC says, "personally selected" the grant dates for many options, and Mr. Landmann was "involved in the selection" of dates. The SEC alleges Mr. Landmann told Mr. Gerhardt that backdating was prohibited by the company's stock-option plan, but that Mr. Gerhardt ordered him to backdate anyway.

A spokeswoman for DRS Technologies said it has been advised by prosecutors that DRS is "neither a subject nor a target" of the federal investigation.

Mr. Gerhardt's lawyer, Eugene Goldman, said he hadn't seen the complaint and couldn't comment. The SEC said Mr. Gerhardt's excess profit from backdating was $1.9 million. James Martin, a lawyer for the younger Mr. Shanahan, said he did "not see any evidence of fraud by anyone."

Options typically give their recipients the chance to purchase company shares at the price they were on the day the option was granted. By pretending the option was granted earlier than it really was, an executive magnifies the potential profit.

Mr. Shanahan Sr. was "ultimately responsible for authorizing stock-option grants during the relevant period" and received about $8.6 million in extra profit from the backdating, the SEC says. He wasn't charged. Arthur Margulis, a lawyer for Mr.

Shanahan Sr., said he hadn't seen the complaint. "I have seen no evidence of any kind, testimonial or otherwise, that indicates there was any fraud by anyone," Mr. Margulis said.

The SEC says the double backdating occurred after the company's share price slid, leaving even already-backdated options unable to be exercised for profit. On June 1, 1999, the SEC says, Mr. Shanahan Sr. told Mr. Landmann to issue 295,000 options; the options were issued with a date of April 21, when the stock had reached its low for the year. But Engineered Support's shares slid in June, and the SEC says that finance chief Mr. Gerhardt told Mr. Landmann on July 15 to cancel the April 21 options and redo them with a date of July 1 -- a new low point.

Nacchio Seeks Trial Delay (AP)

By Sandy Shore

AP, February 7, 2007

Former Quest chief Joe Nacchio's attorneys asked a federal judge Tuesday to delay his insider trading trial, saying prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that his rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts March 19 as scheduled.

Attorney Herbert Stern sought a 60-day postponement to evaluate documents prosecutors have provided in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of material that Stern said he was made aware of Monday evening.

He said prosecutors advised if his team wanted to use any of the classified material, they would have to submit them to the court as required by federal law.

"The government has chosen on the eve of trial to place a heavy burden on the defendant - to review voluminous materials and then make applications to the court and we do not even know the full extent of that burden," Stern wrote in a brief filed in U.S. District Court.

Stern said the documents may support Nacchio's contention that he had hope for Qwest's future because he knew about the Denver-based phone company's classified business dealings with the government.

"This request is not of our making, but if not granted will prejudice our ability to mount a full defense as required by the Sixth Amendment," Stern wrote.

Jeff Dorschner, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, declined comment.

Nacchio's attorneys have complained previously about government attorneys being slow to provide evidence, prompting U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham last week to order prosecutors to step up efforts to turn over such material. At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed.

Prosecutors have told the judge that the evidence exchange has been hampered because some documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts.

In the brief, Stern said the defense was required to outline its strategy involving the classified documents by Oct. 31 but prosecutors did not provide any evidence involving classified documents from May to October.

Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge Qwest Communications International Inc. (nyse: Q - news - people) would be unable to meet revenue targets.

He is charged with 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine. He has pleaded not guilty.

Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts that made him more optimistic about the company's financial future.

The Classified Information Procedures Act which was enacted several decades ago to counter a strategy used by defendants charged with spying who would threaten to expose national secrets unless the charges were dropped.

In order to view the contracts and determine their relevance at trial, attorneys for both sides and the judge received Justice Department security clearances. They must view the documents in secure facilities and debate their merit in a secure courtroom closed to the public.

Separately, Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue. That case is pending.

SEC Boosts Probe For Wall Street Leaks (WSJ)

By KARA SCANNELL And RANDALL SMITH

DOJ_NMG_0129026

The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked nearly a dozen brokerage firms for trading and other data in an effort to determine whether there is a leak of inside information across Wall Street.

The inquiry is being driven in part by complaints from mutual funds and others who worry market participants are trading ahead of their trades before they are executed.

The request is an expansion of the agency's continuing "street sweep" investigation of potential insider trading, which has mainly focused on the passing of inside information within a brokerage firm. Now, the agency is expanding the probe to look at information being exchanged between firms in hopes of avoiding detection, according to a top agency official.

'Passage of Information'

The SEC is looking at the "passage of information from one firm to another," said Lori Richards, director of the SEC's office of compliance, inspections and examinations. "It's just fact-finding at this point."

Former SEC commissioner Laura Unger discusses the SEC's insider-trading probe, noting the increasing power of hedge funds in the marketplace.The data request, reported in yesterday's New York Times, was sent by the SEC three weeks ago. The request seeks information on all stock and option orders in the firms' order management system for a 12-day period in late September, as well as a list of customers that use the firms' prime brokerage systems, which are used by hedge funds.

The agency hopes that once it examines the data, it will be able to determine if the concerns are valid and if there is a tipping chain from firm to firm. The sweep is in the information gathering stages and not all examinations result in enforcement actions.

The new take on potential leaking on Wall Street was spurred partly from other enforcement cases. The SEC and Justice Department have cracked down on instances of traders passing information about large pending trades before they are public across the firm's information boxes, known as squawk boxes.

In addition, the SEC has filed enforcement cases against hedge funds and brokerage-firm employees sharing nonpublic information about private investments in public entities, or PIPEs, allowing the hedge fund to profit before the PIPE is public.

Concerns about front-running of trades aren't new. However, worries have built amid the growth in hedge funds. Mutual-fund company executives fret that because hedge funds typically pay higher trading commissions than mutual funds and generally trade more, hedge funds may receive favorable treatment by brokerage firms.

The requests are considered extensive, and officials at some firms have asked about whether the scope could be narrowed. The deadline of late January has already passed, but broker-dealers routinely try to negotiate extensions.

An official of one Wall Street firm said it appears to be aimed at learning whether clients such as hedge funds are getting access to information about orders by other customers such as mutual funds. The request seeks data on how each order was routed.

Firms Protest

Some of the firms protested the request, questioning whether the SEC would be able to handle the volume of data, according to people familiar with the request.

Ms. Richards responded by telling an official at one firm that she understood the request seemed broad, one of the people said. She explained it was needed to see whether customers who may have obtained information from one firm were trading at others. It isn't unusual for firms and the SEC to negotiate over information to turn over.

S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said.

The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move.

Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction.

But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect.

The commission sent out letters in mid-January to the major Wall Street banks, including Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, UBS and Deutsche Bank. The commission, according to one Wall Street employee, is requesting a wide swath of information: all stock and option trading data, for themselves and their customers, for the last two weeks of September. Those weeks are the close of the third quarter and investigators may be looking to see any pickup in trading activity as money mangers sought to dress up their returns.

Representatives for the Wall Street banks declined to comment on the investigation.

"Mutual fund traders have long complained that their big trades may be being front-run by market participants with inside information about their trades, and they believe the price on those trades suffers as a result," said Lori Richards, the director of the Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations at the S.E.C. "We are looking into these allegations in a systemic way. It is fact-finding and too early for any conclusions."

The S.E.C. confirmed the existence of the investigation but declined to comment further.

Concerns about insider trading have escalated as mergers and buyouts have boomed and the use of complex derivatives has soared. Studies of various markets — including those for stocks and credit default swaps — have pointed to an unusual amount of trading ahead of announcements for deals.

The growing power of hedge funds — and their opaqueness and the wide range of trading strategies they employ — is feeding those concerns. Hedge funds control an estimated 30 percent to 50 percent of trading on most major markets. They are also Wall Street's best customers. Hedge funds trade, borrow and finance more, on average, than other clients And as more hedge funds enter a crowded field, the premium on information has never been higher.

With data on millions of trades from most major Wall Street banks, the S.E.C. will try to examine whether outside traders like hedge funds or internal traders like those inside the firm who are trading with the bank's money may be getting tips from the bank handling the mutual fund's trade and using the information to place a trade elsewhere.

"If an investment bank is tipping a hedge fund on a trade we are doing on Dell, those people all need to go to jail," said Andrew M. Brooks, vice president and head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price, the mutual fund company. "We are absolutely concerned and worried and paranoid about information leakage, information that would allow someone to know about our trades and run ahead."

If the commission finds any evidence of possible insider trading, it would then commence a formal investigation. The S.E.C. could ultimately bring civil charges against individuals or firms.

Regulators and law enforcement officials have pursued other cases related to the sharing of information about trades. In what became known as the squawk box case, brokers from institutions, including Merrill Lynch, Citigroup and Lehman Brothers, were accused of allowing traders to listen in on the public outcry system — the squawk box on the trading floors — to glean tips about customer orders coming in.

The S.E.C. sued the A. B. Watley Group and 16 people in the case. Next month, the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn will bring to trial a case against seven people. Two have pleaded guilty to insider trading. While the accusations in the squawk box case involve an obvious dissemination of insider information, detecting whether traders were illegally tipped in huge, fast-moving markets is much harder.

When Linda Chatman Thomsen, head of enforcement at the S.E.C., testified before Congress in September about insider trading, she outlined some of the problems inherent in such cases.

"Piecing together an insider trading case can be a complex and painstaking process," she said. "It is rare to find a 'smoking gun'; virtually all insider trading cases hinge on circumstantial evidence. It is quite common for insider traders to come up with alternative rationales for their trading — rationales that the staff must refute with inferences drawn from the timing of the trades, the movement of the funds and other facts and circumstances."

There are many gray areas. If Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price wants to sell stock in the XYZ Company and he hires a bank to do that, the bank has to call clients to gauge interest in the stock. That is not tipping, but legitimate work for the bank to do.

And detecting any trades will be difficult. If a trader received a tip about a stock whose price was set to rise, that trader could enter into trades that are harder for regulators to detect — like derivatives transactions that are not traded on any exchange and whose value may be linked to a change in a stock price rather than the stock itself or an option on the stock.

Here's how a questionable trade might take place: If Fidelity asked brokerage firm X to sell a large part of its stake in I.B.M., and traders at that brokerage firm told its favorite clients to expect a drop in I.B.M.'s price as a result, that favorite client could go to another brokerage firm — or group of banks or trading venues — and sell I.B.M. shares short, betting on a decline and making money when Fidelity's order went through. The trader could pay back the source of the tip by directing more business to his bank.

"The information is going to the bank as an agent, and the bank is only supposed to use the information for the mutual fund's benefit," said Larry E. Ribstein, a professor of law at the University of Illinois. "If it uses it for someone else's benefit, you might have a concern."

The hedge fund business has long argued that it is unfairly tarnished with suggestions of insider trading. Amid increased scrutiny by regulators into hedge funds' use of information in the loan market, the Managed Funds Association said in a statement last year, "We reaffirm our collective commitment to promote fair and competitive markets in which inappropriate use of material nonpublic information is not tolerated."

Some money managers disagree.

"Hedge funds pay a lot in commissions," said Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price. "They are smart and work hard, but they can't be that smart and work that hard to get some of the advantages they have gotten."

"There are too many conflicts of interest between those who serve hedge funds and hedge funds themselves."

SEC Pores Over Trading Data To See If Hedge Funds Are Being Tipped Off (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 7, 2007

Federal regulators have embarked on a fact-finding mission on Wall Street to determine if hedge funds are being routinely tipped off about buy and sell orders placed by mutual funds.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, which is conducting the probe, has asked approximately 10 major Wall Street banks for trading information from the last two weeks of September 2006, at the close of the third quarter.

Over the next few months, SEC examiners will try to determine whether big buy and sell orders placed with the banks by mutual funds in that period triggered any suspicious front-running activity in those same stocks by hedge fund managers or other traders.

Lori Richards, director of the SEC's Office of Compliance, Inspections and Examinations, confirmed that her office was looking into the matter. "We're always concerned about information leakage in the market which could harm investors," she said.

Details of the investigation first appeared Tuesday in The New York Times, which said that the SEC request for information had gone out in mid-January.

According to people with direct knowledge of the probe, who don't want to be identified because the investigation is ongoing, the banks being examined include but are not limited to: Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, Morgan Stanley, Deutsche Bank and UBS. None of those banks would comment on the matter.

For years, mutual fund executives have complained that financial intermediaries have used sensitive information about their buy and sell orders to disadvantage them in the marketplace.

Representatives of the mutual fund industry applauded the SEC's decision to conduct the examination. "This issue is of paramount importance to mutual fund shareholders," says Edward Giltenan, a spokesman for the Investment Company Institute, a trade organization for funds. "Mutual funds represent 20% of U.S. equities, and north of 10% of the daily volume of U.S. stocks traded."

Harold Bradley, who recently moved from American Century Funds to become chief investment officer of the $2.1 billion Kauffman Foundation, says so much money has been plowed into hedge funds in recent years that it's become extremely difficult for hedge fund managers to make money without access to sensitive information.

"People are looking for an edge any way they can get it," he says. "Whenever there is too much money chasing too few ideas, people push the envelope. The hedge funds have got more money and fewer ideas, so they have to take bigger risks and cheat more."

Bradley has criticized the SEC for not being more aggressive on this front in the past, but he saluted this latest initiative. "When Lori Richards starts looking for trouble, she has been extremely effective at rooting it out and fixing it," he says.

The Class-Action Market (WSJ)

By JOSEPH A. GRUNDFEST

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Litigation is booming in the U.S. Courts complain of burgeoning dockets. Lawyers collect record fees. Legislators, regulators and academics either grouse that litigation is driving business offshore and should be contained, or that economic injustice still pervades our economy and that the courthouse doors must be kept wide open to help right wrongs.

But few policy makers or scholars seem aware that a highly controversial component of the litigation market -- the class-action securities fraud litigation business -- is shrinking faster than a polar icecap. The interesting question is why this decline has occurred and what it means for the future of U.S. securities regulation.

The modern history of securities fraud litigation begins with the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995. That law tightened the requirements for filing securities claims and was expected to reduce litigation activity, but it had no such effect. According to data collected by Stanford Law School and Cornerstone Research, the number of companies sued in plain vanilla class-action fraud claims has averaged about 193 per year from 1996 through 2005, not much different from pre-reform levels. But halfway through 2005 filing activity took a sharp drop, and in 2006 only 110 companies were named as defendants in securities-fraud class actions.

A closer look at the data suggests that the decline is even more remarkable because 20 of these lawsuits allege options backdating activity. Backdating is a one-time event, and if we subtract these 20 cases we arrive at a "core" litigation rate of 90 companies per year.

The decline is even more dramatic if we measure the dollar amounts at stake. The most inflated measure of the amount at issue in these lawsuits looks at the total decline in a company's stock market capitalization over the period of the alleged fraud. Typically, only a fraction of this decline is caused by the fraud and plaintiffs recover a very small percentage of this loss, if anything at all. After averaging $683 billion from 1996 through 2005, and peaking at $2.07 trillion in 2002, the maximum dollar loss in 2006 declined to $294 billion. Excluding the backdating cases reduces the 2006 figure to only $198 billion.

Why have these declines occurred? Some claim that the criminal prosecution of the Milberg Weiss firm, long the dominant plaintiff firm in the field, caused a cutback in filing activity. However, there is no shortage of plaintiff class-action lawyers in America, and the barriers to entry in class-action securities fraud are quite low. The lawyers who abandoned Milberg in droves haven't forgotten how to file class-action complaints, and their incentives to sue every firm in sight remain as strong as ever. The Milberg explanation doesn't hold much water.

Last year's strong equity markets, combined with low market volatility, offer a second explanation. Although it will take several years of additional data to determine statistically whether reduced volatility has throttled the class-action market, I am skeptical because the change in the litigation market is rather sudden in comparison to a relatively smooth shift in the larger stock market patterns.

To be sure, the remarkable boom-bust cycle of the late 1990s created a happy hunting ground for plaintiff lawyers. The resolution of boom-era claims without another boom-bust cycle following quickly on its heels would naturally depress the volume and size of class-action fraud filings. Nonetheless, current activity levels are low even when measured by pre-boom standards.

The remaining explanation is more interesting and profound: Perhaps fewer companies are being sued for fraud because there is less fraud. Under this theory, the government's aggressive criminal and civil enforcement strategy following the Enron and WorldCom frauds has caused corporate boards and management to "get religion" when it comes to complying with the securities laws. Executives are acutely aware that a major accounting or disclosure fraud is more likely than ever to leave them fired or indicted. They respond to this new regime like rational economic actors: If you increase the penalties for engaging in fraud then you reduce the incentive to commit fraud. Nothing complicated here at all.

In this new world, private securities fraud claims generate no meaningful deterrence because it's the fear of the feds that's driving boardroom and executive behavior. A large body of academic literature also confirms that these lawsuits are virtually useless as means of compensating investors for their losses. Sarbanes-Oxley also now gives the SEC authority to collect funds that can be distributed to shareholders harmed by fraud. When plaintiffs' attorneys recover funds for the class, they collect contingent fees that can consume up to a third of any recovery, but the SEC doesn't take a nickel of the recoveries it collects on behalf of investors. So, if we want to keep the litigation engine running in order to reimburse investors, investors could come out ahead if they simply allowed the SEC to control the process and eliminated the private bar's cut of the action.

From this perspective, class-action securities litigation is in decline because there is a new, tougher and superior enforcement mechanism in place. The SEC and the Department of Justice now insist that any corporation suspected of a sufficiently serious fraud conduct an internal investigation that will finger the executives responsible. The corporation must also cooperate in prosecuting these executives. This enforcement technique is stunningly effective, if often overbearing. It eliminates the government's need to conduct expensive and lengthy investigations and provides the authorities with extraordinary leverage over every executive suspected of wrongdoing. Private litigation doesn't have an equivalent deterrent effect because it can't threaten executives with jail and because damages are almost always paid by corporations and insurers, not the executives who cause the fraud.

As long as the government's enforcement activities remain sufficiently vigorous, the private class-action securities fraud lawsuit can be viewed as an expensive, wasteful and unnecessary sideshow that generates little deterrence and offers questionable levels of compensation. The question then is not why these lawsuits have been shrinking so rapidly in recent months, but when and whether they should exist at all.

CRIMINAL LAW:

NBC Reporter To Testify At CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- NBC News reporter Tim Russert should find the format familiar: An interviewer, a television screen and a gauntlet of pointed questions.

Unlike his seat as host of "Meet the Press," however, Russert won't be asking the questions. He'll be in the witness box, fielding questions from prosecutors about his conversation with former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby and from defense attorneys who want to undercut his credibility.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says he expects Russert to be his final witness Wednesday in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial. Libby is accused of lying to authorities investigating the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Russert and Libby tell two very different stories about a phone conversation they had in July 2003.

Both agree Libby called to complain about one of Russert's colleagues. Russert says the call ended there. Libby says Russert brought up the subject of an outspoken war critic, Joseph Wilson, a former ambassador who accused the Bush administration of doctoring prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife worked at the CIA?" Libby said Russert asked.

"No, I don't know that," Libby said he replied.

"Yes, all the reporters know it," Russert responded, according to Libby's grand jury testimony.

Russert is expected to testify that exchange never happened. Fitzgerald believes Libby learned about Plame's identity from government officials, passed it on to reporters, then concocted the Russert conversation to cover it up.

Libby acknowledges learning about Plame from his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney, but says he forgot it. He says he learned it from Russert a month later as if it were new and only discussed Plame with other reporters based on that conversation.

Defense attorneys, working to reveal inconsistencies in government witnesses, often show quotes, notes or other documents on a courtroom big-screen television and ask witnesses to explain discrepancies. It's a technique Russert has made famous on "Meet the Press" and one he may find himself facing Wednesday.

Though most jurors in the case said they were not regular "Meet the Press" viewers and did not have an opinion of Russert, Fitzgerald is counting on him to wrap up his case for the jury.

So even though he won't be in charge, when he takes the stand, Russert will still be the star of the show.

Court Hears Libby Describe Cheney As 'Upset' At Critic (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Vice President Cheney and other senior White House officials regarded a former ambassador's accusations that President Bush misled the nation in going to war in Iraq as an unparalleled political assault and, early in the summer of 2003, held daily discussions about how to debunk them, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a federal grand jury.

In grand jury audiotapes played yesterday during Libby's perjury trial, the vice president's then-chief of staff said Cheney had been "upset" and "disturbed" by criticisms from former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV that Bush had twisted intelligence to justify the war. And Libby said that Karl Rove had been "animated" by a conversation with Robert D. Novak, in which the conservative columnist told Rove he "had a bad taste in his mouth" about Wilson and was writing a column about him.

Libby is charged with lying to the grand jury as it investigated a leak by administration officials of the identity of Wilson's wife, an undercover CIA officer named Valerie Plame. The sound of Libby's clear, measured voice in the tapes -- filling a courtroom in U.S. District Court here for six hours over the past two days -- buttresses the prosecution's case in two significant ways.

Libby's portrayal of the zeal to discredit Wilson's claims, reaching to the White House's highest echelons, reinforces Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's assertion that the criticism of war provoked such a political crisis among Bush's top aides that it is unlikely the defendant simply forgot his role in the leak, as defense attorneys contend.

In addition, the tapes display the specific gaps between Libby's version of events and those of government officials and journalists who, as prosecution witnesses, have testified about conversations they had with Libby about Plame.

Repeatedly, Libby told the grand jury that he did not recall various conversations about Plame. His account conflicts with those of a former White House press secretary, a former undersecretary of state, Cheney's former public affairs director, two CIA officials and a pair of journalists.

Libby told the grand jury "it seemed to me as if I was learning it for the first time" when, according to his account, NBC's Tim Russert told him about Plame on July 10 or 11, 2003. Only later, when looking at his calendar and notes, Libby said, did he remember that he actually learned the information from Cheney in June 2003.

After the jury hears the final two hours of tapes today, Russert, host of "Meet the Press," is scheduled to testify before the prosecution concludes its case this week.

Libby, 56, the only person indicted in the leak investigation, has not been charged with actually disclosing Plame's CIA role. He faces five felony counts that he lied to FBI agents and the grand jury and that he obstructed the investigation. His lawyers are arguing that Libby had a notoriously bad memory -- and that he innocently but incorrectly remembered his interactions with journalists.

The prosecution alleges that, as part of the White House's strategy to discredit Wilson, Libby deliberately revealed Plame's identity to selected reporters, because her CIA job implied that Wilson was chosen for the Africa mission because of nepotism, not his expertise.

In the tapes, Libby also describes Cheney's eagerness to use what had been a 2002 National Intelligence Estimate, a secret summary of the evidence of whether Iraq posed a threat, to rebut Wilson. The NIE was declassified just after Wilson's criticism emerged. Yesterday's tapes made it clear how many of Bush's most senior aides had been unaware of that decision, even as they were arguing for the document to be released.

According to Libby's testimony, during two volatile weeks in July 2003, Cheney and Bush were the only people who knew the president apparently had authorized Libby to use portions of the NIE. Left in the dark were many aides, including then-White House chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr., then-CIA Director George J. Tenet, and then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice.

In response to methodical questioning by Fitzgerald during two grand jury appearances in March 2004, Libby said that he did not remember discussing Plame with a former CIA official, Robert Grenier. Two weeks ago, Grenier testified that Libby telephoned him out of the blue to ask about a CIA-sponsored mission to the African nation of Niger -- and was so eager to find out that he called back three hours later and pulled Grenier out of a meeting with Tenet.

Similarly, former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer has testified that Libby disclosed Wilson's wife's identify to him over a lunch in the White House mess. But in the tapes, Libby told the grand jury, "I do not recall discussing Mr. Wilson's wife at all with Ari." Libby said, however, that he distinctly remembers talking with Fleischer about the Miami Dolphins, because it was the only conversation he had that week about the team.

Libby Testimony Details Plot To Discredit Critic (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former White House official I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that Vice President Dick Cheney was upset by an ambassador's public questioning of the Iraq war and that President Bush, Cheney and Libby were involved in a plan — kept secret from other senior White House officials — to leak previously classified intelligence to reporters to counter the criticism.

Libby's audiotape testimony, played for jurors in federal court here, offered new details about how the White House orchestrated a campaign to discredit the Iraq war critic, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson's wife, undercover CIA operative Valerie Plame, was subsequently exposed in the media, triggering a criminal investigation.

As Libby sat silently in the courtroom, jurors heard his recorded voice describe how he was instructed to leak intelligence secrets to select reporters, even as other White House officials were expressing concern over the leaks and debating whether the administration should formally declassify intelligence reports on Iraq to combat criticism of the case for war.

At one point, Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald can be heard on the tapes expressing disbelief that Libby would take part in those meetings without disclosing that the president had effectively already declassified key portions of one of the main prewar pieces of intelligence on Iraq, a national intelligence estimate on Saddam Hussein's alleged banned weapons programs.

"Was that unusual for you to have the national security advisor, the director of Central Intelligence, the White House chief of staff among others in the dark as to something that you had done regarding declassification?" Fitzgerald asked.

"It is not unusual for the vice president to tell me something which I am not allowed to share with others," Libby replied.

Libby's remarks came during a day in court devoted entirely to playing audiotapes of the former Cheney aide's grand jury testimony, allowing jurors to listen to the defendant's voice as he made a series of statements that prosecutors have labeled lies.

Libby faces five felony counts alleging perjury, making false statements and obstruction of justice for what he told investigators about his role in the campaign to discredit Wilson.

The tapes offer an intriguing window into the reaction within the White House to mounting criticism of its crumbling case for war with Iraq, as well as a chance to witness Fitzgerald's method as he sparred with Libby during eight hours of grand jury testimony.

Libby can be heard describing in a low voice how Cheney was "upset" when Wilson went public with allegations that the White House had twisted intelligence to make the case for war. In an op-ed article, Wilson said he had been sent to investigate a key claim — that Iraq was seeking uranium from the African nation of Niger — and found it untrue months before Bush included the assertion in his 2003 State of the Union speech.

"It was a serious accusation," Libby said. "It was a very serious attack." It also quickly became a "topic that was discussed on a daily basis" in the White House.

Libby said that Cheney "thought we should get some of these facts out to the press. He then undertook to get permission from the president to talk about this" to reporters.

Libby said that Cheney's lawyer, David S. Addington, had advised him that merely getting such permission from the president rendered the intelligence declassified. Bush has publicly acknowledged doing so.

Libby's subsequent conversations with reporters and other White House officials are at the center of the perjury trial. Prosecutors have produced a series of witnesses over the last week, including former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, to say that they learned of Plame's identity from Libby.

Libby has testified that he learned about Plame from Cheney in June 2003, but then forgot that detail and didn't share it with others until he heard it from NBC News reporter Tim Russert in a phone call on July 10 or 11.

Recounting that conversation, Libby said in taped testimony that Russert asked him, " 'Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife works at the CIA?' and I was a little taken aback by that…. And I said, 'No, I don't know that,' intentionally because I didn't want him to take anything I was saying as in any way confirming what he had said."

Russert, who is expected to testify this week, has said he did not tell Libby about Plame.

Libby's testimony also puts him at odds with other former White House officials. At one point, Fitzgerald asks if he recalled sharing Plame's name with Fleischer, as the former press secretary testified.

"Isn't it a fact, sir, that you told Mr. Fleischer over lunch that this was hush-hush or on the Q.T.?" Fitzgerald asked.

"I don't recall that," Libby replied.

Prosecutors are expected to continue playing remaining portions of Libby's taped testimony today.

Back story

The CIA leak affair began to unfold in July 2003, around the time former Ambassador

Joseph C. Wilson IV wrote an opinion article in the New York Times attacking the Bush administration as twisting the intelligence it used to go to war in Iraq. In his January 2003 State of the Union address, President Bush said Iraq had sought uranium for nuclear weapons from Niger, in West Africa. Wilson wrote that, during his CIA-sponsored trip to Niger in 2002, he had found no evidence to support Bush's claim — and that the administration knew it. The White House soon afterward admitted that it should not have included the claim in Bush's speech.

Eight days after Wilson's article appeared, syndicated columnist Robert Novak wrote that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA and may have played a role in sending him to Niger. Disclosing the identity of an undercover CIA operative is illegal, and a criminal investigation was launched to find out who leaked the information.

No one was charged with leaking Plame's identity. But in October 2005, a grand jury indicted then-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice.

Prosecutors said Libby told three reporters — including

Judith Miller, then a New York Times staffer, who spent 85 days in jail for refusing to disclose her source — about Wilson and Plame, but lied to investigators about it. Libby's defense is that he didn't lie but simply forgot the conversations because, as Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, he had been focused on more important national security matters at the time.

Libby Speaks On Tape, But May Not In Court (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — The jurors deciding the perjury case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. listened to his voice on audiotape for hours on Tuesday as his lawyers quietly explored a surprise strategy, keeping him off the witness stand, that would ensure that the jurors never hear his voice in person.

The audiotapes played in the courtroom were of Mr. Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004, in which he repeatedly testified under oath that he had no recollection of several conversations about Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative. His denials were in sharp contrast to the testimony over the last two weeks of reporters and government officials who were colleagues of Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Out of the jury's presence and beyond the courtroom, Mr. Libby's lawyers appeared to be engaging in some gamesmanship over the possibility of Mr. Libby's not testifying in his own defense. They had previously suggested that he would testify.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief lawyer, filed a motion with the court on Monday evening asking about the consequences of keeping his client off the stand. Mr. Wells argued that, even if his client decided not to testify, he should be able to argue that any misstatements Mr. Libby made to the grand jury and investigators about Ms. Wilson were caused by confusion due to Mr. Libby's pressing schedule of important issues.

Judge Reggie B. Walton had asserted earlier in the trial that Mr. Libby's "faulty memory" defense would require that he take the stand to testify about his distractions.

While testifying could be perilous for Mr. Libby, a decision not to testify is almost by definition a risky strategy for any defendant in a white-collar criminal case. Lawyers assume the jury, especially in a perjury case, wants to hear a personal and plausible explanation directly from the defendant about the statements that prosecutors have charged are false.

But Mr. Wells has had success with that strategy. He won much-lauded acquittals for Mike Espy, agriculture secretary for President Bill Clinton, and Raymond J. Donovan, labor secretary for President Ronald Reagan, without putting either man on the stand.

Mr. Wells would not comment on the possibility that Mr. Libby might not testify. Nor would Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, who has yet to file a response.

The four hours of audiotape played Tuesday in Federal District Court were intended by the prosecutors to underscore how much Mr. Libby's sworn testimony varied from the accounts of other trial witnesses. Mr. Fitzgerald was heard questioning Mr. Libby closely before the grand jury about a lunch he had on July 7, 2003, with Ari Fleischer, who was departing that week as President Bush's press secretary.

Mr. Fleischer already told the jury last week that, at the luncheon in the White House mess, Mr. Libby made a point of telling him that Valerie Wilson, also known as Valerie Plame, worked at the C.I.A. and that the information was "hush-hush and on the q.t."

But Tuesday, the jury heard Mr. Fitzgerald patiently draw from Mr. Libby a different story, one in which he never discussed Ms. Wilson with Mr. Fleischer. Mr. Libby was heard on the tape telling Mr. Fitzgerald that it did not make sense that he would have mentioned Ms. Wilson because he remembered being surprised when he learned that fact in a conversation three days later with Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief of NBC News.

It was among many references Mr. Libby made before the grand jury to Mr. Russert and their conversation on July 10 or 11, 2003. One of the pillars of Mr. Libby's defense is that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity with the witnesses the prosecution has presented because he learned about her from Mr. Russert.

But Mr. Russert, who is likely to testify Wednesday, has said his conversation with Mr. Libby never included any mention of Ms. Wilson.

Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed in a column by Robert D. Novak on July 14, 2003, days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador, wrote that he went on an intelligence mission to Africa in 2002 and that the Bush White House had willfully distorted his findings — that Iraq had not tried to acquire uranium in Niger — to bolster the case for invading Iraq.

In his questioning of Mr. Libby, Mr. Fitzgerald's voice turned suddenly abrupt when he asked, "Isn't it a fact that you told Ari Fleischer the information about Ms. Wilson was hush-hush and on the q.t.?"

Mr. Libby's voice seemed to have lost much of its strength as he replied, "I don't recall."

It may be that kind of cross-examination from Mr. Fitzgerald that the defense hopes to avoid if it keeps Mr. Libby off the stand. In addition to Mr. Fleischer's conflicting testimony, the jury has heard that Mr. Libby was told about Ms. Wilson by Mr. Cheney's press spokesman, Cathie Martin, and the under secretary of state at the time, Marc Grossman. The jury has also heard testimony that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Wilson with two separate C.I.A. officials.

The audiotapes also provided more detail about Mr. Libby's July 8, 2003, meeting with Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times. Mr. Libby told the grand jury that his meeting with Ms. Miller was approved directly by the vice president. Mr.

Libby said that in order to convince Ms. Miller that Mr. Wilson's article in The Times was filled with inaccuracies, Mr. Cheney first went to President Bush directly to declassify a National Intelligence Estimate. Mr. Libby said that he used the intelligence estimate in the Miller interview to counter Mr. Wilson's claims that there was no Iraqi effort to obtain uranium from Niger.

"The vice president instructed me to go and talk to Judith Miller and lay this out for her," Mr. Libby told the grand jury. He said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson in the interview. But Ms. Miller, who went to jail for 85 days before talking to prosecutors about her interviews with Mr. Libby, testified last week that he spoke to her in detail about Ms. Wilson at the July 8 breakfast meeting.

He lamented that Ms. Miller did not write anything from the interview. At the time, Ms. Miller's editors had tried to prevent her from reporting on this subject because of criticisms of her coverage about Iraq and unconventional weapons.

Judge Walton, early in the day, denied a motion by The Times to quash a subpoena for the testimony of David Sanger, its chief Washington correspondent. Mr. Sanger interviewed Mr. Libby on July 2, 2003, about Iraq's nuclear intentions and has said there was no discussion of the Wilsons. The defense has contended that Mr. Sanger's expected testimony will show that Mr. Libby was not peddling a story about the Wilsons.

Libby Says He Thought Bush Authorized Unmasking Plame (CNN)

CNN, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- On a tape played at his trial Tuesday Lewis "Scooter" Libby told investigators he thought President Bush authorized him to give a reporter information about CIA agent Valerie Plame.

"If the president tells you to talk about a document, it's declassified," Libby told Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald on March 24, 2003, during testimony before a grand jury that would eventually indict Libby for perjury and obstruction of justice.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators trying to find out who leaked Plame's identity as a CIA operative. Her identity was revealed after her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, alleged in an editorial that the Bush administration twisted facts to support an invasion of Iraq. Wilson said his intelligence-gathering work -- which concluded Iraq had made no serious effort to obtain nuclear weapons material in Niger -- had been ignored by the administration.

The audio recordings, made nearly four years ago, shed light on how Libby handled the controversy over Wilson's allegations.

Libby said White House Counsel David Addington told him the president has the power to declassify material on his own. Libby said he asked Addington, "Can the president declassify a document just by telling us to talk?" and Addington said he could.

Libby quoted that response to Fitzgerald on the stand.

Fitzgerald asked Libby whether he was present when Vice President Dick Cheney asked Bush to declassify the material, whether anyone else was present, and whether issues were raised about how going public might overrule CIA Director George Tenet.

To each question, Libby answered no.

Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff at the time, also testified he had no knowledge of when or how Cheney got the okay from President Bush and concluded only the three of them were aware the material could be disclosed to New York Times reporter Judith Miller when Libby met with her for coffee at a Washington hotel.

Prosecutors are trying to portray Libby as someone who used lies and deception in his ranking position at the White House to try to discredit Joseph Wilson.

Libby's lawyers blame bad memory for any discrepancies in what he told investigators and the grand jury about revealing Valerie Wilson was a CIA operative.

Libby apologized for his poor memory in the audio recordings played Tuesday.

"I get a lot of information during the course of the day. I probably get, you know -- I tried to take a census of how many, and I tend to get between 100 and 200 pages a day," Libby explains on the recordings.

"When a lot of stuff comes to me, I'll gather my staff together and say, 'what happened here?' and we'll sort of pool our recollections of it, and that almost always brings me a fuller recollection of what's happened. I haven't done that here.

"I apologize if my recollection of this stuff is not perfect," Libby said. "I apologize if there's some stuff that I remember and some I don't."

In audio recordings played earlier Tuesday, Libby said he was "surprised" to hear from NBC "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert that Joseph Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

"Is it your testimony under oath, you don't recall Wilson's wife working for the CIA -- between the sixth (of July) and your conversation with Russert?" asked Fitzgerald.

"That's correct, sir, I don't recall discussing it. I do recall being surprised when I talked to Russert on the 10th or 11th," Libby told Fitzgerald.

Libby and Russert talked on July 10, 2003; Russert has denied he told Libby anything about Wilson's wife.

Wilson's article appeared on July 6, 2003. His wife's CIA connection was revealed in a column written by Robert Novak, eight days later.

Novak's column caused a political firestorm, and two months later prompted an FBI probe.

In the past two weeks of testimony and evidence, prosecutors tried to establish Cheney as the first source of Libby's knowledge that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and sent him on the trip.

Presenting on Thursday, Libby's defense team is expected to argue that any discrepancies in what Libby told investigators stem from his difficult role as a busy government official distracted by urgent national security matters.

Powerful Pa. Senator Indicted (NSDY/AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

PHILADELPHIA -- State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, one of the most powerful and controversial figures in Pennsylvania politics, was indicted Tuesday on federal charges he used a nonprofit group for personal and political gain and defrauded the state out of $1 million.

Many of the 139 charges stem from Fumo's ties to a nonprofit agency in his South Philadelphia district.

Authorities had been investigating the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods for more than four years. The group was started by Fumo aides in 1991 to serve the neighborhood where he grew up.

Prosecutors said he used state employees and the nonprofit group to fulfill his every whim -- including cleaning his 33-room mansion, spying on his ex-wife, and fighting a dune project that might block his view of the ocean.

The charges included fraud, obstruction of justice, conspiracy and tax offenses.

Fumo is to surrender to the FBI on Wednesday, the U.S. attorney's office said.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said Fumo spent about $1 million in state money and another $1 million from the nonprofit. Prosecutors said Fumo also engaged in a systematic cover-up through the destruction of e-mails and other electronic records.

The Philadelphia Democrat beat two previous indictments. In 1973, authorities dropped vote-fraud charges against Fumo, while a 1980 conviction for his role in an alleged ghost-worker scheme was eventually overturned.

Fumo, anticipating the indictment on Monday, temporarily stepped down as the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee but remains in the Senate.

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," the 63-year-old lawyer and banker said.

In Pennsylvania, Fumo's name has come to be synonymous with power during his nearly three decades in the Legislature.

He quickly maneuvered into leadership posts after arriving in 1978, and takes credit for producing more than $8 billion in economic benefits in the Philadelphia region. Federal investigators said he controlled more than 90 state employees.

"If an extraterrestrial came down here, it wouldn't say, `Take me to your leader.' It would say, `Where's Vince?'" former state Rep. Gerard Kosinski once said.

The Case Against Fumo (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo used taxpayer and charity money to pay for everything from political polls to power tools, from cars to farm equipment, from errands to shopping sprees, a grand jury charged yesterday.

Among the more than $2 million in allegedly illicit spending: Fumo (D., Phila.) hired private detectives to tail ex-girlfriends and dig up dirt on political rivals - including Gov. Rendell.

"Sen. Fumo didn't just step over the line," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said yesterday. "He completely ignored it."

The grand jury indictment - 267 pages, 139 counts, carrying a possible 10-year prison sentence - came out one day after Fumo delivered a dramatic speech in the Senate in which he dismissed the pending charges as "falsities and half-truths."

Yesterday, Fumo was silent. Today, he will be fingerprinted and appear before a federal magistrate. Tomorrow, his lawyers have promised to hold a news conference to discuss the charges.

Fumo, 63, who has served as senator since 1978, was depicted by Meehan as a "greedy, manipulative" politician angling for ways to make the public and charities pay for his lavish lifestyle.

The indictment says Fumo once told a confidant that he had an acronym for one goal in his life - spending "OPM," that is, "other people's money."

"Because he was delivering large amounts of money to his Philadelphia constituents with one hand," Meehan said, "Vincent Fumo felt entitled to reach deeply into the pockets of Pennsylvania taxpayers with the other hand."

Fumo is charged with fraud, conspiracy, and with directing a cover-up - ordering computers scrubbed of e-mails after The Inquirer broke the news that the FBI was investigating him.

The indictment says Fumo exploited his Senate budget and power; the South Philadelphia charity he helped fund, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods; and the Independence Seaport Museum for his personal and political use.

Grand jurors said Fumo:

Funneled more than $60,000 from the charity into an effort to block a dune-rebuilding project in South Jersey. The indictment says Fumo feared the project would ruin the ocean view at his Margate home.

Assigned one Senate aide to work for 18 months as "project manager" overseeing renovations at Fumo's 33-room mansion in Spring Garden, and paid another aide to clean the house.

Put other taxpayer-paid aides to work organizing political fund-raisers; putting together campaign mailings; paying Fumo's personal bills; driving Fumo's daughter to schools; driving his shirts to be laundered; fixing his TV; and packing boxes of Fumo bobblehead dolls.

Doled out fat state contracts to political consultants and others who did little or no state work.

Repeatedly cruised on museum yachts at a cost to the museum of more than $100,000. One trip included a $2,539 bill for a French meal.

Fumo was a driving force behind the funding for Citizens', striking deals with Peco Energy under which the power company gave the charity $17 million.

No criminal charges were brought in connection with Fumo's interaction with Peco. At a news conference yesterday, Meehan said the destruction of e-mails by Fumo staff likely meant the full story of the Peco donation would remain unknown.

Yesterday's indictment also claimed Fumo sought $100 million from Verizon, of which $15 million was to go to Citizens' Alliance. The communications company refused to put up any money.

Also charged in the indictment was Ruth Arnao, 51, former executive director of Citizens' Alliance and one of Fumo's closest friends. She was charged with 45 criminal counts and was said to have taken part in the fraud and obstruction. Her lawyer, Edwin J. Jacobs Jr., declined to comment yesterday.

Two former computer technicians on Fumo's staff, Leonard P. Luchko, 50; and Mark Eister, 30, were previously indicted on such obstruction charges - and now will go on trial with Fumo and Arnao. U.S. District Judge William Yohn had scheduled that trial for May, but yesterday's superceding indictment is likely to trigger a delay.

In another count in the new filing, Fumo is charged with aiding Arnao in filing a false tax return to the IRS on behalf of Citizens' Alliance in 2002.

On the tax form she signed, Arnao pledged that the charity had not been used for political purposes. It is illegal for nonprofit organizations to engage in political activity.

In part, the indictment levels charges that have previously surfaced. As has been reported, it noted that Citizens' Alliance spent $250,000 to pay for political polls and also secretly financed a lawsuit against a foe of Fumo's in the state Senate.

One new allegation is that Fumo had detectives trying to dig up dirt on Rendell, city union leader John Dougherty, and Fumo's ex-wife and former girlfriends.

Detectives researched Rendell's purchase of a home in Ocean City, N.J., the indictment says.

At the time of the detective work, Fumo was supporting another candidate for governor.

One expert in Pennsylvania politics said the spying was "political dynamite" that, more than anything else, could cost Fumo support among his fellow legislators.

"In all my years of studying and writing about state government I have never heard anything that even remotely sounds like this," said G. Terry Madonna, a pollster and analyst at Franklin and Marshall College. "It's mind-boggling."

Rendell declined through a spokeswoman to comment.

"He won't comment. No way. Nice try," spokeswoman Kate Philips said.

Also new was the indictment's wholesale portrait of Fumo as an imperial boss who used Senate and charity workers as personal errand boys and girls.

Fumo had Citizens' Alliance employees at "his beck and call" to handle chores, the indictment says. Senate staffers, too, were available to "serve him in any manner he desired... to further his political goals and attend to his personal wants."

When Fumo bought a working farm near Harrisburg, state workers were assigned to set it up. While holding down a Senate job, these staffers allegedly bought feed for horses, hired hands to mend fences, and pondered the precise breed of goat to buy.

To underscore what they called Fumo's greed, prosecutors took pains to highlight his considerable wealth.

Aside from his substantial income as a banker, Fumo has served as "of counsel" to the prominent Philadelphia law firm Dilworth Paxson. The indictment revealed Dilworth paid Fumo "as much as $1 million per year."

The indictment also cites Fumo's mansion in the Spring Garden section of Philadelphia; a beach-block home in Margate, N.J; a bayside condo in Ventnor, N.J.; a 100-acre farm outside Harrisburg; and a multi-million-dollar house in Florida.

The indictment reads in part like a catalog of Fumo's wide-ranging passions and love of gadgets. It says Citizens' Alliance spent more than $75,000 buying tools that ended up in Fumo's four houses.

A licensed electrician, Fumo liked having the same set of tools in each house, the indictment says.

According to the indictment, $6,500 went to buy 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners - one for each floor of his four houses.

Citizens' Alliance spent $600,000 to refurbish and furnish Fumo's legislative office in South Philadelphia. The charity owned the building housing the legislative office but collected only $18,000 a year in rent for it.

The indictment says the charity's money was also tapped for shopping sprees. Fumo and Arnao would meet at Sam's Club, Home Depot and Lowe's outlets near Atlantic City to "stock up on thousands of dollars of goods for their summer residences."

Grand jurors said the pair used Citizens' Alliance credit cards for such purchases as $3,900 in mosquito magnets and a $450 meat grinder destined for use on the Harrisburg-area farm.

The indictment said a charity minivan was regularly driven by Senate employees to Martha's Vineyard to be used by Fumo, Arnao and their friends on summer vacations. His Senate drivers did Fumo's personal shopping, drove his daughter to school, and regularly delivered packages.

And Fumo, who held no official title with the nonprofit, allegedly received a $55,000 SUV for his use.

Though he is one of only five state senators from Philadelphia, Fumo has long had an outsize impact on policy in the Capitol and in Philadelphia.

He is renowned and at times feared for his smarts, his mastery of the art of the deal, his network of appointees and allies, and his ability to build effective political coalitions.

Yesterday's indictment marks the third time Fumo has been criminally charged.

In 1973, five years before he became a senator, he was arrested on charges of voter intimidation, but the charges were quickly withdrawn.

In 1980, a federal jury convicted him of putting "ghost" employees on the state payroll, but a judge threw out the conviction.

Fumo has promised a vigorous fight to clear his name one more time.

"If there is anyone who has shown the capabilities of overcoming legal and ethical challenges, it's Vince Fumo," said Chris Borick, a professor of politics at Muhlenberg College.

"But I can see no obvious way that he can come out from under this one. From a political sense, these are some really deep scars that have been inflicted upon him."

Mayor Street said Fumo would "remain an influential force for Philadelphia," even though Fumo has stepped down from his key post as minority chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

"My thoughts and concerns now are with Sen. Fumo and his family," Street said in a statement.

Founded in 1991 by Arnao and two others with ties to Fumo, Citizens' Alliance has helped charter schools, rehabbed storefronts in South Philadelphia, televised the Mummers, and helped fight AIDS.

Though the probe that resulted in yesterday's indictment began in 2003, investigators started focusing on Citizens' Alliance in 2004 after The Inquirer reported that Peco had secretly agreed to give the charity $17 million and reduce its rates as part of a legal settlement with Fumo, who had opposed the utility's business plans.

The paper also disclosed that Fumo had arranged for the Delaware River Port Authority to give $10 million to Citizens' Alliance. The port authority is largely funded through bridge tolls and the PATCO commuter train.

Citizens' Alliance also has received more than $4 million in state and other government grants.

The indictment says Fumo also asked Verizon to steer $2.5 million in legal business to Dilworth Paxson. A partner in the law firm could not be reached for comment last night.

If convicted, Fumo likely faces at least two years in prison, though he could be sentenced to 10 years or more if he is found guilty of the most serious charges, including conspiracy to defraud state taxpayers.

Fumo is scheduled to surrender to the FBI agents this morning who investigated him, Kathleen McAfee and Vicki Humphreys.

At 1:30 p.m., he is to appear briefly for arraignment with his lawyer before a federal magistrate and prosecutors John Pease and Robert Zauzmer. Fumo has already made routine bail arrangements, including surrendering his passport and firearms. Fumo owns a collection of more than 100 weapons.

To accommodate the expected media and political interest, today's arraignment has been moved from the small magistrate courtroom to a larger one. There, Fumo and Arnao will appear with other people federally charged yesterday - including an accused bank robber and a fugitive from justice.

Indictment Is In The Details (PHI)

By Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

The 267-page federal indictment of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo is a portrait of greed and entitlement that prosecutors hope will be a road map to persuading a jury that one of the state's most resilient political figures engaged in fraud and other crimes.

And it was the talk of the legal community yesterday, as lawyers across Philadelphia - and beyond - marveled at the level of detail and predicted a raging courtroom battle.

One lawyer said the indictment was a bit like a poker game - with an extremely confident player.

"It's like the government saying, 'We're so confident of our hand, we'll show you our hand,' " said former federal prosecutor Robert E. Goldman.

E-mail. Bank documents. Payroll records. Even a table of contents. And a list of potential witnesses so tough to follow that another lawyer said it reminded him of the cast of characters from Crime and Punishment.

Indeed, the narrative is dotted with expletives used by the senator, dozens of references to girlfriends or ex-girlfriends, and more than 30 instances of double exclamation points!!

"It's like an edict of what the government is going to establish - in detail - at trial," said Goldman, now a lawyer with a Center City law firm.

Veteran defense lawyer Nicholas J. Nastasi said he was struck not just by the level of detail of the charges, but also by the level of apparent corroboration. "I think there's a great deal of documentary evidence," he said.

Fumo, in a speech Monday on the Senate floor, said he had done nothing wrong.

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," said Fumo, who vowed to fight the charges.

What a fight that is likely to be.

John P. Pucci, a former federal prosecutor in Philadelphia who now practices law in Massachusetts, predicted a showcase of "movers and shakers" on the witness stand at the eventual trial - and Fumo's life under a microscope.

"His life is going to be laid out for all the world to see," said Pucci.

Some defense lawyers said that Fumo, in his speech Monday, seemed to foreshadow a defense to charges that he used Senate staff to perform personal work for him: They work extraordinarily long hours at their Senate jobs, so it's no big deal if they do a few personal chores for him in between.

"When you put the two things together, it could be an interesting defense," said William A. DeStefano, a Center City lawyer who represented a number of witnesses called before the grand jury.

DeStefano said he, too, was struck by the breadth of the indictment.

"The amount of detail is boggling," DeStefano said, though he noted that much of that detail seemed to be more embarrassing to Fumo than incriminating.

It didn't have to go on and on, he said.

"From a legal perspective, it could have been done in five or 10 pages," DeStefano said.

Former Camden County Prosecutor Edward F. Borden Jr. said the sheer number of charges - 139 counts - gives prosecutors an edge.

"They only need to convince the jury to convict on some of the significant offenses to provide the basis for a very substantial sentence," he said.

But sometimes, he said, a complex indictment poses problems for prosecutors.

"You start to run into questions about what evidence is admissible," said Borden, who now practices law in Center City and Cherry Hill. "You run the risk that you're not able to prove significant portions."

Nastasi said the case was reminiscent of the federal indictment of one his clients, former State Sen. Buddy Cianfrani, who - like Fumo - was charged with numerous counts of mail fraud, tax violations and obstructing justice.

But Nastasi said Cianfrani, who represented the same Senate district and like Fumo was on the powerful Appropriations Committee, was the sole defendant and was charged only with violations involving public money.

And, he said, Cianfrani lived a more modest lifestyle than Fumo - so there was no mention in the Cianfrani indictment of any vacation homes, estates or yachts.

But Cianfrani pleaded guilty - and Nastasi sees no such outcome for Fumo. "The charges are going to be vigorously contested," Nastasi predicted, in a long trial. "This will be a full courtroom - standing room only."

A South Jersey defense lawyer, Rocco Cipparone Jr., said he, too, expected Fumo to mount a strong defense.

"He's not an individual who's afraid of a fight," he said.

Staffer's E-mail: DSL Lines, Special Errands and More

On or about Aug. 24, 2003, Leonard P. Luchko, a computer technician in State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's Tasker Street office, e-mailed his supervisor complaining that Fumo had found out that staffers in Harrisburg were aware of a new DSL line given only to that office. According to the indictment, the e-mail stated in part:

It saddens me that some of our people don't think of [Person No. 1] and me as members of the SDCS [Senate Democratic Computer Services] team. I am sure at times it must seem to them that we are premadonnas down here because we seem to get everything we want and don't have to deal with any of the red tape that goes along with requests for hardware and software. I just wish they could see all of the bullshit [Person No. 1] and I have to go through every single day then they would understand why we get the so called special treatment. This of course is not possible because what happens at Tasker Street stays at Tasker Street!

Yes I would like to see their reaction when they are told to support the Senator his family, girlfriends and business associates along with the staff their friends and their kids 24 hours a day.

I would like to see their reaction when they are told to drive cars back from Martha's Vineyard on a Sunday.

I would like to see their reaction if they had to go to Florida for a week and stay in the middle of nowhere and work 12 hours a day.

I would like to see their reaction when they are told to drive people to get their hair done.

I would like to see their reaction when they are told to take out the trash or unload a tracker trailer.

I would like to see their reaction if they had to wrap 150 VJF bobble head dolls and mail them.

I would like to see their reaction when they go on vacation and have to take a phone, Blackberry and a laptop with them and are required to check email a minimum of 4 times a day.

I would like to see their reaction when they have to inform the Senator that they will not be available between the hours of 7 and 10 on a Saturday night because they want to go to the movies.

Yes I would like to see their reaction when they are told to be available to drive to the shore and wire a yacht for internet access on Labor Day weekend but are not told which day just be available and ready to go.

And I would REALLY like to see their reaction when they get screamed at for something that they have absolutely no control over like the internet being down. Then maybe just maybe they would understand why we have a DSL line.

PS I love my job and wouldn't trade it for any job in the Senate!

A FEDERAL CASE (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

STATE Sen. Vince Fumo touts his membership in the American Mensa Society, a society for people with very high IQs.

But Fumo wasn't smart enough to avoid being charged yesterday with 139 felonies by a federal grand jury.

The feds said Fumo, 63, one of the state's most influential power brokers, used his Senate workers to clean his house and provide personal services, and tapped a charity he helped organize to provide him with cars, tools and other goodies.

The charges include conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, obstruction of justice, and aiding and assisting the filing of a false tax return.

If convicted of all charges, Fumo, a state senator since 1978, could face from five to 15 years behind bars, sources said.

Ruth Arnao, 50, a longtime aide and former executive director of the Fumo charity, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also was indicted.

She is charged with 45 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, obstruction of justice and filing a false tax return.

The 267-page indictment painted Fumo as a man who "abused" his power to "build an empire" of Senate and charity employees who catered to his personal needs, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said.

Fumo used Senate employees, government-paid contractors and the charity workers "to serve [Fumo's] sense of entitlement," Meehan said.

And, then, when Fumo realized investigators were onto him, he orchestrated a coverup by directing aides to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence to scuttle the federal investigation, Meehan said.

Prosecutors said Fumo expressed a philosophy of using "other people's money," which was called "OPM." It was this philsophy that underlay the fraud.

Fumo will fire back tomorrow when his attorneys hold a press conference at the office of his attorney, Richard A. Sprague, to address the charges.

In remarks Monday on the floor of the state Senate, Fumo said he had not done anything illegal and that he and his staff had "produced" more than $8 billion in benefits for the city and the region.

Joel Frank, an attorney for Arnao, said she "categorically denied" engaging in any illegal activity.

"We intend to fight these charges and present the facts in court," Frank said.

Fumo and Arnao are scheduled to be arraigned before a federal magistrate today.

Two former Fumo computer aides, Leonard Luchko, 50, and Mark Eister, 37, were again charged with 29 counts and five counts, respectively, of conspiracy and obstruction of justice.

Both were indicted last June on obstruction charges, pleaded not guilty and are to stand trial in May.

Meehan took issue with Fumo's assertion Monday that the feds' suggestion that his Senate staffers were used as political operatives or personal assistants reflected an "amazing ignorance" of the legislative process.

"When you commit to public service you accept that there is a line," Meehan said, "and that that line is clear: The people's assets and resources... cannot be used for private benefit. Sen. Fumo just didn't step over the line; he completely ignored it."

The indictment alleges that Fumo's "fraudulent and extensive use" of Senate resources for his own benefit resulted in a loss to the Senate of more than $1 million.

Here are some examples of how prosecutors say Fumo stepped over the line:

Staffers in his Philadelphia district office allegedly worked on Fumo's campaigns and campaigns of City Council candidates he favored.

The indictment alleged that Senate staffers in Harrisburg spent more time attending to Fumo's personal needs than the public's business.

A former Senate staffer served an 18-month stint as "project manager" overseeing the "restoration and refurbishment" of Fumo's 33-room mansion on Green Street in the Fairmount section.

Senate aides were routinely dispatched during regular working hours, the feds said. Among their duties: cleaning Fumo's homes, overseeing the 100-acre farm he bought in 2003 near Harrisburg and even driving luxury cars supplied by Citizens Alliance to Martha's Vineyard, Mass., so Fumo and his guests could arrive by private jet and have cars and luggage waiting for them.

Martha's Vineyard is a favored summertime playground for the rich and famous.

The feds said Fumo even gave a $40,000-a-year, taxpayer-financed contract to a private eye, ostensibly to do research for the Appropriations Committee.

But the detective's main job was to dig up dirt on Fumo's political enemies, and follow his ex-wife and ex-girlfriends and their new boyfriends.

Meehan characterized this as "scary."

Fumo and Arnao routinely skimmed from Alliance accounts to pay for personal goods and services.

The charity bought $75,000 worth of tools and other items for use in Fumo's four homes, including 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners, the feds charged.

Citizens Alliance paid for shopping sprees during summer months down the shore when Fumo and Arnao would meet to stock up on thousands of dollars worth of household items for their summer homes.

Citizens also bought a loaded-to-the-max, $55,000 SUV for use by Fumo's drivers at his Tasker Street office.

Fumo got a $38,000 minivan and Arnao a $25,000 Jeep for their personal use, courtesy of the charity, the indictment charged.

Laborers hired by Citizens Alliance were routinely dispatched to his homes and farm to do repair work, clear snow and pick up trash.

Citizens Alliance also provided heavy equipment it purchased - a bulldozer, a backhoe and a dump truck - for use at Fumo's properties, free of charge, the feds said.

And Arnao filed false tax returns with Fumo's assistance to mask the political spending and other improper use of Citizens Alliance's funds, the feds charged.

· Fumo is also alleged to have exploited his position as a board member at the Independence Seaport Museum.

The feds said the museum provided a free yacht for Fumo's use at Martha's Vineyard on his vacations from 1996 through 2003.

The yacht was supposed to be used to drum up contributions for the museum, the feds said, not as a plaything for Fumo.

The indictment charged that when neither of the museum's boats was available in 2001, the museum rented another yacht for $13,775 and let Fumo have it for his summer vacation.

The indictment added that Fumo did not repay the museum for the cost of this trip until April 2004, after the federal probe was well under way.

Finally, the indictment alleges that Fumo directed Luchko, Eister and others, with Arnao's backing, to destroy e-mails and other electronic evidence on Fumo and Citizens Alliance computers in order to keep it from the FBI.

Supporters of Fumo stood by the embattled senator yesterday.

Senate Democratic leader Robert J. Mellow, D-Lackawanna, said Fumo could depend on his "continued support and friendship during this difficult time."

Mayor Street issued a statement saying Fumo had served the city with "energy and passion" for three decades and Street was "saddened" that Fumo had stepped down as minority chair of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Editorial | Fumo Charged (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

Among the many dubious perks that federal prosecutors allege state Sen. Vincent J. Fumo engineered through his Pennsylvania Senate office and a Philadelphia community nonprofit was the free use of a bulldozer at Fumo's farm near Harrisburg.

Well, right now that bulldozer should come in mighty handy.

The powerful South Philadelphia Democrat and veteran Harrisburg lawmaker will have to move earth - and maybe heaven, as well - to bury the acres of criminal charges lodged against him yesterday.

Fumo will have his day in court and is entitled to the presumption of innocence, of course. Indeed, he sought to preempt the indictment Monday by declaring in a Senate speech that he had "not done anything illegal."

Across the broad expanse of a 267-page indictment, though, Fumo is accused of using taxpayer and charitable funds not merely to feather his own nest, but also to clean it.

The indictment's cast of characters includes a Senate staffer who allegedly served as Fumo's once-a-week housekeeper, and others who jumped at the senator's call to drive his cars, maintain his computers, and even serve as a gumshoe to shadow his old loves.

From the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a nonprofit that Fumo created, came the bulldozer, agency-paid handymen, $75,000 worth of power tools, and 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners, the indictment said.

The charges resulting from a four-year probe by U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan paint a portrait of an elected official who let his unofficial title as the prince of Philadelphia politics go to his head.

If the allegations are proven - including the serious-as-a-heart-attack charge of obstruction of justice - it would be truly sad that one of the brightest, most accomplished members of the General Assembly could have been so foolhardy.

What a contrast to Fumo's savvy track record as a state lawmaker, one who shaped countless budget deals and policies that provided handsome benefits to his state, his city and his constituents.

Whether Fumo can take sole credit for the nearly $8 billion brought home to Philadelphia for worthy public projects over the past two decades, he was a major player without a doubt.

The seeds of his current troubles, though, appear to have been planted by making one deal too many. That was the agreement in the late '90s to settle challenges to the state's electricity-deregulation efforts. One outcome of those negotiations was that PECO Energy Co. agreed to donate $17 million to lavishly fund the Citizens' Alliance.

The alliance did good works - street cleaning, business development, charter schools. Yet funds from a regional utility's ratepayers should have been used to benefit the region, not just one senator's district.

And how much more good could this money have done if it were distributed to true, and truly effective, nonprofits - not one so intent on enhancing the reputation, clout and comfort of one politician?

INDICTED: THE CURRENT CULTURE IN HARRISBURG (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 7, 2007

A HARRISBURG hand grenade rolled into the room a few weeks ago with the news of $4 million in bonuses paid to legislative aides in the House and Senate.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan just pulled the pin yesterday, when he released the indictment of state Sen. Vincent Fumo.

That explosive 267-page document paints a picture of entitlement, a lack of accountabilty and a stunning disregard for the public trust that, if true, indicts not just a single senator, but an entire culture of arrogance, secretiveness and corruption that must be cleaned up.

The General Assembly's legislative bonuses - lists of which are now being released by both caucuses -may in the end be defensible, though just looking at how widely they range, from $65 to $40,000, and how quickly some leaders suspended the practice, gives a foul smell to them all.

The attorney general may be investigating whether or not those bonuses were used to pay for campaign work, which is illegal.

And the bonuses may be small potatoes compared to the 139 counts the government outlines on how Fumo "systematically, routinely, and improperly used the funds and resources of the Senate for his personal and political benefit... [directing] that Senate employees and contractors employed by the Senate serve him in any manner he desired throughout the regular workday and at all hours of the day and night, to further his political goals and attend to his personal wants."

But both suggest something is very wrong in Harrisburg: a disconnect not only from the reality of the lives of taxpayers, but also from the jobs these lawmakers are supposed to be doing: working on behalf of the public.

The Fumo indictment is a stunning document that says Fumo had Senate staffers handle his personal life, such as cleaning his house and organizaing the renovations on his Green Street mansion.

It says he defrauded the nonprofit group he established, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, by using $1 million from that group for a wide range of unrelated spending. The indictment lays out in excruciating detail purchases made by Executive Director (and Senate-paid staffer) Ruth Arnao, also under indictment. Numerous shopping sprees bought household items, food, clothing, DVDs, tools and an inexplicable 19 Oreck vacuum cleaners using Citizens Alliance funds. It says Fumo also used Alliance funds for political work, including polling.

Fumo also engaged in a coverup after the FBI and IRS began to investigate him, the indictment says. And it questions his free use of yachts owned by the Seaport Museum, on whose board he sits, during his Martha's Vineyard vacations.

The indictment paints a picture of a man whose boundaries between his personal life and professional responsibilities have completely dissolved.

And while that may feel familiar to some workaholics, the charge that taxpayers footed the bill for a shocking amount of personal comforts and political benefits is a sickening outrage. (Daily News sources say Fumo could face up to 15 years in jail.)

Harrisburg lawmakers have lately made a lot of noise about their new reform efforts. Indeed, Fumo himself not long ago released his list for reforming the way laws are heard and passed.

But all that is a light dusting compared to the thorough house-cleaning that must be done.

Citizens should demand a clean house in Harrisburg. And we know just where they might find a few extra vacuum cleaners to do the job.

Loudoun Land Deals Subject Of U.S. Probe (WP)

By Michael Laris And Sandhya Somashekhar

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Federal prosecutors have launched a far-reaching investigation into potential public corruption in Loudoun County, where officials have overseen billions of dollars' worth of development projects in one of the nation's fastest-growing areas.

Loudoun Commonwealth's Attorney James E. Plowman announced a joint investigation yesterday with the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which will take the leading role. "It's kind of a waste of resources if we're both independently reviewing the same matters," Plowman said, adding that the combined federal-local effort "brings about a greater aspect of neutrality."

The announcement follows months of quiet interviewing by FBI agents, who have queried county figures about possible abuses of power by officials, and represents a major escalation of the scrutiny facing Loudoun, the officials with the power to approve lucrative development projects and those in the real estate industry with the most at stake.

It also came shortly before Loudoun's Board of Supervisors passed ethics measures designed to increase government transparency. As part of the reforms, the board voted to discourage supervisors from accepting campaign donations from developers and others with pending projects, and it agreed to disclosure guidelines that could expose potential conflicts of interest.

The investigation and board action come after reports by The Washington Post last month that detailed how major land-use decisions in Loudoun have been dominated by a small network of public officials and their allies in the development industry. Developers, landowners and others profited as they coordinated with public officials to influence land-use decisions in the county, e-mails and other records showed.

Plowman, who last month said his office was focusing on eight or nine areas of inquiry, said in a statement that the joint group "will be tasked with reviewing any potential issues of public corruption within Loudoun County." It was unclear which individuals or specific actions are being investigated.

U.S. officials would not discuss their role in the probe. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Jim Rybicki, said, "Department of Justice policy does not allow us to confirm or deny the existence of an investigation." An FBI spokeswoman declined to comment.

People interviewed by the FBI in recent months said agents asked them in wide-ranging interviews if they had knowledge of any improper dealings by public officials.

The Post reported on the actions of Lawrence Beerman II, the former head of Loudoun's Planning Commission, who voted favorably on projects brought by companies with which he had business ties. They were a firm run by Peter J. Knop and his son, Peter R.Q. Knop, who operate a construction waste dump, and the home-building arm of Greenvest L.C. Beerman's activities have drawn the attention of the FBI, according to two people who were interviewed.

Beerman and the Knops were interviewed for The Post's report but declined to respond to additional written questions. A lawyer representing Greenvest said the company did nothing improper.

"The fact you have local law enforcement working with federal law enforcement is an indication of the seriousness of the probe," said Eric H. Holder Jr., a former deputy attorney general and U.S. attorney in the District. The investigation will now appear to be in "a quiet period, but just because federal officials are not commenting on what they are doing, that does not mean the investigation is not very active. . . . These things often take months, if not years, to resolve themselves."

Some Loudoun officials have argued that they forged close links to people in the real estate industry in an effort to serve residents and said that their votes and other public actions reflected what they thought was best for the county. Supervisor Bruce E. Tulloch (R-Potomac) was among the officials who, records and interviews show, worked closely with individuals who stood to benefit from his position.

"I embrace the investigation and look forward to the outcome," Tulloch said. "The sooner, the better." The allegations "need to be brought forward and people's names cleared," he said.

Supervisor James Burton (I-Blue Ridge) said that because of Plowman's ties to other Republican officials, Burton is "glad that someone other than the commonwealth's attorney is involved. . . . The public trust has been severely damaged. We need something to clear it up as soon as possible."

Chairman Scott K. York (I) asked that the board hold a closed meeting this month to discuss whether to sue a real estate agent and others over the purchase of 101 acres in Ashburn from the Islamic Saudi Academy Inc., a company affiliated with a conservative religious school in Fairfax County funded by the Saudi government. The county paid $13.5 million for the land with the urging of Tulloch, who had close ties with the broker.

The Post's series reported that the purchase price was substantially more than what another buyer said he was under contract to pay for the land.

Tulloch defended his actions and those of his friend Dale Polen Myers, a former supervisor who represented the Saudis in the sale.

"I'm proud of everything I've done on this board," Tulloch said. The land purchase "was a good deal for the county, and I don't regret that vote," he added, noting that the purchase had been approved unanimously by the board.

Supervisor Stephen J. Snow (R-Dulles), whose actions were also part of The Post's reports, defended his close communications with developers as proper and in the service of the community. Evoking his years in the Army, he said he lives by the strict code of ethics of a soldier and an officer.

"I don't take life casually," Snow said. "I don't take all of what we do here frivolously. A lot of blood, sweat and tears goes into this job."

More Indictments From Operation Big Coon Dog Investigation (TRI)

By Kathy Still

TriCities.com, February 7, 2007

A South Carolina resident and a North Carolina contracting firm were indicted Tuesday on corruption charges stemming from the Operation Big Coon Dog investigation that rocked Buchanan County after a 2002 flood nearly wiped out the Hurley community.

James Frederick "Rick" Byrd, 56, of Landrum, S.C., and Byrd Brothers Inc., of Wilson, N.C., were indicted by a federal grand jury in Abingdon, both on two counts of program fraud and money laundering conspiracy, according to a news release issued by the U.S attorney's office in Roanoke.

The corporation and Byrd are the latest charged in the public-corruption investigation that nabbed 16 Buchanan County officials, residents and business owners for taking and offering bribes to land lucrative contracts to clean up Hurley. The flood killed two people and caused millions of dollars in damage to the Buchanan County community.

Federal prosecutors got 16 convictions following the investigation.

The federal government spent more than $9 million to rebuild some homes, roads and bridges in Hurley following the May flood. However, court proceedings revealed that many of the contracts for cleanup work were awarded after some local officials received bribes for favorable treatment.

Expensive televisions, NASCAR race tickets and expensive coon dogs were among the bribes offered, prosecutors said. The coon dog bribes gave the investigation and subsequent prosecution its catchy name.

During the federal hearings, prosecutors said the Federal Emergency Management Agency allowed the Board of Supervisors to take responsibility for the cleanup efforts. The contracts were never awarded by public bid, they said. Instead, contractors were selected primarily through bribes, according to prosecutors.

According to Tuesday's indictment, Byrd Brothers was the subcontractor in charge of the cleanup for nearly 30 days before the Buchanan County officials and business owners got involved in the corruption.

The indictment alleges that Rick Byrd is the agent for Byrd Brothers. He is accused of paying two bribes to Ray Blankenship, the former chairman of the Buchanan County Board of Supervisors. Prosecutors say the bribes bought Blankenship's favor when it came time to determine who got the contracts, according to the news release.

The bribes allegedly paid to Blankenship were hidden and disguised as legitimate payments to Byrd Brothers' subcontractors, prosecutors said in the news release.

The charges carry a maximum penalty of 30 years in federal prison, a $750,000 fine, or both.

Special Agent Phillip Barnett with the Internal Revenue Service and Special Agent Tom Snapp with the Federal Bureau of Investigation conducted the probe. Thomas Bondurant Jr. will prosecute the case.

Bondurant could not be reached for comment Tuesday evening.

FBI: 19 Bonano Crime Family Members Busted (WABC)

WABC-TV, February 7, 2007

The acting underboss and the elderly acting consigliore of the Bonanno crime family were among 19 reputed mobsters busted by federal authorities Tuesday morning, officials said.

Authorities say acting underboss Nicholas "Nicky Mouth" Santora, 73-year-old acting consigliore Anthony "Fat Anthony" Rabito and 17 others were arrested during the raids.

Officials say they will be arraigned in Brooklyn federal court on charges that include racketeering, racketeering conspiracy, conspiracy to commit murder in aid of racketeering, illegal gambling, extortion, extortion conspiracy, loansharking, securities fraud and narcotics distribution.

It is reportedly the fifth time since 2003 that FBI agents busted the Bonanno crime family.

Officials say the repeated busts have come after former Bonanno boss Joseph Massino began cooperating with authorities.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in the Eastern District has prosecuted more than 100 members and associates of the Bonanno family.

Since March 2002, three Bonanno family bosses or acting bosses have been convicted in this district on racketeering and racketeering-related charges, which include murder or murder conspiracy as a racketeering act. A fourth reputed Bonanno family acting boss, Michael Mancuso, is awaiting trial.

Rabito, the alleged "street boss" of the Bonanno crime family, is a Korean War veteran who lives on a quiet street in the East Williamsburg section of Brooklyn.

19 Charged in FBI Mafia Sweep

NEW YORK -- Federal prosecutors charged 19 reputed members and associates of the Bonanno crime family Tuesday, including alleged acting under boss Nicky "Nicky Mouth" Santora and alleged acting consigliore Anthony "Fat Anthony" Rabito.

In addition to the reputed under boss and consigliere, 17 other reputed soldiers, members and associates are charged.

Investigators said other charges will include drug trafficking, extortion, illegal gambling and securities fraud. They will be arraigned in Brooklyn federal court this evening.

FBI agents conducted raids and made the arrests Tuesday morning. Investigators said this is the fifth time since 2003 that FBI agents have arrested reputed leaders and their replacements inside the Bonanno crime family.

Former boss Joseph Massino has cooperated with authorities since his arrest, even having worn a recording device to help build a case against his former associates.

Among those arrested today and some of the charges they will face:

Jerome Asaro - Racketeering Conspiracy
Tracy Badget - Gambling
Giacomo Bonventre - Gambling
Joseph Cammarano- Racketeering, Murder in Aid of Racketeering
Christopher Merz - Racketeering, Marijuana Distribution
Anthony Rabito - Racketeering, Gambling Extortion
Joseph Rossetti - Securities Fraud
Nicholas Santora - Racketeering, Gambling, Extortion
Robert Schwichraft - Securities Fraud
Paul Spina - Racketeering, Murder in Aid of Racketeering
Patrick Parsio - Racketeering, Gambling, Extortion
Anthony Vivelo - Racketeering, Gambling

Feds: Top Bonanno Mobsters Busted (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

The aging men believed to be the current leadership of the decimated Bonanno crime family were arrested Tuesday in an FBI sweep that netted 19 people.

Grabbed by agents at their homes were Nicholas Santora, 64, the crime family's reputed acting underboss, and Anthony Rabito, 73, the acting consiglieri, officials said.

Both men are considered by the FBI to be the latest patchwork of leaders of a crime family that in the past five years has seen more than 70 of its members, including former boss Joseph Massino, convicted of federal charges.

Santora, known by the moniker "Nicky Mouth," and Rabito, whose nickname is "Fat Anthony," were the lead defendants in a massive indictment that charges various defendants with racketeering, loansharking, extortion, gambling and a murder conspiracy. A charge of securities fraud is also listed in the indictment.

Also indicted were reputed Bonanno captains Jerome Asaro, 48, Joseph Cammarano Jr., 47, and Louis DeCicco, 60. Cammarano is the son of reputed Bonanno crime captain Joseph Cammarano Sr.

The 37-count indictment also levied additional charges on three other defendants who had been previously accused of shaking down Howard Beach housewife Yvonne Rossetti. Those charged in the Rossetti case and included in yesterday's indictment were reputed Bonanno soldiers Michael Cassese and Michael Virtuoso. The indictment added Santora and Rabito to the Rossetti extortion allegation. Rossetti's husband, Vincent, became a cooperating witness for the government and is believed to be the source of some of the information used in the latest round of charges, court records indicate.

Joseph Rossetti, 38, who a law enforcement source said was Vincent's younger brother, was arrested Tuesday as well on charges he was involved in securities fraud from 2002 to 2004 with Cassese and another defendant.

The case is the latest salvo in a continuing offensive by the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn, which began focusing on the Bonanno family earlier in the decade. Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said in a prepared statement that more than 70 crime family members and associates have been convicted since March 2002.

The murder conspiracy charges involved Cammarano and another defendant named Paul Spina. No one was harmed as a result of that conspiracy, according to court papers.

Untouched by the latest charges is Salvatore Montagna, reportedly the new acting boss of the Bonanno crime family. A snippet of information about Montagna's reputed status came out in a letter submitted by prosecutors to the court Tuesday. In a secret tape recording made by a government informant, Cassese said that "Sal 's the acting boss; there is nobody in between. That is it."

Rabito was indicted in 2005 by Queens County prosecutors in a gambling case and was free on bail. He was also convicted in 1982 of federal narcotics charges in a major racketeering case against the Bonanno family. Santora also was convicted in that case of conspiracy, but that judgment was overturned on appeal. Santora was sentenced to prison for other charges and was released after 15 years.

Magistrate Lois Bloom Tuesday ordered Rabito, Santora and Spina held temporarily pending bail arguments later in the week. Rossetti, Cammarano, Asaro, DeCicco and most of the other defendants were released on bonds. Cassese and Virtuoso were already in custody.

City Briefs (NYDN)

New York Daily News, February 7, 2007

Bonanno gangsters nicknamed Fat Anthony, Nicky Mouth and Fat Paul are charged with living up to their names by shaking down New York City restaurants in the latest federal indictment against the beleaguered crime family. Anthony Rabito, 73, is charged with extorting a $6,000 annual payment from Via Oreto on the upper East Side, Nicholas Santoro with shaking down the Bistro restaurant on Staten Island and Paul Spina with demanding payoffs from the Napa & Sonoma Steakhouse in Queens. All pleaded not guilty in Brooklyn Federal Court.

8 years for kid porn

A state transportation worker serving 15 years in prison for raping a young child was sentenced to eight years yesterday in a related case for keeping child pornography on his Queens office computer. Vinod Patel, 49, of East Meadow, L.I., was spotted on March 2, 2006, storing a picture of an adult having sex with a child on his computer at the Department of Transportation field office in Bayside, Queens, prosecutors said. The prison terms will run concurrently.

BONFIRE OF THE BONANNOS BUSTS 19 (NYPOST)

By Stefanie Cohen

The New York Post, February 7, 2007

Two top Bonannos got unpeeled yesterday when feds arrested the reputed acting underboss and the reputed acting consigliere of the notorious crime family.

Acting underboss Nicholas "Nicky Mouth" Santora and acting consigliere Anthony "Fat Anthony" Rabito topped a list of 19 Bonanno capos, soldiers and other associates collared on extortion, loan-sharking, gambling and murder-conspiracy charges.

Prosecutors have brought down three successive Bonanno family bosses since 2002: Joseph "Big Joey" Massino, Anthony "Tony Green" Urso and Vincent "Vinny Gorgeous" Basciano.

A fourth reputed boss, Michael Mancuso, is awaiting trial.

The two high-ranking mobsters were named in a 39-count indictment in Brooklyn federal court yesterday, which made use of wiretaps and the recordings of a canary who is working with the government.

Santora rose to family underboss after Mancuso was arrested in January 2005. Rabito was named the acting consigliere after the 2004 arrest of Joseph Cammarano, who had the top-advisor job before him.

The indictment is part of a probe that has prosecuted more than 100 Bonanno members and associates over the past five years.

Fighting Crime Tops GOP Priorities (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

House Republicans yesterday outlined a legislative package to curb drug crime, gang violence and child pornography -- pushing domestic safety issues they say will help them win back a majority.

Republican members of the Judiciary Committee criticized the Democratic leadership for leaving measures against violent crime off its publicized "first 100 hours" agenda last month.

"If you listened very carefully, there was a deafening silence when it came to dealing with violent crime," said Rep. J. Randy Forbes, Virginia Republican.

Democrats, upon taking leadership of the House, gave top priority to implementing more of the September 11 commission's recommendations, raising the minimum wage and increasing federal funding for embryonic-stem-cell research.

Republicans, holding 202 seats in the 435-member House, plan to push their own priorities as they look toward the 2008 elections.

"We are taking an activist approach, we are taking initiative, coming up with our own agenda and our own ideas," said Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Smith said he expects bipartisan support on the bills. "Crime is simply too important to leave to partisan politics," he said.

The Republican Law and Order Agenda, formally introduced yesterday, lists nine proposals. Several were passed in the House in previous Congresses but stalled in the Senate.

Among the Republican proposals were bills to make the Internet safer for children, target identity theft and other cyberspace crime, and reduce fraudulent claims with the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They also give law enforcement more tools to crack down on drug trafficking and gang crime.

"One thing is crystal clear: If we are going to do something about the skyrocketing murder rate, we have to break the back of the drug traffickers," said Rep. Ric Keller, Florida Republican, whose hometown of Orlando has recorded a 122 percent increase in the homicide rate.

His bill would impose "stiff penalties" on drug dealers.

Republicans said gang problems are inextricably linked to a spike in the number of illegal aliens, and stressed the need for legislation to strengthen border security.

Another proposal would bolster counterterrorism tools and require the death penalty for terrorist killers.

Mr. Forbes said Republicans may not have the House votes to pass their agenda, but "if we don't have them now we'll get them two years from now."

"I'm glad to see, it's important to notice who's talking about ideas in this Congress and I certainly hope that they will get a fair hearing and markup," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the Republican Conference chairman.

Mr. Putnam said the Republicans on the Judiciary Committee "are not using being in the minority as an excuse not to produce good legislation."

Democrats have introduced bills this year to address methamphetamine use, gang problems and Internet safety issues.

Rep. Bart Gordon, Tennessee Democrat, will hold a press conference today on his legislative efforts to clean up methamphetamine labs.

GOP Revives ISP-tracking Legislation (CNET)

By Declan Mccullagh

CNET News, February 7, 2007

All Internet service providers would have to keep track of what their customers are doing online to aid police in future investigations under legislation introduced Tuesday as part of a Republican "law and order agenda."

Employees of any Internet provider who fail to store that information will face fines and prison terms of up to one year, the bill says. The U.S. Justice Department could order the companies to store those records forever.

Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, the top Republican on the House Judiciary Committee, called it a necessary anti-cybercrime measure. "The legislation introduced today will give law enforcement the tools it needs to find and prosecute criminals," he said in a statement.

A second requirement, also embedded in Smith's so-called Safety Act (click for PDF), requires owners of sexually explicit Web sites to post warning labels on their pages or face imprisonment. This echoes, nearly word for word, an earlier proposal from last year that was approved by a Senate committee but never made it to a floor vote.

Even though both requirements are central to a Republican-led effort, neither data retention nor Web labeling are that partisan. A Senate committee approved a telecommunications bill that included Web labeling by a 15-7 vote in June. And Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, has been the most vocal proponent of data retention in the entire Congress.

Other bills in the Republicans' "law and order" agenda are related to terrorism, the death penalty, gangs, computer data breaches and drug trafficking. ISP snooping timeline

The legislative fusillade marks the renewal of a political tussle that began in earnest last April, when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to target Internet providers with new regulations, which have been generally opposed by telecommunications companies and civil liberties organizations. CNET News.com was the first to report that the Bush administration has been pushing for such a rule privately since mid-2005.

Until this week, however, no formal bill had been introduced in the U.S. Congress.

Supporters of the proposal say it's necessary to help track criminals if police don't respond immediately to reports of illegal activity and the relevant logs are deleted by Internet providers. They cite cases of child molestation, for instance. Industry representatives respond by saying there's no evidence that Internet providers have dragged their feet when responding to subpoenas from law enforcement.

Details about data retention requirements would be left to Gonzales. At a minimum, the bill says, the regulations must require storing records "such as the name and address of the subscriber or registered user to whom an Internet Protocol address, user identification or telephone number was assigned, in order to permit compliance with court orders."

Because there is no limit on how broad the rules can be, Gonzales would be permitted to force Internet providers to keep logs of Web browsing, instant message exchanges, or e-mail conversations indefinitely. (The bill does not, however, explicitly cover search engines or Web hosting companies, which officials have talked about before as targets of regulation.)

That broad wording also would permit the records to be obtained by private litigants in noncriminal cases, such as divorces and employment disputes. That raises additional privacy concerns, civil libertarians say.

The American Civil Liberties Union is skeptical of data retention and Web labeling. "It's going to be very difficult for Web sites to know whether they fit into this," said ACLU legislative counsel Marv Johnson, referring to the labeling rules. "And then when you throw in the 'sexually explicit materials' definition, does that include safe sex Web sites?"

"Preservation" vs. "Retention"

Currently, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention, or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

A 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool based on if a computer is in use at the time. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

When adopting its data retention rules, the European Parliament approved U.K.-backed requirements saying that communications providers in its 25 member countries--several of which had enacted their own data retention laws already--must retain customer data for a minimum of six months and a maximum of two years.

The Europe-wide requirement applies to a wide variety of "traffic" and "location" data, including the identities of the customers' correspondents; the date, time, and duration of phone calls, voice over Internet Protocol calls, or e-mail messages; and the location of the device used for the communications. But the "content" of the communications is not supposed to be retained. The rules are expected to take effect in 2008.

Three Plead Guilty To Fraud In Katrina Debris Removal (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 7, 2007

GULFPORT - Three people, including a Florida contractor, have pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government by falsifying records of debris clean up from Hurricane Katrina and billing the federal government $716,677 for the work.

Allan Kitto, 24, of Dundee, Fla., whose company was a subcontractor for debris cleanup in Pearl River County; Clinton K. Miller, 28, of Carriere; and Lauren Robertson, 23, of Picayune, entered the pleas Tuesday in Gulfport federal court, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said.

Lampton said the three will be sentenced May 7. The maximum penalty is five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

According to a federal indictment, Robertson allegedly signed false debris load slips misrepresenting that debris was loaded onto trucks on the roadway when Robertson was not present at the loading site.

The false debris load slips misrepresented that certain trucks, belonging to and under the control of Kitto, were hauling loads of debris at a time when the trucks identified on the debris load slips were not in operation on the roadway or at the dump site listed, Lampton said.

The false debris load slips also misrepresented that loads of debris were delivered to a designated dump site in Pearl River County when no debris was delivered to the dump site.

Lampton said Miller allegedly collected the false load slips and submitted them to the debris monitoring company, which would submit the false load slips to the prime contractor for payment to Kitto.

The indictment also charges that Kitto, in an effort to conceal the conspiracy, would deposit the funds into a bank account opened in the name of one of his employees and then write a check to an unindicted coconspirator who would then pay Kitto and Miller.

Miller would then pay Robertson for completing and signing the false load slips, according to the indictment.

U.S. Wants US$309 Million In Katrina Hurricane Aid Returned (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-In the neighborhood President George W. Bush visited right after Hurricane Katrina, the U.S. government gave US$84.5 million (â,¬65.3 million) to more than 10,000 households. But official figures show fewer than 8,000 homes existed there at the time.

Now the government wants back a lot of the money it gave out across the region.

The Federal Emergency Management Administration has determined nearly 70,000 households improperly received US$309.1 million (â,¬239 million) in grants, and officials acknowledge those numbers are likely to rise.

In the chaotic period after two deadly hurricanes, Katrina and Rita, slammed the Gulf Coast in 2005, federal officials scrambled to provide help to hard-hit areas.

But an Associated Press analysis of government data suggests the government might not have been careful enough with its aid as it gave out nearly US$5.3 billion (â,¬4 billion) to storm victims. The analysis found the government regularly gave money to more homes in some neighborhoods than the number of homes that actually existed.

The pattern was repeated in nearly 100 neighborhoods damaged by the hurricanes. At least 162,750 homes that did not exist before the storms may have received a total of more than US$1 billion (â,¬774 million) in improper or illegal payments, the AP found.

The AP analysis discovered the government made more home grants than the number of homes in one of every five neighborhoods in the wake of Katrina. After Rita roared ashore, there were more home grants than homes in one of every 10 neighborhoods.

In one neighborhood, at least one person gave an address as a cemetery.

In St. Bernard Parish, close to where Katrina made landfall south of New Orleans, Martina Wiggins said she was denied aid because someone had already applied using her address.

"They gave away the money too fast," Wiggins said bitterly. "A lot of people got money who didn't deserve it."

"We don't dispute that more households received expedited assistance in certain zip codes than are listed in the 2000 Census," said David Garratt, FEMA's deputy director for recovery. But he called this "not only justifiable, it's defensible."

Officials say a large number of those payments - they cannot say precisely how many - were made legitimately to homes where family members were separated after the storm, such as emergency workers who stayed behind as spouses and children fled. In such cases, a single family could qualify for more than one aid package. Garratt said officials were in a no-win position.

"We were faced with a situation where we had individuals who needed assistance, and needed it now," he said. "If we'd followed the standard procedures, it would have taken weeks."

The Justice Department so far has prosecuted more than 400 people for storm-related fraud, and US$18 million(â,¬14 million) has been returned to FEMA or the American Red Cross, according to a recent report by the department's Katrina Fraud Task Force.

In some cases, FEMA is still trying to collect refunds from individuals who improperly received more than one grant or who were ineligible for assistance. But for people like Keshian Mitchell, a 17-year-old Katrina refugee living in a dismal apartment complex in west Houston, it is small comfort.

"They ain't no help now," said Mitchell, who didn't find her parents until six months after Katrina laid waste to New Orleans. "Nobody's getting any more help - they already spent all the money."

Crystal Dixon, who lives near Mitchell, agreed. Dixon, 25, said she saw people defraud taxpayers while she fought for basic assistance to help feed and clothe her five children, ages 1 to 10.

She met one woman who had moved to Houston two years before the storm but kept her Louisiana driver's license. The woman, who had no children, got cash assistance before Dixon was helped, Dixon said.

"I try to understand how confused things got," said Dixon. Her children played outside and chattered excitedly about nearly falling off a roof into flood-swollen streets, being rescued by a Coast Guard helicopter and scrounging for food and water at the overcrowded Superdome. "But I thought everyone should have been treated equally."

Cedric Miller, a 34-year-old busboy at a New Orleans restaurant, said FEMA officials seemed to be reacting as best they could to the devastation. But Miller also said: "There was a lot of fraud going on. ... There was a whole lot of that going on. It was a big ol' way-drawn-out mess."

Frank Bass reported this story from Washington, Houston and New Orleans. Michelle Roberts reported from New Orleans.

Former Manager Gets 1 1/2 Years For Theft (MIDP)

By Jeff Mill, Press Staff

Middletown (CT) Press, February 7, 2007

HARTFORD - A longtime bank official who embezzled more than a half-million dollars from Liberty Bank was sentenced Tuesday to 18 months in federal prison.

Mary Kuskey, 51, who now lives in Portland but who formerly lived in Middletown, pleaded guilty in May 2006 to a single count of bank embezzlement.

Kuskey had worked for Liberty Bank in a variety of positions from 1974 until 2005, when she was fired after the bank uncovered a complex scheme to divert bank funds for her personal use.

During her 31-year career with Liberty Bank, U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said, Kuskey steadily rose up through the hierarchy of the bank, from teller to assistant manager, manager and finally regional manager.

In 1995, she was promoted yet again, to the post of branch manager at Liberty's Durham branch.

Two years later, O'Connor said, Kuskey began her fall from grace.

From 1997-2001, Kuskey "created several fraudulent loans in the names of bank customers who had large deposit account balances," O'Connor said. But, she "kept the loan proceeds for her own use, he added.

She concealed the scheme by repaying the loans within 90 days, O'Connor said. That prevented the bank from sending the customers a loan statement, which might have revealed the flimflam.

To cover the existing loans, Kuskey created new loans in increasing amounts, the U.S. Attorney said. Eventually, Kuskey was able to generate more than $261,000 that she diverted for her own use.

But after four years of switching the loans, Kuskey abandoned that scheme and began a new and more ambitious scheme, O'Connor said.

She began making unauthorized withdrawals from the jumbo certificate of deposit account of a bank customer.

At first, she withdrew $261,244 to pay off the outstanding loans from her previous scheme. Then, O'Connor said, she went back to the same account and continued to make withdrawals that she diverted for her own use.

From January 2001 to May 2005, Kuskey "made unauthorized withdrawals totaling $497,792.26," O'Connor said.

But that required still another dizzying effort to conceal what she was doing, O'Connor said.

"The customer's CD accounts typically matured every 30 days," he explained, "and to induce the customer to roll over the CD into a new CD, Kuskey gave the customer a much higher interest rate than what the bank was offering."

"To conceal the scheme, Kuskey gave the customer false certificates and related documentation," which Kuskey fabricated.

Those false documents "reflected the inflated balance that the customer believed was in the account, based on the false interest rates," O'Connor said.

In addition to her guilty plea, Kuskey is also required to repay the bank for what she stole.

To date, O'Connor said, she has made restitution of $190,148. However, she still owes Liberty another $410,799 "in order to fulfill her restitution requirement," O'Connor said.

Once she completes her sentence, Kuskey will then still have to serve three years of supervised release under the sentence imposed Tuesday by District court Judge Christopher F. Droney.

O'Connor commended Liberty Bank for uncovering the fraud and for what he called the bank's "valuable assistance" with the subsequent FBI investigation.

Trio Convicted In Bank Robbery Scheme (FWST)

By Bryon Okada

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, February 7, 2007

FORT WORTH — James Edward Geske, Kevin Michael Smith and Alicia Nichole Frazier face up to life in federal prison without parole after a Fort Worth jury found them guilty of plotting to orchestrate three simultaneous bank robberies in downtown Hamilton, including using military explosives to blow up 15 police cars.

Geske, 27, was the ringleader of the plot that was planned in great detail during October and November. Smith, 37, and Frazier, 25, played lesser roles, but all are equally guilty of participating in the conspiracy to commit the crimes, the jury found.

All three were arrested on Nov. 8, the same day the bank plan was being finalized. On that day, Geske traded a stash of fake methamphetamine for guns with an undercover federal agent. The plan as a whole was largely brought down by two undercover law enforcement officers.

"The Arlington Police Department and ATF (Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives) and this jury took three dangerous criminals off the streets, as well as a cache of weapons," federal prosecutor Bret Helmer said. "The end result could have been catastrophic for a lot of people in Hamilton, Texas."

Defense attorneys attempted to portray their clients as small-time street characters who talked big but meant little.

The jury disagreed, taking two hours to bring back guilty verdicts on all four counts against the three defendants.

Geske, Smith and Frazier are scheduled to be sentenced at 9 a.m. May 25 in U.S. District Judge John McBryde's court.

Government Wants Former Coke Secretary Jailed (AP)

By HARRY R. WEBER

AP, February 7, 2007

ATLANTA - The government said in court papers Tuesday it believes a former Coca-Cola secretary convicted of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant should be jailed immediately because she poses a flight risk.

In a motion filed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta, Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said clothing, prescription medication, papers and other personal items were found in Joya Williams' Mustang during a search after a fire destroyed her apartment Friday.

The fire, which has been ruled accidental by local officials in Norcross, occurred nearly 90 minutes after the guilty verdict was reached in federal court in Atlanta.

"With no place to live, with no money, with a significant amount of debt, and with the prospect of a lengthy prison sentence, the defendant poses a serious risk of flight," Pak argued in the motion.

Pak also indicated that while local fire investigators deemed Friday's fire was caused accidentally by an unattended candle igniting some curtains in a bedroom of Williams' apartment, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives continues to investigate the incident.

"Residents from the Hunters Point apartment complex reported that they heard what sounded like an argument from Williams' apartment and items may have been thrown through her apartment windows," Pak wrote.

Pak also said that Williams made inconsistent statements to investigators regarding her location and actions during the fire.

He added, "Regardless of whether the fire was intentionally or accidentally set, the fact remains that the defendant no longer has a residence at which the pretrial release supervision can be maintained."

The government motion is seeking to force Williams to prove why she should not be remanded to the custody of federal marshals, and if she fails to do that, asks the court to order her jailed immediately.

Williams, who was out on bond during her trial, currently remains free pending sentencing.

Williams, 41, faces up to 10 years in prison for conspiring to steal trade secrets from Atlanta-based Coca-Cola in an effort to sell them to rival PepsiCo Inc. No sentencing date has been set.

Water Deal Exposes Secret Iraq Contracts (AP)

By Katherine Shrader And Allison Hoffman

WASHINGTON, (AP) -- CIA officers operating in northern Iraq bought drinking water from a bottling plant there for years prior to the 2003 invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein.

That changed soon afterward. A CIA officer handling logistics for the Middle East and other regions recommended that an American company provide water and other supplies, according to former government officials.

The U.S. contractor that benefited from the multimillion-dollar deal wasn't just anyone. The company had personal ties to the officer, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, who would soon leave his logistics post in Frankfurt, Germany, and move to Washington to become the CIA's third-ranking official.

In at least one written communication, a Baghdad CIA officer complained about the no-bid contract. According to one official, the officer believed the deal was simply unnecessary because safe water was available commercially but he was ignored.

The water contract, while small on the scale of the billions that flowed into Iraq, raises questions about why U.S. taxpayer dollars went to well-connected businessmen rather than Iraqis who could have benefited from a share of postwar reconstruction business. And the case provides a window into the murky world of covert government business arrangements.

Foggo retired from the CIA last year. He is now at the center of a federal investigation, nearing completion, into whether he improperly steered contracts to companies controlled by his best friend, San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes.

Federal prosecutors in San Diego are preparing to seek indictments against Foggo and Wilkes on charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy, two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press last week.

Those officials and others spoke on condition that they not be identified because the charges have not been finalized and because CIA contracting is classified. Justice Department and law enforcement officials in San Diego and Washington declined to comment.

Honest services fraud is a charge combining mail and wire fraud often used in public corruption cases involving officials who have engaged in a pattern of improper activities, such as accepting gifts, trips or promises of future employment from private individuals.

The probe of Foggo and Wilkes stems from a broader federal investigation involving at least five federal agencies into how associates of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham directed government business to a favored network of national security contractors. Cunningham, a San Diego Republican elected to eight terms in Congress, is currently serving more than eight years in jail for taking at least $2.4 million in bribes. Another defense contractor has pleaded guilty to paying some of them.

In June 2002, Wilkes created a government contractor called Archer Defense Technologies, which was registered to the address of his flagship, Wilkes Corp., in Poway, Calif. The company also used the name Liberty Defense Technologies. At the beginning of 2004, his nephew and apprentice, Joel Combs, formed a new company called Archer Logistics, run out of a small Virginia office.

Despite the short history of Wilkes' company, Foggo recommended that the CIA buy water from it, current and former officials said. He was a supervising officer at the CIA supply hub in Germany, and the purchasing officer there went along.

Foggo didn't tell the purchasing officer about his personal ties to Combs or Wilkes, a government official says. With CIA officers literally under fire and other large issues to deal with, the CIA station didn't put up a fight, former officials say.

The issue in the investigation isn't the price but that the contract was awarded without competitive bidding and that Foggo had an obligation to disclose his personal connections, according to these officials.

Foggo's former attorney publicly acknowledged before he died last summer that the investigation includes Archer, but he said his client had no idea that the company was associated with Wilkes. Foggo's current attorney, Mark MacDougall, declined to comment, as did Wilkes' attorney, Mark Geragos.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield declined to comment citing the investigation, which includes the spy agency's inspector general. "As a rule, we don't comment publicly about which firms may or may not have a contractual relationship with the agency," he said.

From the beginning of the Iraq invasion, the CIA was forced almost constantly to revise its game plan. Early predictions were that the CIA station set up in Baghdad would move to a peacekeeping mission by fall of 2003 and need less than 100 officers, with the Army handling most key functions.

Instead, the CIA had a station of more than 500 that fall, the former officials said. Sorting out where the water came from had never been a top priority, they recalled.

A veteran officer who served in Central America, Foggo rose through the ranks to become a leading logistics officer for the CIA based in Frankfurt, one of a few CIA bases of its kind in the world. In that position, he handled shipments of supplies on C-130 cargo planes to nearly a third of the CIA's overseas operations — outfits in Central Europe, Africa, the Balkans and the Middle East that required everything from food and water to phones and computers.

Foggo, 52, was described as a guy who could get things done. When the U.S.-led coalition invaded Iraq in 2003, Foggo was in charge of ensuring CIA personnel in the war zone had what they needed, including bottled water.

The officials say the CIA turned to Foggo's friends, including Wilkes and his nephew, Combs. Wilkes, also 52, was Foggo's best friend from high school, and the two football teammates named their sons after each other. Combs used an address at an office park called Thunderbolt Place in Chantilly, Va., which was also used by other Wilkes' companies. The space in a two-story brick office park has now been vacated.

The review of the logistics operations in Iraq did not begin until after Foggo had been tapped by then-CIA Director Porter Goss to be the agency's No. 3 — the executive director — who would run the agency's day-to-day operations.

Such a significant promotion for a logistics officer came as a surprise to many in the agency.

Observers said Foggo embraced the role. He started sending out memos to agency personnel, signed "Yours in Service." He had a nickname for everyone, and he could be seen glad-handing his way through lunch at the CIA's seventh-floor executive dining room.

He and Wilkes also dined at a Washington steakhouse at the foot of Capitol Hill frequented by lobbyists, which caught the attention of a House Intelligence Committee investigator looking into ties between defense contractors and Cunningham. Foggo and Wilkes kept a private wine locker at the restaurant stocked with Cunningham's favorite, a pricey California cabernet.

The meteoric rise ended with a crash.

Foggo retired from the agency in May under investigation by five agencies: the FBI, the IRS, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the CIA's inspector general and the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego. A local news helicopter circled his house in the Northern Virginia suburbs as agents sifted through his belongings.

Wilkes' business and personal fortunes have also suffered. In the past two months, his wife has filed for divorce, and he has defaulted on a $7.5 million personal mortgage loan. His company, the Wilkes Corp., defaulted on $12.1 million owed on another note.

Associated Press writer Allison Hoffman reported from San Diego.

Wider Death Penalty Sought (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, February 7, 2007

At least a half-dozen states are considering broadening the death penalty, countering a national trend toward scaling back its use.

Lawmakers have proposed legislation that would increase the range of crimes eligible for execution. In Texas and Tennessee, for example, legislators want to include certain child molesters who did not murder their victims.

"The hope is that these monsters will see that Texas is serious about protecting children," says Rich Parsons, spokesman for Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst. Dewhurst, a Republican, is working with state senators to draft legislation that would make repeat offenders subject to capital punishment in some cases. "If they understand they could face the ultimate punishment," they might "think twice," Parsons says.

Virginia is considering bills that would make accomplices to murder, as well as killers of judges and court witnesses, eligible for the death penalty.

"I'm a believer in the deterrent effect of the death penalty," says Republican Delegate Todd Gilbert, a state prosecutor who sponsored two of the measures. "I know a number of states are reconsidering their position on the death penalty. … I feel confident Virginia's system is set up to work."

Lawmakers or courts have temporarily halted all executions in 11 states in the past year, most of them over concerns that lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment, says Richard Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, which he says takes no position on the death penalty but has been critical of how it is applied.

In December, a convicted killer in Florida took 34 minutes to die and had chemical burns on his arms after a lethal injection procedure. After the execution, then-governor Jeb Bush created a commission to study possible improvements and halted executions until the commission releases its report.

Other states with proposals to expand the death penalty:

·Missouri. Gov. Matt Blunt said in his State of the State address last month that he wants a mandatory death penalty for the murder of law enforcement officers. Blunt, a Republican, says the state must protect its public servants and the death penalty would be a deterrent. "This is the type of crime that calls for the death penalty," he says.

Robert Blecker, a law professor at New York Law School who specializes in the death penalty, says the Supreme Court has found mandatory death sentences unconstitutional because they don't allow defendants to present mitigating evidence. Blunt says his measure will take that into account.

·Georgia. GOP state Rep. Barry Fleming has introduced a bill to allow a judge to impose the death sentence if at least nine of 12 jurors — not all 12, as now — voted for it.

DOJ_NMG_0129054

State Rep. Paul Ray, a Republican, introduced a bill to allow the death penalty for killing a child during abuse, sexual assault or kidnapping, even if prosecutors cannot prove intent to kill. He expects the House to vote later this week.

"We're going to send a message that if you kill our kids in Utah, we're going to kill you," he says. "In Utah, I don't think we use the death penalty enough."

6 City Police Officers Suspended (BSUN)

By Gus G. Sentementes

The Baltimore Sun, February 7, 2007

Six Baltimore police officers were suspended Tuesday as part of an internal affairs investigation into possible "irregularities" with their overtime pay, a department spokesman said.

The officers -- two sergeants and four detectives -- worked in criminal investigations in the department's Eastern District when they filed for overtime that is now being reviewed by internal affairs investigators, police said. One of the sergeants was recently transferred to the Northeastern District, police said.

Matt Jablow, a Police Department spokesman, declined to release the names of the officers or say how much overtime was in question.

He said that questions about their overtime -- which consisted of money paid out for court and investigative time -- arose as part of an internal audit last summer.

Their law enforcement powers have been suspended, but the officers will continue to work in administrative positions, Jablow said.

According to a document obtained by The Sun, the suspended officers are Sgt. Darryl Massey, Sgt. Raynard H. Jones, and detectives Sandra D. Forsythe, Dave P. Peckoo, Kerry D. Snead and Kevin R. Turner.

The suspensions come amid a push by the department this year to curtail overtime spending.

As of Dec. 31, the Police Department had spent $21 million on overtime -- more than twice the $8.7 million budgeted for fiscal year 2007, which ends June 30. The department regularly exceeds its allotted overtime, but some say it is because city leaders budget an unrealistically low figure each year.

Mayor Sheila Dixon recently pledged to reduce Police Department spending on overtime. In recent weeks, each of the city's nine police districts have been told to rein in overtime spending.

Department leaders have set a target of $30,000 in total officer overtime per two-week pay-period.

"I believe an allegation was made against these officers, and everybody should consider them innocent until proven guilty," said Paul M. Blair Jr., president of the city police union. "People shouldn't jump to conclusions just because allegations are made. It comes with the job. It comes with the job every day."

Blair said he was concerned about the impact that the reduction in overtime might have on public safety, since the department remains short about 165 officers.

CIVIL LAW:

Relatives Sue FBI, Say Club Sting Was Bungled (BERGREC)

By Douglass Crouse, STAFF WRITER

Bergen Record, February 7, 2007

Relatives of three of the four people gunned down in a Paterson after-hours club sued the federal government Monday, claiming the deaths resulted from a bungled FBI sting operation.

Three men and a woman were massacred inside the illegal gambling club during an early-morning robbery Dec. 14, 2005.

"The FBI violated their own policies on undercover cases: to make sure that the safety of unrelated civilians is not in jeopardy," said the families' attorney, Rosemarie Arnold. "You have a virtual casino operating in a known dangerous neighborhood without any security. That to me is an invitation to robbery."

Four co-defendants are now behind bars, with the Passaic County Prosecutor's Office preparing a death penalty case against the alleged gunman.

FBI officials have declined comment and did not return a call Monday.

Based on police files, the lawsuit says the FBI set up the sting four months before the shootings to investigate drugs and arms trafficking by the Latin Kings gang. It claims the agency paid a former convict $3,500 a month to run the business -- known as Kings Court -- atop a warehouse on Railroad Avenue, but failed to properly train or supervise him.

DOJ_NMG_0129055

The nine-count complaint filed in federal court in Newark names as defendants the U.S. government, three FBI agents and the four criminal defendants.

The victims' relatives say they hunger for accountability.

"I'm left wondering: Does the FBI realize what actions they set in motion when they opened this place?" said the sister of victim Tara Woods of West Paterson. "Somebody messed up and they have to be held accountable."

She asked that her name not be published for safety concerns.

Law enforcement sources say the club manager was a federal informant, and he had opened the club on the night of the shootings without notifying the FBI.

But the sister of Woods, a 29-year-old mother of two, isn't satisfied by that account.

"We want to know exactly what happened and why," she said. "This has devastated us. And that's one family. Multiply that effect by four."

Carmen Suarez of Paterson, who lived for 20 years with victim Ralph Hernandez, 53, said, "I want the people responsible for his death to pay."

Relatives of Jesus Antonio Gonzales, 31, also of Paterson, also are plaintiffs but could not be reached. The fourth victim was Johnny Melendez, 39, of Newark.

Investigators say the conspirators had envisioned an in-and-out robbery that would never get reported to police. Instead, they say, gunman David Baylor of Passaic snapped and shot the cowering victims point-blank.

"However solidified the [robbery] plan had been, at that point it went out the window," said John Latoracca, chief assistant prosecutor for Passaic County. "Baylor had effectively elevated the stakes a thousand times."

After the shootings, rumors spread quickly about FBI involvement in the illegal club.

Latoracca confirmed the club was the "subject of an undercover operation by the FBI." He was not aware of any armed guards, but said patrons were "wanded."

Baylor's death-penalty trial is tentatively set for September.

Baylor's attorney, Harley Breite, has attacked some of the state's witnesses as "people with lengthy criminal records."

"Is that the type of credible testimony we can rely upon to send somebody to death?" he said.

Baylor's co-defendants are Reginald "Khaddafi" Barris of Clifton; Beatriz Hernandez, 24, address unavailable, and Hamid Shabazz, 30, of Passaic.

All four have been indicted on felony murder, robbery and weapons charges.

Baylor, 27, and Barris, 25, are in the county jail in lieu of $5 million bail each. Shabazz is in prison for an unrelated robbery, and Hernandez is in undisclosed custody.

FBI Sued By Relatives Of Victims In Club Shooting (MH)

The Miami Herald, February 7, 2007

NEWARK, N.J. - A mishandled FBI sting at a Paterson after-hours club led to a massacre in which four people died, according to a lawsuit filed by some of their families.

The FBI failed to properly train or supervise the former inmate it paid $3,500 a month to operate the illegal casino, according to the lawsuit filed Monday in U.S. District Court.

"Kings Court" was opened in a warehouse to investigate weapons and drug trafficking by the Latin Kings gang four months before the fatal shootings, the lawsuit said.

"The FBI violated their own policies on undercover cases: to make sure that the safety of unrelated civilians is not in jeopardy," a lawyer for the families of three victims, Rosemarie Arnold, told The Record of Bergen County in Tuesday's editions. "You have a virtual casino operating in a known dangerous neighborhood without any security. That to me is an invitation to robbery."

Three men and a woman were shot to death inside the club during an early morning robbery on Dec. 14, 2005. The manager escaped the carnage, called 911, and said he worked for the FBI, according to a transcript of his call obtained by The Record of Bergen County and its sister paper, the Herald News of West Paterson.

An FBI spokesman, Special Agent Steven Siegel, on Tuesday declined to comment on the lawsuit or on whether the manager was working for the agency.

Four people were arrested and indicted on murder charges. Prosecutors said they will seek the death penalty for the accused gunman, David Baylor, 27, of Passaic.

Radio Star's Fatal Air Crash Blamed On Radar Lack (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 7, 2007

An air-traffic controller admitted Tuesday that he had no idea of a Cessna's location when he instructed its pilot to turn, a maneuver that less than two minutes later resulted in a midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others.

Testifying at a federal trial stemming from lawsuits filed by the families of the three victims, air-traffic controller Gregory Fowler said the crash of the two small aircraft would have been prevented if the Waukegan Regional Airport had been equipped with radar at the time.

A radar system was installed at the airfield five months after the February 2000 collision that killed Collins, a passenger in his Moravan Z242L plane and the student pilot at the controls of the Cessna 172P, Fowler said.

Fowler's testimony highlighted the first full day of testimony in the bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah. Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending the Federal Aviation Administration was responsible for the crash, even though the Waukegan airport is operated by a private company. Other defendants reached settlements before the trial, which is expected to last about two weeks.

Relatives of two victims also testified, including Ed Hock, who struggled to keep his composure as he spoke about his daughter, Sharon, the student pilot, who he said had a vibrant personality. Evan Luscher, 19, whose father, Herman, died in Collins' plane, said he thinks of his dad every day.

Attorneys for Collins played audiotapes of the transmissions between Fowler and the pilots in the minutes before the fatal crash.

Collins, 57, at the time Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality on WGN, could be heard calmly identifying his airplane before he announced: "Just had a mid-air."

WGN is owned by Tribune Co., which also owns the Chicago Tribune.

Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, and Hock's plane plummeted to a Zion street.

The planes were approaching the Waukegan tower in order to land, but a hazy sky made it difficult for the pilots to see one another and for Fowler to observe the planes, he said. The airfield is near Lake Michigan in the north suburb.

Under questioning by Kevin Durkin, a lawyer for Collins' widow, Christine, Fowler acknowledged it was important that Hock had Collins' plane in sight before she was instructed to turn her plane on the approach to the airfield.

Yet Fowler admitted that he asked Hock three separate times if she saw Collins' plane and each time she responded no, the last time seconds before he told her to make the turn.

"Have you passed the shoreline?" Fowler then asked.

"Gettin' there," the transcript quoted Hock as replying.

It was then that Fowler instructed Hock to turn the plane, even though under questioning he acknowledged that Hock's answer hadn't been precise enough for him to so act.

Durkin asked Fowler if he had issued that instruction "without having any real idea of where [Hock] was?"

"Correct," Fowler replied.

"And you couldn't see [Collins' plane]?" Durkin asked.

No, Fowler said.

Less than two minutes later, Collins' plane rear-ended Hock's Cessna, even though Collins was supposed to be the first to land.

Fowler, who then managed the tower, said radar would have given him "the tools" to prevent the crash.

On cross-examination by Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, Fowler agreed that the collision could have been avoided if Collins hadn't misreported his location seconds before Fowler instructed Hock to turn her plane.

The government has blamed Collins for the collision, saying he missed the mark by about 1? miles when he reported to the tower that he was "just crossing the shoreline."

"If Mr. Collins had been crossing the shoreline when he said he was, would this accident have happened?" Rosa asked.

"I don't believe it would have," Fowler replied.

But under questioning by another plaintiff's lawyer, Fowler acknowledged that if Collins had in fact been on the shoreline when he said he was, his plane "in all likelihood" would have been visible to Fowler about a minute and a half later, just before the collision.

"And you didn't see him?" asked Mark Fineberg, who represents the damaged hospital's insurer.

"No," Fowler said.

AmeriDebt Founder Accused Of Hiding Funds Meant For Debtors (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - GREENBELT, Maryland-The founder of a credit counseling firm accused of cheating thousands of debtors is hiding assets even though he agreed to contribute millions of dollars to help repay the debtors, a court-appointed receiver told a federal judge Tuesday.

The receiver, Robb Evans & Associates, wants Andris Pukke held in contempt of court, alleging the former head of now-defunct AmeriDebt is using friends and families to hide substantial assets - including an online betting venture, a California mansion, a development in Belize and bank accounts in Latvia.

Hiding the assets would violate the terms of a 2006 settlement with the Federal Trade Commission that set up a restitution fund of up to $35 million (â‚¬27 million). So far, only about $10 million (â‚¬7.7 million) of Pukke's money has been turned over to the FTC, which had sued him and AmeriDebt for allegedly charging customers $172 million (â‚¬133 million) in hidden fees.

"There has been utter lack of cooperation on Mr. Pukke's part," Gary Caris, an attorney for Rob Evans & Associates, told U.S. District Judge Peter Messitte in a hearing on the contempt request.

But in testimony Tuesday, Pukke claimed the attorney was overstating his control over money, such as the Latvian bank accounts held in his father's name. Pukke also said he no longer had a major stake in the Belize operation despite Caris' efforts to prove Pukke was still a part of the project.

AmeriDebt once was one of the largest U.S. firms meant to help debt-laden customers pay off their loans. But in its lawsuit, the FTC claimed AmeriDebt collected upfront fees that customers thought were going to pay down their debt but instead went to AmeriDebt. Pukke allegedly used that money, collected from about 300,000 people, to fund a lavish lifestyle.

The FTC and Pukke settled in January 2006 before the case was to go to trial. Pukke admitted no wrongdoing but agreed to disclose his assets for the restitution fund. The judge had already frozen Pukke's holdings a year earlier to keep him from hiding money.

Caris, however, claimed Pukke kept working on the project to build multimillion dollars homes near a Belize game preserve without telling the receiver, a project Caris estimated was worth $20 million (â‚¬15.5 million) as of July 2005.

Pukke said he invested $3 million (â‚¬2.3 million) in the deal, but that his participation was limited after he declared personal bankruptcy in 2005.

He also disputed allegations that he controlled the Latvian accounts, even though Caris detailed several payments of $100,000 (â‚¬77,190) to pay Pukke's legal fees. Pukke said he asked, not directed, his father to make the payments.

Caris questioned Pukke about $3 million Pukke's companies spent in the late 1990s to pay for advertising at an online gambling company run by a friend. It later generated millions of dollars when it was sold to a British firm. Pukke said he never had a stake in the gambling venture, saying his friend repaid him in ways that left no paper trail, including large sums of cash.

"It never crossed your mind why you were fronting millions of dollars for advertising?" asked Caris.

"That's correct," Pukke replied.

The receiver also alleges that Pukke's childhood friend, Peter Baker, helped Pukke conceal his ownership of a $6.45 million (â‚¬5 million) Laguna Beach, California, house. Baker also faces a possible contempt charge.

Pukke's lawyer said Pukke merely advised Baker on the investment, but did not take part.

The FTC hopes the receiver can find more money for the restitution fund. Of the $10 million that has been disbursed so far, much of it has gone to settle claims against Pukke by the IRS and to cover attorney fees for a related class action lawsuit.

Lucy Morris, an FTC attorney, said she expects more of Pukke's assets will be uncovered and put into the fund. She said only about $4 million (â‚¬3.1 million) currently remains for restitution, an amount too small to allow any substantial payments to former AmeriDebt customers.

"There is not enough in the fund at this point to make a redress program cost effective," she said.

Two Hospitals Allege RICO Violations By UnitedHealth (AP)

By Joshua Freed

MINNEAPOLIS - Two New York hospitals said they sued insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. on Tuesday alleging "a pattern of racketeering activity."

The lawsuit by Flushing Hospital Medical Center and Jamaica Hospital Medical Center was brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law and filed in federal court in the Eastern District of New York, according to Idan Sims, a spokesman for the hospitals. It claims at least $50 million in punitive damages, along with millions more in actual damages. The same hospitals sued under a similar set of facts last year in state court in New York.

Both lawsuits claim UnitedHealth cost them business by repeatedly telling patients that Flushing was not in its network and that Oxford Health, which was bought by UnitedHealth, did the same thing to patients at Jamaica Hospital. The lawsuit also claims Oxford postponed signing contracts with both hospitals to avoid paying them higher negotiated fees.

The new lawsuit claims that UnitedHealth has been providing inaccurate information about who's in its network at other hospitals, too, including a 2003 case related to a health plan for New York civil service employees, and similar allegations by the Nebraska Department of Insurance.

"This behavior persists to this day. And the consequence of that is the patients pay more for the services that they purchased in their health care coverage," said David Rosen, chief executive of Flushing and Jamaica hospitals as well as their parent company, MediSys Health Network.

He said that just last month UnitedHealth denied a patient's appeal for in-network coverage for a surgical procedure at Flushing, and billed the patient for $1,100 more than she should have had to pay.

"It's $1,100 on the case I just described, and $1,000 on the next case. These are things that are inappropriately enriching the company," he said.

Rosen said the federal case would supercede the state case, which he said was headed for arbitration.

UnitedHealth spokesman Tyler Mason pointed out that both hospitals ultimately remained in the network. He said he had not seen the new lawsuit, but said the company believes arbitration is the best way to work out the dispute.

All Parties In Jet-noise Lawsuits Sent To Mediation (VAPILOT)

By Susan E. White, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, February 7, 2007

VIRGINIA BEACH - A federal judge Tuesday ordered all parties involved in nearly 2,100 jet-noise lawsuits back to mediation.

Judge Victor J. Wolski of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims in Washington set a tentative date in September for a two-week trial for the first group of lawsuits, should negotiations fail.

Wolski also granted a motion by the Justice Department that the court not review a recently submitted report from plaintiffs' lawyers, which included details of the original settlement agreement.

Government attorneys argued that the information was improperly disclosed and could potentially sway the court if the lawsuits went to trial.

At stake is a proposed

$38 million deal that was tentatively reached in October between the federal government and 2,098 homeowners who live near Oceana Naval Air Station in Virginia Beach and Fentress Naval Auxiliary Landing Field in Chesapeake. The median payment to homeowners who agreed to the deal would have been $5,000.

The property owners sued between 2001 and 2004, claiming that the arrival of the Navy's F/A-18 Hornets in 1998 and 1999 subjected their homes to substantially louder noise and devalued their property.

Appraisers said the plaintiffs' properties did not appreciate as fast as similar properties outside jet-noise zones. Homeowners said this resulted in the government taking their property without compensation.

On Monday, plaintiffs' lawyers said they had gathered the necessary signatures of support for the initial settlement.

Then, they said, they recently learned that government attorneys were demanding a change in the deal to give plaintiffs who sold their homes after July 1999 less money than other property owners.

Plaintiffs' lawyers said the government is trying to renege on the initial agreement.

Plaintiffs' attorneys did not return phone calls Tuesday.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman with the Justice Department, said the government was pleased with the court's order.

In a statement, Magnuson said "b y granting the government's request to appoint a mediator, the United States remains hopeful that the parties can reach agreement on the terms still in dispute and resolve this case without further litigation."

Review Lays Out Lags In State Hospital Improvements (AP)

By Lisa Rathke, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

MONTPELIER, Vt. -- The state hospital is behind in improving patient treatment, assessment, discharge and planning but has made progress in other areas, as part of a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice, according to a six-month review.

The report by two out-of-state psychiatrists outlines numerous areas where the psychiatric hospital was not in compliance with the terms of the four-year settlement.

"This is the first time that we're going through this and we'll be going through this again and every time we should in be greater compliance," said Michael Hartman, the new deputy commissioner for mental health. "Obviously if there weren't problems then we wouldn't be in this place in the first place."

The 70-page report released Tuesday noted progress in the hospital's reduced use of restraint and seclusion of patients, improvements to the building, creation of a full-time psychiatric team, hiring a staff neurologist, working with the University of Vermont medical school and certain areas of training, Hartman said.

But the report said the hospital needs a more organized system to better integrate documentation, treatment, assessment, use of medicine and therapy.

"We can hit timelines but a lot of time the content of that paperwork is not up to the criteria that they would like us to meet," said Hartman.

The documentation may not go deep enough, be updated or connect the different levels of treatment.

"In some areas we have significant gaps," he said.

The Justice Department investigated the hospital in September 2004 after the facility lost its federal certification and millions of dollars in funding following two patient suicides.

The DOJ found the hospital used excessive seclusion and restraints and provided inadequate psychiatric and psychological services.

Rep. Anne Donahue, R-Northfield, who has long pushed for a changes at the state hospital, said the report recognizes the need for a shift in culture at the hospital and points out that medication is not being monitored for adverse affects and effectiveness.

"It's a sickening recognition that what I've been saying for the past year is taking place," she said. "I'd much rather be dead wrong."

The state has different deadlines to meet each of the settlement goals.

Human Services Secretary Cynthia LaWare said the systemic nature of some of the improvements will take a significant amount of time to complete. Certain improvements would be hastened by replacing the hospital.

"It's critically important that we move forward with the next phase of more in depth planning for a replacement hospital," she said.

New Task Force Formed To Fight Human Trafficking (KLAS)

KLAS-TV, February 7, 2007

"She told me dogs have more rights than you," said Esperanza.

"She sold me to him for $200," said Maria.

Terry Miller is the Southern Nevada director for the newly launched Anti-Trafficking League Against Slavery -- ATLAS for short.

Local agencies announced Tuesday morning a massive task force has been formed, aimed at combating the problem of human trafficking.

Dozens of agencies, including Metro, Henderson police, Nevada child seekers, Salvation Army, the AGS office, TSA, and the FBI are working together to identify people who are bring forced to work in the sex industry or as laborers.

The federal government says Southern Nevada is one of 17 comunities at high risk for human trafficking.

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said, "Trafficked victims are often difficult to identify and therefore we must work together in our communities and neighborhoods to identify and assist those among us who may be victims of these horrible crimes."

The Department of Justice granted Southern Nevada $370,000 to launch a task force to fight the problem.

Human trafficking is what many call a modern day form of slavery. It hits so close to home it could be a brothel next door or the landscapers who maintain your yard. They are children, women, and men -- coerced or kidnapped.

"She sold me to him for $200," said Maria.

Some were taken to other communities or other countries while some, like Esperanza, are forced to work in sweat shops.

"She told me dogs have more rights than you," said Esperanza.

Others, like Maria, are exploited in the sex industry.

"He told me that he had bought me. That I was his slave. He paid $200 for me, and I was there to do whatever he want," said Maria.

Like many other trafficking victims, the psychological chains can be more powerful than any walls or locks.

"He threatened me. He hit me and tells me that he's going to go and kill my family, which was killing me little by little," said Maria.

Maria is a survivor of human trafficking. She is also an advocate for the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking or CAST for short. Based in California, CAST uses a video to alert people to the problem of human trafficking. Kay Buck is the executive director.

"Trafficking is such an underground crime that often times traffickers go undetected by law enforcement and what we have learned as a nation is that we need to employ very innovative strategic ways to find more victims," said Buck.

Before now, local law enforcement did not have a division targeting human traffickers. CAST is one agency that uses educational tools like a video, to help train officers in identifying traffickers and their victims.

Terry Miller is the Southern Nevada director for the newly launched Anti-Trafficking League Against Slavery -- ATLAS for short.

"Victims need to be rescued," said Miller.

Her job is to work with dozens of local agencies to prosecute traffickers and help the victims become survivors.

"They're a very unique victim. They often times need legal representation from the immigration clinics. They need medical attention, they need dental attention they need social services, and therapeutic services, housing, food clothing," said Miller.

Around the world, more than 800,000 people are victims of human trafficking. As many as 18,000 are in the United States. Some are right in our backyard.

Buck said, "You have to remember that in most cases, survivors of trafficking have nothing more than the clothes on their back. So it's important that we have safe, safe shelter to help them heal from the trauma and also help them become better witnesses for the case."

Now that CAST has helped train Southern Nevada's first responders, the Anti-Trafficking League Against Slavery will work to educate the public. Then everyone can work to help people like Maria and Esperanza.

Victim advocates say it is important to understand children involved in prostitution are considered human trafficking victims, not simply child prostitutes.

They say anyone under the age of 18 being pimped or exploited in the sex industry is a trafficking victim, even if they are working in their own neighborhood.

Fellow Inmates Beat An Imprisoned Border Patrol Agent (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

One of two Border Patrol agents who were sentenced to a decade in federal prison for the shooting of a Mexican drug smuggler in Texas was beaten by five fellow inmates at a medium-security prison at Yazoo City, Miss., lawmakers and members of his family said Tuesday.

Fellow inmates surrounded Ignacio Ramos on Saturday night and struck him with their fists and prison work boots, said his father-in-law, Joe Loya of El Paso, Texas. Family members learned of the attack Monday when they reached Ramos by phone to celebrate his 38th birthday, Loya said.

Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., one of a group of lawmakers who are seeking presidential pardons for Ramos and fellow agent Jose Compean, said prison officials had confirmed the assault and were investigating, according to Jones' office.

Public affairs officers at the U.S. Bureau of Prisons didn't comment on the case immediately. Prison officials told Jones' office that a doctor had examined Ramos, who had bruises and abrasions.

Reports of the incident circulated on the Internet and accelerated grass-roots efforts that already were under way on behalf of the two agents. Ramos and Compean's supporters contend that overzealous prosecutors victimized them, but federal authorities say the two abused their authority and were properly sentenced.

An El Paso jury found them guilty in a Feb. 17, 2005, shooting incident involving Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who was trying to flee back into Mexico after abandoning a van near Fabens, Texas, that contained 743 pounds of marijuana. The agents fired a total of 15 shots at Aldrete-Davila, who was struck once in the buttocks and escaped into Mexico.

An investigation found that the agents had attempted to dispose of empty shell casings and had filed a false report. They told authorities that they'd thought Aldrete-Davila was armed.

Loya, in a telephone interview, said Ramos had told his family that a group of inmates surrounded his bedside in the dormitory-like facility where they were being held and kicked him in the head, face and mouth. The attack occurred after inmates watched an episode of "America's Most Wanted" that featured the shooting case, Loya said.

Ramos identified only one of his assailants but thought that the group included illegal immigrants who were serving criminal sentences for drug trafficking and other offenses, Loya said.

"They were able to identify him," Loya said. "A bunch of them just ganged up on him while he was sleeping."

After the attack, Loya said, a fellow inmate took Ramos to security guards. He was placed in isolation, away from the other prisoners, Loya said.

Former Border Agent Assaulted In Prison (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

A former U.S. Border Patrol agent sentenced with his partner to prison for shooting a drug smuggling suspect suffered "minor" injuries when he was assaulted Saturday night by fellow inmates at a federal prison in Mississippi, the White House said yesterday.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, reading a statement from a Bureau of Prisons official at the Federal Correctional Complex in Yazoo City, Miss., said a "thorough investigation" has been ordered into the incident.

Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, surrendered to federal authorities Jan. 17 to begin 11- and 12-year prison sentences, respectively, for shooting the suspect in the buttocks after he abandoned a van with 743 pounds of marijuana along the Mexico border in Texas.

Ramos was sent to Mississippi and Compean to the Federal Correctional Institution in Elkton, Ohio.

In the one-paragraph statement, bureau spokesman Charles Smith said that Ramos reported to prison officials at 10:15 p.m. Saturday, that he had been assaulted and that an evaluation by the facility's medical staff determined that he sustained "some bruises and abrasions."

"The injuries sustained were minor in nature," Mr. Smith said. "Inmate Ramos was subsequently placed in the special housing unit, pending a thorough investigation of the incident. He will remain in the special housing unit until the conclusion of this investigation. No further information is available at this time."

Spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said in Washington that the bureau has "a long history of safely housing sentenced law-enforcement officers in general population," adding that the assault occurred immediately after the airing of a television show that described Ramos' case.

"It is regrettable that Mr. Ramos was assaulted, and the Bureau of Prisons will take appropriate actions to determine an appropriate housing status and ensure his ongoing safety," she said. "The Bureau of Prisons is vigorously investigating the matter and will pursue all appropriate sanctions against the assailants."

Rep. Duncan Hunter, a California Republican who has been critical of the government's prosecution of the agents, said the incident "clearly demonstrates the severe risk involved with incorporating Border Patrol agents into general prison populations.

"An overwhelming number of federal inmates are non-U.S. citizens who have been apprehended by the Border Patrol," Mr. Hunter said. "The danger to agents Compean and Ramos was immediately apparent, and the attack against agent Ramos could have been prevented."

Last month, Mr. Hunter recommended that the agents be segregated. He said he had been assured that they would be removed from the general population and that close attention was being paid to their personal safety.

Mr. Hunter called on President Bush yesterday to investigate the attack and order Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin's termination "should it be ascertained that the proper precautions were not taken."

Compean's wife, Patty, said her husband was offered a choice of general population or isolation, and chose isolation for his safety.

"Last week we were offered a chance for him to be placed in the general population, which we rejected immediately as a family, because of the high risk and fear for his safety," she said. "This attack only reinforces why they must be kept isolated from a prison's general population."

Former Border Patrol Agent Convicted Of Shooting Drug Smuggler Beaten By Fellow Prison Inmates, Authorities Say (FINDLAW/AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - EL PASO, Texas-A former U.S. Border Patrol agent who was convicted of shooting a drug smuggling suspect and then lying about it has been beaten by fellow inmates in prison.

Prison officials on Tuesday confirmed assertions by a congressman and relatives of Ignacio Ramos. He was attacked Saturday night after his case was described on the TV show "America's Most Wanted," the officials said.

Ramos suffered minor cuts and bruises, U.S. Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0129062

Ramos has been moved to the special housing unit at the medium-and low-security federal prison in Yazoo City, Mississippi, where he is serving his sentence, Billingsley said.

The convictions of Ramos and fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean sparked outcry from critics who argued that the men were merely doing their job defending the border against criminals.

Republican U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, a vocal supporter of the agents and opponent of illegal immigration, criticized the Bush administration Tuesday for failing to protect Ramos and demanded a full presidential pardon for the two men.

"Not only did the administration choose the side of a foreign dope runner over the agents who stopped him from smuggling a load of drugs into the county - now they've failed to protect that agent while his case is on appeal," he said in a statement.

The incident is being investigated, and the four inmates believed to have been involved have been separated from other inmates, Billingsley said.

Ramos and Compean, who reported to prison in January, were each sentenced to more than a decade behind bars. Compean is serving his sentence at the Elkton Federal Correctional Institution in Ohio; no problems have been reported with his detention.

The agents were convicted last year of shooting Osvaldo Aldrete Davila in 2005 near El Paso and then trying to cover up the incident. Davila was shot once in the buttocks.

Ramos' wife, Monica Ramos, told The Associated Press on Tuesday that her husband described being attacked late Saturday, when he "let his guard down." She said the attackers kicked and stomped him for several minutes.

He was able to identify one man in the group, Monica Ramos said.

Ex-Border Patrol Agent In Prison For Shooting Mexican Drug Runner Assaulted By Inmates (FOX)

By Liza Porteus

Fox News, February 7, 2007

One of two former Border Patrol agents sentenced to more than a decade in prison for shooting and wounding a suspected Mexican drug smuggler was beaten by a group of inmates last weekend, a Texas congressman confirmed Tuesday to FOXNews.com.

Ignacio Ramos, who was transferred to the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi last month to begin serving his 12-year sentence for the February 2005 shooting of Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, was placed in a special housing unit after the incident pending an investigation, according to T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council.

"We received verbal confirmation from the prison folks that he was assaulted and went to the infirmary and was treated for injuries," Rep. Ted Poe, R-Texas, told FOXNews.com, adding that he has requested a written report of the incident.

Another agent, Jose Compean, is serving 11 years in another facility for the same border shooting.

Prison authorities, in a statement issued Monday, said that Ramos reported to the staff on Saturday around 10:15 p.m. ET that he was assaulted and that he sustained some 'minor' bruises and abrasions, Bonner said.

Some members of Ramos' family claim the assault happened after the airing of an "America's Most Wanted" segment featuring both Ramos and Compean. They say the attack happened after Ramos fell asleep.

"Nacho was assaulted Saturday night by about five illegal immigrants who were yelling at him in Spanish, 'Maten a la migra' — which means 'kill the Border Patrol agent,'" one family member said, according to Grassfire.org, a group that has petitioned President Bush to pardon the two agents and has been working with the agents' families.

Grassfire.org and Ramos' family dispute the prison report saying he suffered minor injuries. Grassfire.org in a press release says Ramos suffered "multiple and severe injuries." The release also said that a family member claims Ramos' attackers beat him with repeated blows and kicks and that he suffered wounds to his back, shoulder, arms and head. There also is concern from Ramos' family that he was not given medical treatment immediately after the incident and may not have received medical attention for up to 48 hours, the group said.

"Our government has betrayed these agents," said Grassfire president Steve Elliott. "And now they have put these men in mortal danger. I am frightened for the lives of these two family men. This is beyond outrage, and I am calling on grassroots Americans to express their outrage directly to the White House — demanding the president pardon agents Ramos and Compean before it's too late."

Bonner said Ramos believes that he was assaulted by four or five people and that his injuries are more than 'minor."

"I believe him more than I believe the Department of Justice and its attempt to minimize this," Bonner said. "After all, this is the same Department of Justice that's tried to cover up the facts surrounding the" case, he added.

The two agents' supporters — which include a slew of lawmakers on Capital Hill — claim the Justice Department and prosecutor Johnny Sutton did not appropriately handle the case.

DOJ_NMG_0129063

Ramos and Compean were found guilty by a jury of not only shooting Aldrete-Davila, but also of trying to cover up the incident. Supporters say it was wrong for Sutton to go after the border agents and not the drug dealer who was given immunity for testifying against them, and that the Justice Department has been less than forthcoming about certain facts surrounding the case.

The transcripts of the trial have not yet been released by the court.

In response to the reports of the prison assault, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., wrote to President Bush requesting an investigation into the incident. The letter also requested that Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin be discharged from his position if it's discovered that the proper precautions were not taken to protect Ramos.

"Placing these two agents in general population, especially when assuring Congress it would not happen, constitutes an enormous dereliction of duty by the Administration and the Bureau of Prisons," said the Feb. 6 letter to Bush. "The families of agents Compean and Ramos deserve an immediate response. Further, please ensure that segregation from general population occurs immediately."

On Jan. 17, Hunter requested that both agents be put in isolation for their own safety. He and others were concerned that if jailed with many of the illegal immigrants and drug runners they helped put away, the safety and well-being of Ramos and Compean would be threatened.

"The assault against agent Ramos clearly demonstrates the severe risk involved with incorporating Border Patrol agents into general prison populations," Hunter said in a statement Tuesday. "An overwhelming number of federal inmates are non U.S. citizens who have been apprehended by the Border Patrol. The danger to agents Compean and Ramos was immediately apparent and the attack against agent Ramos could have been prevented."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., said he spoke to several of Ramos' family members Monday night. The Ramos family wasn't aware of the situation until late Monday, when they called him to wish him well on his 38th birthday. Ramos told his family that he was attacked by five men who beat him severely for being a former law enforcement agent.

Tancredo said one of the assailants has been identified by Ramos and is now being charged with assault.

"The administration has for too long turned their back on law enforcement and left them to fend for themselves," Tancredo said. "These men have been the victims of what the Bush administration's border enforcement policy has always been. Mr. President, pardon these men now."

Bonner said Ramos likely asked to be put in general population because when in isolation, inmates are only allowed one phone call a month. Isolated prisoners also normally are in lockdown for 23 hours a day and only allowed out for one hour.

"Why they couldn't bend that rule given the fact they have law enforcement agent in custody … you kind of go stir crazy" in isolation, Bonner said.

"I don't blame him [Ramos], I blame the folks in charge for not being reasonable about that. One phone call a month sounds like punishment to me for someone who's been acting up. But here's a guy you're putting in isolation because you need to protect him."

Poe agreed, saying that it's Ramos' choice whether he wants to be put in isolation or general population, but wherever he is, it's the job of the federal government and the prison to ensure his safety.

"It's just another example that the federal government doesn't protect Border Patrol agents on the border and doesn't protect them in prison," Poe said.

"The prison authorities, especially the federal prison system, are experts at protecting inmates from harm from other inmates ... they've been doing this for years. Why aren't they protecting Ramos?"

Poe, who said he speaks to the wives of Compean and Ramos regularly, said Compean is in isolation. According to the Federal Bureau of Prisons, Compean is serving his sentence at the Federal Correctional Institution in Elkton, Ohio, a low-security facility housing male offenders.

Appeals Court Sends Wal-Mart Women Bias Case To Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest private employer, must face a class-action lawsuit alleging as many as 1.5 million female employees were discriminated against in pay and promotions.

The ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upholds a 2004 federal judge's decision to let the United States' largest class-action employment discrimination lawsuit go to trial, possibly exposing the Bentonville, Arkansas-based retailing powerhouse to billions of dollars (euros) in damages.

"Plaintiff's expert opinions, factual evidence, statistical evidence and anecdotal evidence present significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination and support plaintiff's contention that female employees nationwide were subjected to a common pattern and practice of discrimination," the court wrote in a 2-1 decision.

Wal-Mart said it would ask the court to rehear the case with the same three-judge panel or with 15 judges, a move likely to idle the case for months. Tuesday's ruling came 18 months after the case was argued.

"This is one step of what is going to be a long process," Wal-Mart attorney Theodore Boutrous Jr. said. "We are very optimistic of obtaining relief from this ruling."

He said Wal-Mart's own review found no significant disparity in pay between men and women at 90 percent of its stores.

Wal-Mart, which currently employs 1.3 million workers, claimed that the conventional rules of class action suits should not apply in the case because its 3,400 stores, including Sam's Club warehouse outlets, operate like independent businesses, and that the company did not have a policy of discriminating against women.

U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins, the San Francisco trial court judge who said the case could proceed, had ruled that anecdotal evidence warranted a class-action trial. Wal-Mart took the case to the San Francisco-based appeals court.

Jenkins said if companywide gender discrimination is proven at trial, Wal-Mart could be forced to pay billions of dollars (euros) to women who earned less than their male counterparts. Jenkins rejected as "impractical" Wal-Mart's suggestion of having individual hearings for each plaintiff and he planned to use a statistical formula to compensate the women if they won.

Wal-Mart said the judge's scenario was an unprecedented denial of its rights and sought to dismiss the case. The company said women who allege discrimination could file lawsuits against individual stores.

The women's lawyers said the idea was ridiculous, and would clog the federal judiciary.

"Although size of this class action is large, mere size does not render a case unmanageable," Judge Harry Pregerson wrote for the majority, which upheld Jenkins' decision in its entirety.

But Judge Andrew Kleinfeld wrote in a dissent that women should perhaps file individual lawsuits to safeguard Wal-Mart from paying those who do not deserve money, and would also ensure women get the compensation they deserve.

The appellate court's decision, he wrote, "threatens the rights of women injured by sex discrimination. And it threatens Wal-Mart's rights."

Brad Seligman, one of the attorneys who represented the women suing Wal-Mart, said the decision would hurt the company's reputation.

"No amount of PR by Wal-Mart is going to allow it to deal with its legacy of discrimination," Seligman said.

David Nassar, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, a group critical of Wal-Mart policies, said the decision vindicates "victims of the company's illegal and immoral gender discrimination."

David Nassar, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, a group critical of Wal-Mart policies, said the decision vindicates the "victims of the company's illegal and immoral gender discrimination."

Wal-Mart shares rose 6 cents to close at $48.58 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Wal-Mart Loses Bid To Block Group Bias Suit (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

A federal appeals court ruled yesterday that the largest sex discrimination lawsuit in U.S. history could proceed as a class action against Wal-Mart, which is accused of paying female workers less than men and giving them fewer promotions.

The ruling will allow about 2 million women who have worked for Wal-Mart since 1998 to seek compensation for discrimination as a group.

Wal-Mart said it will ask the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco to reconsider its decision. Barring that, the company will ask the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn the certification. A lower court originally said the case could proceed as a class action in June 2004, and the company first appealed the decision in August 2005.

"We think its analysis is much too deferential to plaintiffs and erred in not taking into account Wal-Mart's evidence," said Theodore J. Boutrous Jr., an attorney for Wal-Mart. He said the court's ruling does not address the merits of the plaintiffs' claims, but whether the case meets the technical requirements to move forward as a class action.

The 2-to-1 ruling took no position on the case's merits, but agreed with the lower court ruling that the case Dukes v. Wal-Mart, originally filed by six women in 2001, could proceed as a class action against the retailer.

With nearly 2 million women, the lawsuit is the nation's largest sex discrimination case filed against a business. Most large discrimination cases are settled out of court. The suit claims that Wal-Mart's female employees receive lower pay and fewer promotions than male employees. But Wal-Mart's lawyers argued that there is no pattern of discrimination.

The women who filed suit are represented by the Impact Fund, a nonprofit group in Berkeley, Calif.

"No amount of PR or spin is going to allow Wal-Mart to avoid facing its legacy of discrimination," Brad Seligman, a lawyer and executive director of the Impact Fund, said in an interview. "Now two courts have ruled this trial should go forward. I expect they will attempt to further appeal, but I have great confidence the women will get their day."

A class-action lawsuit allows a small number of plaintiffs to sue on behalf of a much larger group in a similar situation.

The judge in the original case ruled that the attorneys for the six named women presented sufficient evidence for a class-action suit, calling it "largely uncontested descriptive statistics which show that women working in Wal-Mart stores are paid less than men in every region, that pay disparities exist in most job categories, that the salary gap widens over time even for men and women hired into the same jobs at the same time, that women take longer to enter into management positions, and that the higher one looks in the organization, the lower the percentage of women."

The company has two opportunities to overturn the decision. It will first ask the three-judge panel to reconsider yesterday's ruling and a panel of more than a dozen Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals judges to rehear the panel decision. If the court does not overturn its decision, the company will petition the U.S. Supreme Court.

"And then we have a trial, which is where we think we're headed," said Joseph M. Sellers, a Washington-based civil rights and employment lawyer, who represents the plaintiffs. "What Wal-Mart has tried to do so far is derail the case procedurally. The evidence, we think, is very strong. We have a number of clients who would like to have their day in court."

The company said its stores are mostly run by managers who have autonomy over hiring, pay and promotion. Boutrous argued that decisions by thousands of managers at 3,400 stores during a six-year period were "highly individualized and cannot be tried in one fell swoop in a nationwide class action."

Richard Drogin, a statistician at California State University at East Bay hired by the plaintiffs, said that it took women an average of 4.38 years from the date of hire to be promoted to assistant manager, while it took men 2.86 years. It took 10.12 years, on average, for women to become managers compared with 8.64 years for men. He also found that female managers made an average salary of $89,280 a year, while men in the same position earned an average of $105,682 a year. The results for hourly workers show that women were paid 6.7 percent less than men in comparable positions.

Several business groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have filed amicus briefs calling for a reversal of the class certification.

In 1996, Texaco paid a $176.1 million settlement on behalf of black employees who sued for racial discrimination. Home Depot settled a sex discrimination class-action suit in 1997 for $104 million. That same year, Publix Super Markets paid $81.5 million for discriminating against female workers. Coca-Cola paid $192.5 million in 2000 to employees who sued for racial discrimination. Morgan Stanley agreed to pay $54 million in 2004 to settle claims it underpaid and did not promote women, and a few days later, aircraft manufacturer Boeing agreed to pay up to $72.5 million to settle similar allegations.

Wal-Mart Faces Sex Bias Lawsuit (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Wal-Mart on Tuesday lost a bid to block the biggest employment lawsuit in US history after a federal appeals court ruled that at least 1.6m current and former female employees could sue the company as a group.

The ruling, by a narrowly divided panel of the ninth circuit federal appeals court in California, upheld a lower court ruling granting class-action status to a lawsuit accusing Wal-Mart of paying women less than men and promoting them less often. The plaintiffs include almost all women who worked at Wal-Mart stores from December 1998 to the present.

“Expert opinions, factual evidence, statistical evidence and anecdotal evidence present significant proof of a corporate policy of discrimination,” the panel said in its 2-1 ruling.

The US Chamber of Commerce condemned the ruling. “The suit includes a hodgepodge of claims, it’s huge, it’s unmanageable, and it’s difficult if not impossible to defend,” said Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, the chamber’s legal arm. “Class actions like this are almost extortionate.”

Though the women still have to prove their claims in a trial, the decision to allow the lawsuit to proceed as a class action could substantially increase pressure on Wal-Mart to settle, legal experts said. But Wal-Mart said on Tuesday it would appeal the ruling to the full appeals court and if necessary to the US Supreme Court. “This is just one step in a long process,” said Theodore Boutrous, of the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, who will handle Wal-Mart’s appeal.

Judge Andrew Kleinfeld, who dissented from the ruling, said it violated Wal-Mart’s constitutional right to due process. “Plaintiffs’ only evidence of sex discrimination is that around two thirds of Wal-Mart employees are female, but only about one third of its managers are female,” he wrote, adding “not everybody wants to be a Wal-Mart manager.”

The Wal-Mart suit is seen as a test case of the rules for “certifying” a class action lawsuit – the quintessentially American kind of legal action designed to empower individuals by allowing them to sue in groups.

The Wal-Mart plaintiffs argue that they should be able to sue as a group, claiming that even though individual store managers had broad discretion over pay and promotion decisions for the women concerned, the pervasive corporate culture of Wal-Mart has promoted sexism throughout the company.

Final Teen Gets Probation In Long Beach Hate Crime (LAT)

By Tami Abdollah, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

A black teenager was sentenced to probation in the Long Beach hate attack today, the last of a group to be punished in the Halloween night incident.

Judge Gibson Lee put Allyson Stone, who is now 18, on probation, ordered 250 hours of community service and racial tolerance training.

The sentence was similar to that given the eight other teenagers convicted in the attack. Most of the youths also received a sentence of house arrest.

One of the 10 defendants was acquitted in the case.

Darrell Goss, the lawyer for Stone, said he has already filed an appeal, the first in what is expected to be continuing legal action from the attack on a street in the Bixby Knolls neighborhood of Long Beach.

Laura Schneider, 19, Loren Hyman, 21, and Michelle Smith, 19 were injured in the attack.

Dallas Has 3 Months To Fix Jail (DMN)

By Kevin Krause, The Dallas Morning News Kkrause@dallasnews.com

The Dallas Morning News, February 7, 2007

Understaffing may force county to pay millions to send inmates elsewhere

Dallas County officials soon may have to shut the doors to their crowded and understaffed jail and pay millions of dollars to send inmates to other counties if they can't get the inmate population under control.

The county has three months to meet the state's minimum staffing requirement of one guard per 48 inmates – something it has consistently been unable to do – or the state probably will order the crowded jail not to admit any more prisoners.

If that happens, the county would have to pay to transport and house its prisoners in other jails across the state, at an annual cost of up to $18 million.

Such a scenario would result in "mayhem," Chief Public Defender Brad Lollar said. Defense attorneys may not have time to visit clients in distant jails, and inmates would have to be bused back and forth to court hearings.

The Texas Commission on Jail Standards summoned county and sheriff's officials to its meeting last Friday for a status update on the troubled jail. The commission staff had been prepared to recommend the remedial order that day to close the jail but reconsidered after hearing about improvements in the works, said Allen Clemson, the Commissioners Court administrator.

County officials are now in emergency mode, having given themselves a 30-day deadline to reduce the jail's population of more than 7,000 by 1,000 inmates, which they said will bring them in compliance.

The state jail commission "told us we were subject to an inspection at any time and that midnight unannounced visits are not out of the question," said Commissioner John Wiley Price, who attended the jail commission meeting. "We take them very seriously."

The Dallas County Jail system – the seventh largest in the nation – has failed state inspections three years in a row, primarily because of inadequate staffing. Dallas has the highest incarceration rate among Texas' five largest counties.

The Sheriff's Department spent more than $9 million in overtime in the jails last fiscal year. But a surprise state inspection in October revealed the jail still wasn't meeting the minimum staffing requirement.

"We are both in agreement that you cannot go on like this forever," said Adan Munoz, executive director of the Commission on Jail Standards. "Remedial orders have to be put in place."

Mr. Munoz said a U.S. Justice Department report on the jail was the main reason he asked Dallas County officials to appear last week before the commission in Austin. The federal investigation concluded in December that the county is violating inmates' civil rights with dangerous and unsanitary jail conditions.

The district attorney's office, defense attorneys and criminal court judges have agreed to work together to dispose of cases quicker.

Judges will release nonviolent low-level offenders with lower bonds, personal recognizance bonds or a notice to appear in court at a later date. A similar move was taken to free up space in the Decker jail for Katrina evacuees in 2005.

For example, 125 people are in jail charged with prostitution who could be released, Mr. Clemson said.

County criminal courts manager Mikah Mitchell said that in the misdemeanor courts, inmates will be released if they meet certain conditions such as no immigration holds and no history of bond forfeitures.

Judge John Creuzot, who presides over the county's felony courts, could not be reached for comment Tuesday. But Lena Levario, one of the new Democratic judges who was elected in November, said she will begin calling defense attorneys to ask them to show up in court and dispose of their clients' cases.

"I will ask them to come in and take care of it," said Judge Levario, of the 204th Criminal District Court. "We will not be releasing anyone who we think will be a threat to the community."

Reducing crowding

District Attorney Craig Watkins said his office began pulling the oldest state jail felony cases this week and will make more reasonable plea bargain offers so the defendants can be moved out of the county jail to begin serving their sentences in state jails.

Mr. Lollar, the public defender chief, said his office is already seeing better plea bargain offers.

Mr. Price, who heads the county's jail population committee, said some inmates can be given community service while others can wear electronic monitors while awaiting trial.

If such measures to reduce the jail population fail, Sheriff Lupe Valdez will move some of her deputies from patrol, warrants and other divisions into the jail as a last resort, Mr. Price said.

The jail-crowding problem is a result not only of the county's crime rate but also of its own policies.

The Dallas County Jail has the highest percentage of inmates awaiting trial on low-level, nonviolent charges in Texas – almost double that of Harris County, according to recent numbers sent to the state.

Most inmates are there because they cannot afford bail. Others, arrested on drug charges, are in jail awaiting drug test results before their cases can even go before a grand jury. That was a policy former District Attorney Bill Hill enacted in 2002 to prevent a repeat of the fake-drug scandal in which dozens of innocent people were arrested.

Under the policy, drugs must be sent to a lab for analysis before drug offenders' cases can move. The turnaround time was lengthy at first because of staff shortages at the county's crime lab, but it has since improved to about 20 days.

In Tarrant County, defendants are not admitted to the county jail until the drugs are tested.

Mr. Watkins said during a recent jail population committee meeting that he plans to re-evaluate that policy and possibly ask arresting agencies to hold offenders until drug testing is complete.

A decision several years ago to dismantle the pretrial release program has come back to haunt Dallas County. The program identifies low-risk inmates charged with minor crimes who are allowed to pay reduced bail to get out of jail.

The county is working to reinstate the program, which is expected to be up and running by next month.

In Dallas County, it takes longer to see a judge after an arrest. Police have up to 72 hours to file a case with the district attorney, not including weekends, Mr. Lollar said. As a result, inmates can sit in jail from five to 12 days before going before a judge, he said.

"We can't do anything with those cases," he said.

In Harris County, prosecutors work shifts around the clock and can immediately accept or reject a case from an arresting officer, Mr. Lollar said.

Stretched thin

As Dallas County's inmate population swells, the jail staff is being stretched thin.

More guards are leaving the jail to transport inmates to Parkland Memorial Hospital because of the increased trips ordered by the hospital, which is now in charge of jail health. Guards also are needed to watch the inmates at the hospital.

County commissioners recently approved 100 more jail guard positions to help transport inmates to the hospital, as well as 85 new positions for the Decker jail, but it could take months to fill them.

Mr. Price said the Sheriff's Department is having difficulty finding enough recruits who can pass the physical and psychological tests, as well as the background checks.

Mattye Mauldin-Taylor, the county's human resources director, said she needs 1,500 applications to fill 200 guard positions. Recruiting is not easy because of the nature of the job, she said.

The starting salary for a jail guard is $31,158, with a guaranteed 5 percent raise after one year, she said.

Mr. Clemson said that reducing the jail population by 1,000 inmates will not be easy but that he doesn't think it will strain the system.

State officials "expect us to take immediate action to get into compliance," he said.

More Than Words (WP)

The Democratic leadership needs to act on D.C. voting rights.

NATIONAL Democratic party leaders are on record with their unequivocal endorsement of the District's bid for full voting rights in the House of Representatives. Support is always welcome, but what's needed is action. It's time for the Democrats who control Congress to act on legislation to end the disenfranchisement of citizens living in the nation's capital.

The Democratic National Committee voted last weekend to support the measure, promising a grass-roots lobbying campaign. It's a welcome boost for a bill that has languished too long. Sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and the District's nonvoting delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the measure would add two seats to the House -- one for the heavily Democratic District and the other for largely Republican Utah. The bill enjoyed widespread bipartisan support in the past Congress but was never scheduled for a floor vote, to what should be the everlasting embarrassment of the Republican leadership.

Democrats are in a position to push the bill for approval, but internal party squabbling has slowed its movement. Some Democrats balked at doing anything for Utah until they were convinced that the District seat wouldn't have a chance unless balanced against Utah, which probably would get an extra seat anyway after the next census reapportionment. In recent days, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) has raised the concern that the bill would give Utah an extra electoral college vote in the 2008 presidential election and could hurt Democrats in a close race. The question is whether Democrats will allow that highly remote and partisan concern to stand in the way of their claimed support for fair representation for District residents.

Party insiders are confident that the disagreements will be ironed out, and they stress that, unlike the Republican leadership, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) are genuinely committed to voting rights for the District. We have no reason to doubt that. But the strength of the bill crafted by Mr. Davis and Ms. Norton is that it takes into account the self-interest of both parties while weighing the needs of the people of the District and Utah. Tinkering with that formula could doom the bill, and no matter how good the intentions of lawmakers, the District deserves results.

Deal Raises Concerns About Antitrust Issues (SLPD)

By Rachel Melcer, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 7, 2007

A pair of biotech agribusinesses wants to go head to head with Monsanto Co. in creating a better cotton seed, but they may never get there.

At issue is Monsanto's proposed $1.5 billion purchase of Delta & Pine Land Co. Swiss firm Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., a DuPont company, had planned to partner with Delta, combining their genetic traits with D&PL's seed.

The Monsanto deal is pending an antitrust review by the Justice Department. If it goes through, Syngenta and Pioneer will have to turn to rival Monsanto as their cotton seed partner.

All of the companies involved say the plans for partnerships are proceeding until the deal closes. They don't know what the future will hold, though Monsanto promises to work with its competitors.

But many cotton farmers say they were hoping increased competition would bring down prices and result in greater service and product choices. Now, they worry that won't materialize.

"This is a real issue. If Monsanto can't work out an agreement to develop the DuPont and Syngenta technology in Delta & Pine Land (seeds) … that's a problem," said Steve Verett, executive vice president of Plains Cotton Growers Inc., which represents farmers in 41 counties around Lubbock, Texas.

Monsanto, the world leader in developing biotech crop traits, said bringing competing technology to market is a common agribusiness practice that it is open to continuing with Syngenta and Pioneer. Monsanto's traits, for example, were planted on nearly 86 percent of U.S. cotton acres last year, yet Monsanto's Stone-ville brand of seed grew on just 12 percent of those acres, according to the U.S. Agriculture Department.

Biotech seeds contain two profitable parts: The seeds themselves and the genetic traits that are added to protect those seeds from herbicides and pests. While the agribusiness ideal is to own both parts — and that's Monsanto's primary motivation in buying D&PL — Monsanto still would make money by selling the D&PL seed it owns with another company's genetic traits.

"There definitely will be competition, if (Pioneer and Syngenta) choose to be in that market," said Monsanto spokeswoman Lori Fisher. "But that's not within our domain at Monsanto to decide — it's up to the owners of those technologies."

Verett, whose family grows about 2,500 acres of cotton, said he's inclined to believe Monsanto. And he trusts regulators, who are sure to be focusing on these partnerships in considering whether the deal is anti-competitive.

Senate Panel Probes Gas Trades For Possible Market Manipulation (WSJ)

By JOHN J. FIALKA And ANN DAVIS

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The Senate Energy Committee is investigating whether futures traders are manipulating markets that set natural-gas prices for consumers, farmers and industries.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the panel's chairman, has sent letters to two federal market regulators, asking them what they know about unusual price fluctuations that may have taken place, which could have the effect of artificially raising indexes used to establish market prices for natural gas.

The congressional investigation aims to explore how federal agencies monitor such trades, and if possible, to identify the agents and motivations behind the alleged illegal trading.

Amaranth Impact

In separate letters sent yesterday to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Sen. Bingaman said the panel's probe was partly triggered by a Wall Street Journal article. The Jan. 30 article said one factor behind last year's $6 billion failure of Amaranth Advisors LLC, a hedge fund, may have been rapid or unanticipated fluctuations in futures-trading prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Both agencies monitor aspects of trading of natural-gas futures and related contracts.

A FERC spokesman said the agency had no comment on the Bingaman letter. Ianthe Zabel, director of external affairs for CFTC, said it was preparing to work with the committee. She said her agency "routinely monitors large positions and trading in the Nymex natural-gas futures markets and vigorously investigates instances of possible wrongdoing."

The energy committee is interested in trading flurries in the final minutes before the contract for September gas delivery expired in August, which sent prices sharply up. It asked the regulators how they follow such trades and what they know about "suspected anomalies" in the natural-gas market in 2006 that could have affected indexes used to set gas-supply contracts.

'Just and Reasonable' Trades?

The letter to FERC said the agency was given responsibility by Congress under the 2005 Energy Policy Act to ensure "just and reasonable" natural-gas prices by monitoring futures trades. It asked agency regulators how they carry out their duties.

The two agencies, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, have been investigating the collapse of Amaranth. Investigators have requested information from Nymex and the Atlanta-based IntercontinentalExchange, which trades in contracts that are closely related to futures.

They are asking questions about Amaranth's trading activities, as well as those of some other large, natural-gas traders, said traders and attorneys who are involved in, or were briefed on, the questioning. But it is unclear whether they have found evidence of possible wrongdoing or manipulation.

In addition, the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has recently been interviewing large natural-gas trading companies about hedge-fund participation in the natural-gas markets, said two lawyers familiar with its actions.

Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle 41 State Claims (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, February 7, 2007

Feb. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Samsung Electronics Co., the world's biggest memory chipmaker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle claims by California, New York, Illinois, 38 other states and consumers that it conspired to fix prices on some chips.

The accord resolves claims that the unit of Seoul, South Korea-based Samsung Group and other chipmakers drove up prices, inflating the cost of computers and other electronics for consumers and state governments. Samsung agreed to help state officials pursue claims against other chipmakers.

Samsung, Infineon AG and six other companies were sued by U.S. states in July on claims that the companies added billions of dollars to chip costs by fixing prices of dynamic random access memory, the most commonly used semiconductor memory product. So-called DRAM is used by Dell Inc. and Hewlett-Packard Co. in making personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players.

Shares of Suwon, South Korea-based Samsung fell 0.2 percent to 586,000 won at 10:35 a.m. in Seoul today.

Consumer Payout

DOJ_NMG_0129070

About $80 million of the accord will go to reimbursing consumers and $10 million will go to states and localities, Cuomo said. The lawsuit grew out of a global price-fixing investigation by the U.S. Justice Department that led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals who have been fined $731 million. Samsung paid $300 million in the U.S. probe, the second-largest U.S. criminal antitrust fine at the time.

``These latest settlements effectively put the DRAM antitrust matter behind us," said Samsung spokeswoman Chris Goodhart in an e-mailed statement.

The U.S. criminal case spawned civil lawsuits by direct and indirect purchasers of DRAM chips, including litigation by manufacturers, computer repair companies and individual states. The price-fixing conspiracy lasted from 1998 to 2002, according to the lawsuit.

Two Samsung Electronics Inc. executives were accused by the U.S. in October of participating in the global price-fixing scheme.

Today's settlement resolves claims by California, which didn't include Samsung in the lawsuit it filed against other chipmakers in July, said Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for California Attorney General Jerry Brown.

Samsung Settles Price-fixing Suit For $90m (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Samsung, the world's biggest memory chipmaker, is to pay $90m to settle a price-fixing lawsuit brought by 41 US states.

The South Korean company also agreed to assist the states in litigation against other memory chip manufacturers who had taken part in the conspiracy.

The class-action suits filed in July last year arose from a justice department investigation begun in 2002. It uncovered one of the largest price-fixing schemes on record.

It led to $730m in fines and guilty pleas by Samsung and three other major manufacturers of dynamic random access memory (Dram) chips – Elpida, Hynix and Infineon. A fifth, Micron, admitted taking part but avoided federal criminal charges through its co-operation with the authorities.

The price-fixing suits had charged that Samsung and others reached secret agreements to inflate the prices of memory chips commonly installed in consumer desktop and notebook PCs.

"Consumers, states and localities were victims of an international conspiracy that artificially raised the price of memory chips, and thus illegally boosted the price of computers and popular hi-tech products," said Andrew Cuomo, New York attorney-general.

Five Samsung executives have pleaded guilty in the US to price-fixing and have agreed to each pay $250,000 fines and serve prison time.

Samsung To Pay $90 Million To Settle Price-fixing Lawsuit (AP)

By MARK JOHNSON

ALBANY, N.Y. - Samsung Electronics Co., the world's largest memory chip maker, agreed to pay $90 million to settle a lawsuit charging the company and others with price-fixing, New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo said Tuesday.

The suit, filed in July, claimed Korean-based Samsung and numerous other companies made secret arrangements to raise the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips. The memory chips are the most commonly used product for storing and retrieving information in computers and electronic devices.

A spokeswoman for Samsung, a top producer of flat-screen televisions, mobile phone handsets, MP3 players and laptop computers, did not immediately return a call for comment.

About $80 million of the settlement will go to consumers nationwide while $10 million will cover losses suffered by states and local governments, Cuomo's office said.

The settlement is subject to approval in federal court in San Francisco. New York, California and Illinois were the lead plaintiffs in the case.

The lawsuit was one of several filed following a U.S. Justice Department investigation that began in 2002 into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices. The investigation resulted in more than $730 million in fines and guilty pleas from four companies - Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

Companies such as Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc. had to raise PC prices or reduce the amount of memory installed on their systems to compensate for the higher costs, prosecutors said.

Cuomo said the case is continuing against Micron Technology Inc., Infineon Technologies, Elpida Memory Inc, Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Mosel-Vitelic Corp., Nanya Technology Corp. and NEC Electronics America Inc.

Bush Talks About Fiscal Responsibility At Company Accused Of Price-fixing (AP)

MANASSAS, Va. President Bush preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility today at a company in Manassas, Virginia that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws.

Bush went to computer chip-maker Micron Technology Incorporated to talk about the budget he unveiled yesterday. He said Congress needs to set priorities in spending taxpayer money.

Micron Technology, based in Boise, Idaho, settled a federal class action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 on behalf of computer manufacturers who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM from suppliers between April 1999 and June 2002.

The lawsuit is one of several filed after a U-S Justice Department investigation into whether computer chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips on the market to inflate prices.

The Justice Department granted Micron immunity from criminal charges in exchange for its cooperation. But the amnesty did not shield the company from lawsuits.

Apple Calls To End Online Copy Protection (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Steve Jobs, Apple chief executive, on Tuesday called on the four major record companies to start selling songs online without the copy protection software known as digital rights management.

Apple has been under pressure in Europe to make its iTunes Music Store compatible with players other than the iPod. Consumer groups and agencies in Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden have made antitrust complaints against Apple in recent months.

"Perhaps those [European countries] unhappy with the current situation should redirect their energies towards persuading the music companies to sell their music DRM – free," he said in a rare statement published on Apple's website.

The songs sold on the service are protected by Apple's proprietary FairPlay software, which prevents users from making multiple copies for distribution. Mr Jobs said Apple had concluded that if it licenses FairPlay to other companies it could no longer guarantee to protect the music it licenses from the major labels – Vivendi's Universal Music, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, EMI and Warner Music Group.

Instead, he favours abolishing DRM entirely so any MP3 player could play music purchased from any online store. "This is clearly the best alternative for consumers and Apple would embrace it in a heartbeat," he says.

Richard Stice, analyst at Standard & Poor's equity research, said Tuesday's statement appeared to be an attempt to combat the negative publicity Apple had been receiving in Europe.

"He's been getting a lot of heat from several countries. In some ways, this could get consumers on his side and stop Apple looking like the bad guy."

Mr Stice said the removal of copyright protection from online music downloads was likely to benefit Apple as the number one player, more than rivals such as Microsoft and Sony.

"I think it's a pretty smart thing for him to say. If you use [Microsoft's] Zune, you can't use iTunes – for Apple, if there's no DRM, it would open up the market much more."

In being so public with his views, Mr Jobs may also be trying to put pressure on the major labels where private negotiations have failed. The music industry has been implacable in insisting on copyright protection for downloaded music.

Mr Jobs argues that "DRMs haven't worked and may never work to halt music piracy."

More than 20bn songs were sold completely DRM-free in 2006 on unprotected CDs by record companies. This was more than 10-times the number of DRM-protected songs sold worldwide by online stores, he says, while only around 3 per cent of the music on the 90m iPods sold to date had been purchased from iTunes.

Mr Jobs' argument was somewhat at odds with Apple's complaint last year that a proposed French law making music DRM-free would be tantamount to "state-sponsored piracy."

Jobs Pitches Dumping Anti-piracy Software (LAT)

By Michelle Quinn

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Steve Jobs, the chief executive of Apple, wrote an open letter today asking the music industry to consider giving up anti-piracy software on the digital music it sells.

The letter, which can be seen at www.apple.com/hotnews/thoughtsonmusic, walks through the problems of anti-piracy software, also known as digital rights management, that is supposed to prevent consumers from copying digital music.

Jobs lists the problems with the software, which is often hacked and needs updating and prevents consumers from listening to their music wherever they like. He also points out that consumers are already buying compact discs and copying them digitally without facing controls to stop them.

What the letter doesn't spell out is how Apple and Microsoft were advocates for DRM use so that the music they sold through their online stores could only be played on their devices. Convincing record labels "to license their music to Apple and others DRM-free will create a truly interoperable music marketplace," wrote Jobs. "Apple will embrace this wholeheartedly."

The letter comes as the music and film industries are actively talking about dropping the use of DRMs, which force consumers who buy music on Apple's online store iTunes to use the music only on the company's products. Many in the entertainment industry have expressed frustration with DRM and have talked about other ways to protect content without forcing consumers to stick with one kind of device.

"Rhetorically, he's been disingenuous," said Aram Sinnreich, managing partner at Radar Research in Los Angeles. "He's been metaphorically ramming it down their throats. To be fair, Apple has never been as DRM insane as Microsoft. Apple has put it in enough DRM to make it a pain in the butt for consumers to buy music on iTunes….and use it on non Apple devices."

"This is good for consumers and it's ultimately good for everyone," said Sinnreich.

Jobs's New Tune Raises Pressure On Music Firms (WSJ)

By NICK WINGFIELD And ETHAN SMITH

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

A movement to pressure the music industry to drop its primary weapon against online piracy has gained a high-profile convert: Steve Jobs, the man who helped build the market for selling music via the Internet.

In an 1,800-word online essay, Apple Inc.'s chief executive said the world's major music companies should consider allowing Apple and others to sell songs unfettered by anticopying software that prevents them from being shared or played however a consumer chooses.

Mr. Jobs contends that the recording industry isn't solving piracy with the technology, and could spur the market further if music lovers could buy music online without the restrictions. Many consumers resent the curbs on how they can listen to what they buy from online stores. Songs from one company's catalog, for example, won't work on another company's player -- a gridlock that has frustrated some consumers. Getting rid of the antipiracy software could make downloaded music as widely compatible with digital players in the market as compact discs are with CD players.

While Mr. Jobs is positioning his proposal as a consumer-friendly step, it isn't clear whether the biggest music companies -- Warner Music Group Corp., EMI Group PLC, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group, and Sony BMG, the joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG -- will embrace his recommendation. Allowing online music sales without anticopying software would amount to a radical about-face for the recording industry, which several years ago viewed the technology as a remedy to rampant online piracy through file-sharing networks like the original Napster and Kazaa. Music heavyweights have long required Apple and others to use the technology -- known as digital-rights management, or DRM, software -- if they wish to sell their songs online.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

Would you pay more for legal digital-music downloads without copy restrictions?Nor is it clear whether such a shift would deliver a further blow or a potential boon to the music industry, which has endured a spiral of declining sales and rising piracy since the advent of Internet-enabled copying and transmission of music. According to the Recording Industry Association of America, the value of recorded music shipped to U.S. retailers plunged 16% from a $14.5 billion peak in 1999 to $12.2 billion at the end of 2005 -- a slide the industry blames in part on online piracy. Record companies decided that one way to keep this from worsening was to let legitimate companies sell music in a format whose distribution could be more tightly controlled.

Apple quickly took the lead several years ago by selling music through its iTunes Store for 99 cents a song. The digital music files are essentially padlocked by a layer of software that makes them playable only on iPods and on computers using iTunes software. Other companies use competing copy-protection software, though, limiting users of digital-music players to purchasing songs online through compatible song catalogs.

Yet for all the limits such software places on copying music, Mr. Jobs said, the technology doesn't effectively deter piracy because more than 90% of music world-wide is purchased on CDs -- which don't contain antipiracy software and are therefore easily copied to a computer and then traded online.

In his essay, posted yesterday on Apple's Web site, Mr. Jobs suggests the music industry might see better growth by abandoning its protective approach. "If such requirements were removed, the music industry might experience an influx of new companies willing to invest in innovative new stores and players," he wrote. "This can only be seen as a positive by the music companies."

Sales of digital downloads have continued to rise, but at a slower rate than in previous years. That, combined with an accelerating downturn in CD sales, has meant the music companies have been harder pressed than ever to find new sales wherever they can. Some executives in the technology and music industries have argued that sales of digital music are being held back by the lack of compatibility between hardware devices and music services. These people believe the market could grow more strongly if iTunes competitors can sell music that can be played on iPods.

Aside from sales, dropping the technological barriers also could also eliminate pressure Apple is facing from consumer-protection agencies in several European countries. They want Apple to modify its two most popular music products -- iPods and iTunes Store -- to make them compatible with online music services and hardware offered by others.

And since Apple thoroughly dominates the market -- with more than 85% of online song sales in the U.S., and more than 70% of digital-music-player sales -- many consumers have chafed at the problems associated with using the company's hardware and music store with offerings from competitors. Those limitations have helped spawn a growing movement within the technology and entertainment industries against the use of DRM.

Ken Hertz, a prominent lawyer who does extensive work in the digital-music business, said Mr. Jobs's letter could be viewed as "a cynical attempt" to place the blame for incompatibility of hardware and services on the music industry, rather than on Apple itself. Some executives have suggested that the Cupertino, Calif. , company has used encryption technology to deliberately lock consumers into its music products by discouraging those with large iTunes music collections from switching to new gadgets that won't play their songs.

"Apple has been more of a beneficiary of DRM than a victim," Mr. Hertz added.

Mr. Jobs discounted such criticism, estimating that 97% of the music on most iPods is from sources other than the iTunes Store, such as personal CD collections. "It's hard to believe that just 3% of the music on the average iPod is enough to lock users into buying only iPods in the future," he wrote in his essay.

One of the more vocal opponents of the technology, Terry McBride, chief executive of the management company and independent record label Nettwerk Music Group, said the support of Mr. Jobs will significantly increase the potency of calls to abandon it.

"If anyone can make this happen, Steve can," said Mr. McBride, whose clients include the music group Barenaked Ladies and singers Avril Lavigne and Sarah McLachlan.

Music companies said it is too soon to say how and whether they would respond to Mr. Jobs's essay, but a few acknowledge some of the consumer issues the Apple CEO described. "The lack of operability between a proliferating range of digital platforms and devices is more and more becoming a real issue for music consumers," said Jeanne Meyer, an EMI spokeswoman.

The digital revolution has caused big problems for music labels. Because music on CDs is recorded in digital form, without anticopying technology, Web sites that enable people to share copyrighted songs illegally have cut into profits.

Mr. Jobs helped change the situation, brokering deals with major record labels to allow their songs to be sold on iTunes for 99 cents each. As part of those negotiations, he says, the labels insisted that Apple use software that prevented their songs from being played on unauthorized devices.

Apple developed software known as FairPlay, which works with iTunes and the iPod and enforces certain restrictions, such as allowing consumers only to play protected recordings on up to five computers.

Other companies such as Microsoft Corp. developed their own solutions to the antipiracy requirement. So while CDs represent a standard format -- playable on hardware made by a wide array of companies and sold by countless retailers -- there is no single DRM standard. Copy-protection systems have been developed by many companies and, in some cases, are tightly integrated with specific devices and online services -- leading to incompatibility problems.

The music industry has begun to experiment with the online sale of unprotected music using the popular MP3 format that works with virtually all digital music players, including Apple's iPod. Yahoo Inc., for instance, has sold MP3 songs by Norah

Jones, Jessica Simpson and other artists. Another music-retail site, eMusic.com, offers more than two million songs for sale in the MP3 format from independent music labels, which means they can be played on iPods and other music players.

Most popular music from major recording companies, though, hasn't been available without anticopying software. David Goldberg, general manager of music for Yahoo, said the company is making progress in discussions with major music companies about offering songs without DRM and, by Christmas, expects to have significant portions of Yahoo's catalog of two million songs available in the MP3 format.

Mr. Goldberg said he was pleased to hear Mr. Jobs propose that music companies abandon the antipiracy protection. "We've been vocal about that, and we're glad to hear it from him," he said.

Ms. Meyer of EMI added that the response from fans to EMI's limited MP3 sales has been "very enthusiastic."

Mr. Jobs proposes three paths the digital-music business might follow, including its current course of using multiple incompatible anticopying systems. A second option, he said, would be for Apple to license its antipiracy system so other companies can make their hardware and online services work with Apple's music products.

Mr. Jobs said that scenario -- which competitors and music-industry executives have proposed before, and Apple has resisted -- is problematic because sharing its encryption software with others could compromise the security of the system and slow Apple's ability to repair breaches of the software.

Mr. Jobs made it clear in the essay that he favors a third scenario, abolishing the use of DRM, in large part because he says it doesn't prevent piracy.

Besides worries about European regulators and record labels, Mr. Jobs's letter could reflect a desire to counter more-credible competition from Microsoft, said Talal Shamoon, chief executive of Intertrust Technologies Corp., a DRM software maker that is jointly owned by Sony, Philips Electronics NV and Stephens Bank. Microsoft has long offered its own antipiracy software to other companies, and now is emulating Apple's formula with a proprietary format tied to its new Zune player -- which could become stronger as Microsoft exploits connections to its new Vista operating system and Xbox 360 game console, Mr. Shamoon said.

This isn't the first time Mr. Jobs has launched a public broadside against the music industry, in an apparent attempt to sway public opinion. In 2005, amid calls from record labels for iTunes to sell music for a wider range of prices than 99 cents per track, he blasted the labels as "greedy."

Mr. Jobs's suggestion yesterday was applauded by rival Rob Glaser, chairman and CEO of RealNetworks Inc., owner of the Rhapsody music service. He recently called on major labels to drop DRM for digital-music purchases. "Doing so would be the right thing for consumers and would also be good for everyone in the industry," Mr. Glaser said. "It's great to see other industry leaders support this message."

Jobs Wants Fewer Download Limits (USAT)

By Kevin Maney

USA Today, February 7, 2007

Apple CEO Steve Jobs is trying to start a stampede to make music downloaded from iTunes or any online store playable on any device without restrictions.

In a major pronouncement that joins a growing chorus of discontent about copy restrictions, Jobs on Tuesday posted a manifesto, " Thoughts on Music," on Apple's website.

It argues that digital rights management (DRM) technology, which record companies require in digital music files to limit where and how songs can be played, has failed to stop piracy and impedes development of the online music industry.

COMMENT: What do you think?

Within minutes, the essay was picked up by bloggers and circulated worldwide.

Jobs asked Europeans to pressure major Europe-based music companies — Universal, EMI and Sony BMG (half-owned by Germany's Bertelsmann) — to end DRM. "Convincing them to license their music to Apple and others DRM-free will create a truly interoperable music marketplace," Jobs wrote. "Apple will embrace this wholeheartedly."

Apple, which dominates the legitimate digital download market, uses DRM called FairPlay. Songs bought at iTunes can play only on PCs using iTunes software or on Apple's iPod. Songs with DRM from other companies such as Microsoft and RealNetworks won't play on iPods.

Apple has been accused of using FairPlay to lock consumers into iTunes. Jobs contests that, noting that just 3% of songs on an average iPod were bought through iTunes and have DRM. Songs copied from CDs and music files in the MP3 format can be played anywhere.

Bloggers, tech execs and some musicians jumped in to side with Jobs. "I see 2% of DRM as protecting copyright and 98% annoying consumers," music artist Moby said.

RealNetworks CEO Rob Glaser said he "gave a speech on this exact topic advocating this exact position ... two weeks ago."

The key is whether record labels will give up DRM. "We'll continue experimenting" with DRM-free releases, says Adam Grossberg, spokesman for EMI. The label has put out songs by Norah Jones and Relient K with no DRM. Warner Music Group and Sony BMG spokesmen didn't respond to requests for comment.

Another question is whether lifting DRM will lead to more piracy and fewer royalties to musicians. "If it increases piracy, everybody loses," says John MacFarlane, CEO of Sonos, which makes a home digital music system.

Jobs Calls For End To Music Copy Protection (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 6 — Steven P. Jobs, Apple's chief executive, jolted the record industry on Tuesday by calling on its largest companies to allow online music sales unfettered by antipiracy software.

The move is a gamble for Apple. Its iPod players and iTunes Store have defined the online music market, and they have much at stake in the current copy-protection system.

Under terms reached with the major record labels, online music stores embed software code into the digital song files they sell to restrict the ability to copy them. Because Apple uses its own system, the songs it sells can be played only on the iPod. That limitation has drawn increasing scrutiny from European governments, pressure that Apple has recently begun to acknowledge.

Mr. Jobs's appeal, posted on the company's Web site Tuesday, came in the form of an essay titled "Thoughts on Music," but in essence it was a letter to the "Big 4" music companies: Universal, Sony BMG, Warner and EMI.

While he said that "customers are being well served" by the current approach to digital rights management — with online music retailers using incompatible antipiracy systems but nonetheless offering "a wide variety of choices" — the subtext clearly pointed to the prospect of change.

He dismissed one possible alternative, in which Apple would license its own system, FairPlay, allowing competing digital players to play iTunes songs and letting other stores sell copy-protected music for the iPod. Mr. Jobs said that approach would only complicate enforcement of digital rights management, as myriad companies would have to coordinate software and hardware updates.

Instead, he proposed that labels could shed digital rights management altogether. Mr. Jobs pointed out that only 10 percent of all music sold last year was through an online store and that music is already easily loaded onto digital players from CDs, with no antipiracy features. Attaching digital rights management to music bought online has only limited the number of online music stores, he wrote.

"This is clearly the best alternative for consumers, and Apple would embrace it in a heartbeat," he wrote.

Mr. Jobs's move comes as the music industry appears to be facing a crisis. Sales of its mainstay product — the album — continue to sink, and sales of digital music, including individual songs, have not increased fast enough to offset the decline.

With a paucity of hit releases to start the year, industrywide album sales are already down more than 15 percent from last year, the worst January performance since computerized sales tracking began in 1991.

At a forum in France last month, Rob Glaser, chief executive of RealNetworks, which operates the Rhapsody digital music service, predicted the widespread availability of unrestricted digital music within a few years. He said it was "an idea in ascendance and whose time has come."

But Mr. Jobs is clearly the most powerful voice raised so far in support of a change. With the clout built on his company's market share for both players and music, he has already prevailed against the labels in disputes over pricing.

Facing pressure to bolster digital sales, the four major music companies have only toyed with the idea of selling unprotected files — most notably with a personalized version of a Jessica Simpson song and the first single from the new album of Norah Jones. MySpace, the social-networking giant that is host to pages for countless independent and major-label acts, has embraced the unrestricted MP3 format for artists who choose to sell music there.

More recently, the industry has been abuzz with rumors that one or more of the major companies is preparing to lift restrictions on some portions of their digital catalog.

Jeanne Meyer, a spokeswoman for EMI, said, "The lack of interoperability between a proliferating range of digital platforms and devices is increasingly becoming a real issue for music consumers."

The Universal Music Group, the Warner Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment declined to comment. But several industry executives said they viewed Mr. Jobs's comments as an effort to deflect blame from Apple and onto the record companies for the incompatibility of various digital music devices and services.

There is a general sense that the industry is still unwilling to do away completely with copy protection, and no contracts have been signed yet to change the systems of distribution by any of the players.

A senior executive at one company, who requested anonymity to avoid straining relations with Apple, said that while labels might experiment with other forms of copy-protection software, "we're not going to broadly license our content for unprotected digital distribution."

Another digital music industry executive said that the record companies — many of them part of larger media companies involved in movie and television production — were concerned that lifting restrictions on digital music might have perilous effects on the parallel market for copy-protected video content.

Several consumer electronics and music industry executives said that if the music industry moved away from copy protection, it could potentially make it easier for competing music players. Mr. Jobs seems to be betting that anything that stimulates the sale of digital music can only help his company.

"It's a bold move on his part," said Ted Cohen, managing partner of TAG Strategic, an industry consultancy; he is also former senior vice president for digital development and distribution for EMI Music. "If anything can play on anything, it's a clear win for the consumer electronics device world, but a potential disaster for the content companies."

The global music trade group, the International Federation for the Phonographic Industry, based in London, has long pushed for "interoperability," saying Apple should license its digital management system so that iTunes music plays on devices other than the iPod. But the industry has also stuck with the idea of some kind of digital control to prevent wholesale copying of musical tracks.

Officially, the industry chose to respond Tuesday by seizing on one idea that Mr. Jobs raised — licensing Apple's own copy-protection system — even though he went on to reject it. "Apple's offer to license FairPlay to other technology companies is a welcome breakthrough and would be a real victory for fans, artists and labels," the Recording Industry Association of America said.

Mr. Jobs's statement drew criticism from some competitors, who argued that he was simply trying to get in front of a shift in industry strategy and claim credit for it.

Jason Reindorp, marketing director for Zune at Microsoft, said Mr. Jobs's call for unrestricted music sales was "irresponsible, or at the very least naïve," adding, "It's like he's on top of the mountain making pronouncements, while we're here on the ground working with the industry to make it happen."

"He's certainly a master of the obvious," Mr. Reindorp said, adding that "the stars were already aligning" to loosen the restrictions.

In Norway last month, after a yearlong investigation, the government's consumer ombudsman ruled that iTunes violates national law by restricting playback to iPods. The government gave Apple until Oct. 1 to make changes.

Consumer agencies in six other European countries are looking into the legality of limiting how legally purchased songs can be played.

Late last month, as consumer groups across the region began banding together, Apple issued a statement that said, "Apple hopes that European governments will encourage a competitive environment that allows innovation to thrive, protects intellectual property and allows consumers to decide which products are successful."

In 2005, France lobbed the first legislative volley in the European effort to fight digital restrictions, but by the time the law was adopted last summer, most of the teeth were gone from the proposal. Now, the French are putting together a government commission that will rule on the legality of digital rights restrictions case by case.

Jobs Calls For Open Music Sales (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Apple chief executive Steve Jobs yesterday called on record companies to let online music stores sell digital music files without anti-piracy controls, an idea that some analysts say has merit.

"This is clearly the best alternative for customers and Apple would embrace it in a heartbeat," Jobs wrote in a column titled "Thoughts on Music," which was posted on Apple's Web site yesterday.

Critics have complained that digital rights management, or DRM, software built into tracks sold on the company's iTunes music store locks users into Apple's iPod. Such competitors as Real Networks, as well as some European countries, have called on Apple to share its software code or otherwise open its protected music file format. Doing so would allow devices other than iPods to play music downloaded from iTunes and would allow music purchased elsewhere on the Internet to be played on iPods.

But Jobs wrote that Apple sells music solely for the iPod because that's what the music industry insisted on when he was negotiating deals years ago -- even though "DRMs haven't worked, and may never work, to halt music piracy."

"A key provision of our agreements with the music companies is that if our DRM system is compromised and their music becomes playable on unauthorized devices, we have only a small number of weeks to fix the problem or they can withdraw their entire music catalog from our iTunes store," Jobs wrote.

The problem, he said, is "there are many smart people in the world, some with a lot of time on their hands, who love to discover such secrets and publish a way for everyone to get free (and stolen) music."

Phil Leigh, senior analyst and president of Inside Digital Media, said Jobs's comments were legitimate, albeit a bit self-serving.

"Jobs is trying to show that Apple is not the bad guy when it comes to proprietary formats," Leigh said, noting that the open letter was an aggressive public-relations tactic by a company that eventually will have to renegotiate with the record companies. "I think he's taking the offensive here."

Chris Castle, a music-industry lawyer who represented the original Napster, said the shift from CDs to digital music has hurt the music industry enough that it might be willing to consider Jobs's points.

"I think the labels are finally starting to come around to this," he said. "There's more willingness to entertain this sort of thing than there ever has been."

Jobs noted that eliminating DRM software is only one alternative. Another, he said, would be for Apple to license its FairPlay DRM technology to competitors -- for a fee. But, he said, releasing the secrets of the technology could lead to leaks, which can spread around the world in an instant over the Internet.

The Recording Industry Association of America, which has battled music piracy for years, called Apple's offer to license FairPlay "a welcome breakthrough and would be a real victory for fans, artists and labels. There have been many services seeking a license to the Apple DRM. This would enable the interoperability that we have been urging for a very long time."

In its statement, the RIAA did not address Jobs's idea of eliminating DRM software.

In his letter, Jobs noted that EMI and Universal, two of the big four CD labels, are both owned by European companies while 50 percent of a third, Sony BMG, is owned by Bertelsmann, a German company. The fourth, Warner, is based in the United States.

"Much of the concern over DRM systems has arisen in European countries," Jobs wrote. "Perhaps those unhappy with the current situation should redirect their energies towards persuading the music companies to sell their music DRM-free. . . . Convincing them to license their music to Apple and others DRM-free will create a truly interoperable music marketplace."

In Equity Office Battle, A Matter Of Scale (WSJ)

By JENNIFER S. FORSYTH And HENNY SENDER

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

With only hours until shareholders of Equity Office Properties Trust are to decide whether to sell the company to private-equity firm Blackstone Group, the outcome was still up in the air last evening.

If Vornado Realty Trust comes in with a higher offer before the vote at noon EST today, it would likely delay the tally -- at least until the Equity Office board has time to consider whether any new offer resolves its reservations that Vornado's previous bids have had too many uncertainties.

At stake in this high-noon gunfight is the nation's largest office portfolio and bragging rights to pulling off one of the largest leveraged buyouts in U.S. corporate history -- valued at $23 billion, not including the assumption of Equity Office's $16 billion in debt. But the risk for the eventual winner is considerably higher than when the bidding battle began in November with Blackstone's initial bid.

In addition to the size, the bidding battle involves two longtime kings in the commercial real estate world -- with Equity Office led by chairman Sam Zell and Vornado led by chief executive Steven Roth -- and a relative newcomer in Blackstone. Blackstone has become a huge player in real estate with acquisitions within the last 24 months, reflecting the aggressive strategy of Jonathan Gray, the 37-year-old head of its real estate group.

What's clear is how much both Blackstone and Vornado desperately desire Equity Office's stake in more than 500 buildings at a time of rising rents and falling vacancies in many markets, with neither firm yet raising a white flag.

Since Jan. 17, when Vornado first weighed in with a higher offer, Blackstone has moved up its all-cash bid first to $54 a share from $48.50 and then, yesterday morning to $55.50. Meanwhile, Vornado has increased the total amount of its cash-and-stock bid to $56 a share and promised to pay the cash portion before a shareholder vote. But at the same time, Vornado reduced the cash portion of its offer to 55% from 60% and didn't offer to pay Equity Office shareholders a fee if its own shareholders decline to approve its bid.

As of late yesterday afternoon, Vornado had no comment. If Vornado doesn't come in with a higher offer addressing Equity Office's concerns, Equity Office shareholders are expected to decide that Blackstone's bid is superior. Even if Vornado does increase its price, most shareholders say they want a price above $58 to make the decision a no-brainer.

Equity Office's board is urging its shareholders to accept Blackstone's offer. Even with Vornado's agreement to offer the cash portion up front, the remaining merger would still be subject to approval by Vornado shareholders, which could take four to six months, according to a statement issued yesterday by Equity Office.

Perhaps more frustrating to Equity Office's board is that Vornado's weekend offer came in the form of a two-page letter, not a definitive contract that could help the board assess whether the offer was truly superior to Blackstone's.

In its statement, EOP said despite repeated requests, "Vornado has failed to address significant contractual issues identified by the board."

Moreover, Equity Office agreed yesterday to raise the breakup fee -- the amount that Blackstone would receive if EOP accepts a competing offer -- to $720 million, up from $500 million last week and $200 million when the deal was announced by Equity Office in November. Any offer from Vornado would have to factor in that payment.

That puts Blackstone in a seemingly enviable position. Either it cements its reputation as a determined investor that just sealed the biggest private-equity deal ever by many measures, or it walks away with a $720 million consolation prize to share with its investors.

But some shareholders wonder if Equity Office directors are focusing too much on the risk instead of seeing the upside opportunity of accepting an offer from a company with a reputation at increasing shareholder value. Dean Frankel, domestic portfolio manager of Urdang Securities Management, an Equity Office shareholder, says he is disappointed the Equity Office board agreed to allow Blackstone to raise its breakup fee. "Blackstone is being treated as the brother and Vornado is treated as a stepbrother," he says.

Those familiar with the transaction say the higher breakup fee had a strategic role: trying to force Vornado to put a definitive contract on the table or to let Equity Office close the deal by the end of the week.

Shareholder Vote Today Could Settle Fight For Office REIT (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

The feverish competition over Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord, appeared to be nearing an end yesterday, with the original suitor, the Blackstone Group, leading the bidding.

Real estate investors waited yesterday to see if Vornado Realty Trust would try to top Blackstone's latest all-cash offer of $55.50 a share, which was approved during the night by Equity Office.

Equity Office shareholders are scheduled to vote today on the $39 billion bid by Blackstone, a private equity company.

"I'm hearing that it's over," said Barry Vinocur, the editor of REIT Wrap, a daily newsletter about real estate investment trusts. "Vornado has gone radio silent and has been that way all day."

Mr. Vinocur said he had been told that Blackstone had amassed the votes necessary for shareholders to approve the merger. Blackstone has said it could close the deal on Friday. If the Blackstone bid is not approved today by a majority of eligible shareholders, the merger agreement would be terminated and the bidding could continue.

If Vornado fails to raise its bid to win the deal, many investors will be surprised. Vornado's chief executive, Steven Roth, has said that buying Equity Office would make his company the dominant real estate investment trust in the office sector, with a strong portfolio of "irreplaceable assets" in the markets where it is hardest for developers to put up new buildings. In addition to office buildings, the company owns shopping centers and showroom space.

"The Vornado team views this as a transformative transaction for their company," said Keven S. Lindemann, the director of real estate for SNL Financial, a research company in Charlottesville, Va. Equity Office owns interests in 543 buildings across the nation.

Mr. Roth said he would keep most of the Equity Office buildings that are in coastal cities, strengthening Vornado's portfolio in the hot Manhattan market, adding to its holdings in Washington and instantly establishing a strong presence in three new markets: Los Angeles, San Francisco and Boston.

About $10 billion worth of property would be sold to two private equity companies, the Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital. The two were Vornado's partners in its original bid.

If Blackstone prevails, it is considered likely to sell much of the Equity Office portfolio within months of the transaction.

Whichever suitor is successful, the transaction will be the largest leveraged buyout ever.

Though Vornado's bid is higher at $56 a share, it would be paid in cash and stock. Analysts say Blackstone's offer is superior because the deal could close as soon as Friday.

Green Street Advisors, a research company in Newport Beach, Calif., which earlier recommended a vote in favor of Vornado, endorsed the Blackstone bid yesterday.

On Sunday, Vornado offered to pay the cash portion of its bid several weeks — instead of several months — after a merger agreement is signed. Vornado said its new bid would address Equity Office's concerns that the original deal posed too much risk for shareholders. Though Vornado shareholders would still have to approve the issuance of stock, the tender offer portion of the transaction would not need their approval, the company said.

Equity Office said Vornado had not allayed all its concerns. It said Vornado needed to agree to pay Equity Office hundreds of millions of dollars if the deal fell through.

Documents filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission revealed that on Monday, Equity Office pressed Blackstone to come up with more cash. Several major investors had made it clear that they preferred Vornado's richer offer and thought the risks had been exaggerated.

Later that day, Jonathan D. Gray, a senior managing director at Blackstone, told Richard D. Kincaid, the president of Equity Office, that he would be willing to pay $55.25 a share, provided that the breakup fee that Vornado would have to pay Blackstone was increased to $700 million from $500 million.

Pushing for more, Mr. Kincaid asked Mr. Gray if Blackstone would add another 25 cents a share. It would, Mr. Gray told him, but only if the breakup fee rose to $720 million and the company did not postpone today's shareholders' meeting.

MGIC Investment Corp., a provider of insurance on low-down-payment mortgages, said Tuesday it agreed to acquire Radian Group Inc., a global credit-risk management company, in a stock swap valued at about $4.9 billion.

Under the agreement, Milwaukee-based MGIC said it will exchange 0.9658 share of its stock for each share of Radian. The terms don't appear to offer Radian shareholders any premium. Radian shares closed Monday down 44 cents at $60.84, while MGIC's offer was valued at $60.78 at Monday's close.

Shares of both companies jumped sharply in early afternoon trading Tuesday. Radian shares were up 9.3% at $66.47, while MGIC shares rose 11% to $69.70.

The combined company, a mortgage and credit-risk insurer to be called MGIC Radian Financial Group Inc., will have assets of nearly $15 billion and primary mortgage insurance in force of more than $290 billion, the companies said. The combined company will have "a broad and balanced mix of businesses including domestic mortgage insurance, financial guaranty, financial services and international credit enhancement," the companies said.

MGIC Chief Executive Curt S. Culver will head the company until 2009, when he will cede the CEO job to Radian Chief Executive S.A. Ibrahim. Mr. Culver will pass the chairman post to Ibrahim in 2010. The board initially will be tilted 6-5 in MGIC's favor, but will add a sixth Radian director soon after the deal closes.

MGIC is the parent of Mortgage Guaranty Insurance Corp., a provider of private mortgage insurance serving about 5,000 lenders nationwide and in Puerto Rico. MGIC had $176.5 billion in primary insurance in force covering 1.3 million mortgages as of Dec. 31. The company reported last month that its fourth-quarter earnings fell to $121.5 million from $128.1 million a year ago, as revenue slipped 1% to $367.2 million.

Radian, Philadelphia, provides private mortgage insurance coverage to protect lenders from defaults by borrowers who put down a deposit of less than 20%. It offers primary insurance, which provides protection on individual loans and covers unpaid loan principal and delinquent interest; it also provides pool insurance, which covers unlimited exposure on groups of loans.

Radian reported last month that its fourth-quarter earnings rose to $158.4 million from $104.5 million the year before, as revenue rose 16.5% to $347.9 million.

In a conference call Tuesday discussing the acquisition, MGIC officials fielded a number of questions related to credit risk in both companies' books of business and to challenges from the weaker housing market overall.

Mr. Culver said MGIC looked at Radian's credit exposure quite carefully -- notably its exposure to so-called Alt-A mortgages, which are made to borrowers with high credit scores but less than full documentation. While acknowledging that he isn't "a huge fan" of that segment, Mr. Culver said in general lenders seem to be showing more discipline in their underwriting.

Midwest Flies In The Face Of Takeover Effort (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0129080

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, February 7, 2007

As the USA's biggest airlines jostle to get bigger and more powerful, little Midwest Airlines is happy to be itself: an anachronism.

But things could soon change for Midwest as a result of an ongoing hostile takeover effort being waged by Orlando-based AirTran Airways, the USA's third-biggest discounter.

Milwaukee-based Midwest, which most East and West coast residents have probably never heard of, has no desire to get rich quick, swallow other airlines or be swallowed itself. It flies to cities in America's heartland that the major carriers would just as soon fly over.

Only Midwest, for example, flies non-stop from Omaha to Reagan Washington National, or from Kansas City non-stop to New York LaGuardia. Along the way, flight attendants bake chocolate chip cookies that are served free, still warm and fragrant. It recently completed its first full year of profit since 2000.

The airline "has built up an amazing love affair with its passengers that I've never seen the likes of," says Midwest's marketing chief, Scott Dickson. If AirTran succeeds, he says, "There will be no vestige of Midwest Airlines left."

Over its objections, AirTran has launched a $345 million tender offer to acquire Midwest's shares directly from shareholders in hopes of forcing the board to sell. AirTran undertook the offer after Midwest's management rejected outright an earlier offer to buy the airline.

AirTran, which owns a few hundred Midwest shares, has gone to court to try to get Midwest's full shareholder list and is lobbying Midwest's institutional investors, who own up to half of Midwest's shares. Shareholders' deadline to tender shares is March 8, extended from an earlier deadline of Feb. 8.

"We think we're making progress with them," says AirTran CEO John Leonard.

Even if AirTran gains traction with shareholders, Midwest's board could launch a "poison pill," diluting its shares to make the deal too costly.

AirTran has offered $13.25 in stock and cash for every Midwest share, a 46% premium over the share price on Dec. 12, the day before the offer became public. That's up from an offer of $11.25 in December.

"It's nice to be wanted," Midwest CEO Tim Hoeksema says with deadpan wit. But Hoeksema, who has run the airline for 23 years, says the offer would take the company down the wrong path.

Midwest's directors decided unanimously that the offer was too low and that the airline doesn't need a partner to succeed. Because of cost-cutting in recent years, "We are in the strongest competitive position we have ever been in," Hoeksema says. "We think we have a lot of value here."

With US Airways' withdrawal of its hostile bid for Delta Air Lines last week, the AirTran proposal becomes the only proposed merger still on the table among domestic airlines. And it is much smaller than the $10 billion US Airways offer, which would have created the USA's biggest domestic carrier. AirTran is the 12th-biggest U.S. airline, and Midwest is No. 23.

AirTran flies mainly out of Atlanta, the world's busiest airport. It competes head on with Atlanta-based Delta, the USA's third-biggest airline. Aside from some of their airplanes — both fly Boeing 717s — the airlines have little in common.

What is now Midwest Airlines began in 1969 as a corporate jet service for executives of paper manufacturer Kimberly-Clark out of Appleton, Wis. In 1984, the company began scheduled service and went public in 1995.

Midwest's passengers seem to love their homey little airline with its two-across, four-to-a-row leather seats on many flights. Like other airlines, Midwest started charging for meals and wine in the post-9/11 travel downturn. Even now, the food is better than most. It has won awards from Travel & Leisure magazine, Condé Nast travel publications and food reviewer Zagat.

Midwest loyalist Judy Schweikart, an Omaha lawyer, flies the airline whenever she can, and dreads the thought of a takeover.

"If they make Midwest into AirTran, they're going to lose something unique," she says. "I hope the shareholders turn it down."

Meanwhile, AirTran executives can't fathom Midwest's rejection and its refusal to even sit down for talks. Leonard, the CEO, says Midwest is profitable only because Minneapolis-based Northwest, which serves Milwaukee, has cut flights while in bankruptcy protection. Midwest disputes that assertion.

Leonard says Midwest is so small and dependent on Milwaukee that it would be crushed if Northwest set its sights on that market. Northwest still has six gates at Milwaukee Mitchell airport, and could add flights and put pressure on Midwest after exiting bankruptcy, he says.

If AirTran and Midwest merged, both would be stronger, Leonard says. AirTran would go from serving 52 cities to more than 70 overnight. AirTran could increase flights to lucrative destinations Midwest also serves, such as New York, Boston and Los Angeles.

But Hoeksema says AirTran is simply "desperate" because it has "all these airplanes coming" and needs to expand. AirTran is scheduled to receive 60 new planes between now and 2010, and needs places to put them. The merged carrier could put new Boeing 737s on routes Midwest is now serving with aging MD80s and smaller 717s.

AirTran has even offered to keep serving free chocolate chip cookies on the merged carrier if the deal goes through. But they would not be baked onboard.

US Farmworkers, Environmental Groups Reopen Lawsuit To Quicken Pace Of Pesticide Ban (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anne Kim, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

(AP) - SEATTLE-Farmworkers and environmental groups have reopened a lawsuit against the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency in an attempt to force it to more quickly phase out a pesticide they say has been poisoning fieldworkers for decades.

The federal lawsuit challenges a decision by the EPA last November to set a 2012 timetable for phasing out the pesticide azinphos-methyl, known as guthion or AZM.

"These pesticides put thousands of workers at risk of serious illness every year," Erik Nicholson of the United Farm Workers of America said Monday in a news release. "It is inexcusable for EPA to allow AZM to continue poisoning workers for six more years."

The pesticide has been used on apples, cherries, pears and other crops since the late 1950s.

The farmworkers and environmental groups, represented by the environmental law firm Earthjustice, sued the EPA in federal court in Seattle in 2004, arguing that the agency was wrong to continue allowing the use of a pesticide that could cause dizziness, vomiting, seizures, paralysis, loss of mental function and even death. The lawsuit was put on hold when the EPA agreed to reconsider the use of AZM and another pesticide, phosmet, which is used on orchard crops and blueberries.

Last November, the EPA decided to end the use of AZM on nursery stocks and Brussels sprouts by Sept. 30, 2007. The phase-out for nuts was extended until Oct. 30, 2009, and for apples, blueberries, cherries, pears and parsley until Sept. 30, 2012.

The EPA decided to lengthen the phase-out time but also progressively limit the amount of AZM that would be available during the period, Enesta Jones, an EPA spokeswoman, said Monday.

"This allows sufficient time to facilitate the transition to safer alternatives," she said. "Public health is still our top priority and the agency will implement several risk mitigation measures to reduce exposure and ways to minimize harm if the public is exposed as this phase-out occurs."

In January, the EPA decided to lengthen - for some uses of phosmet - the amount of time workers are restricted entry into areas treated with the pesticide and added other restrictions to nine uses of phosmet, such as lowering the maximum amount of phosmet that can be applied each season.

But that does not adequately protect workers, said Patti Goldman, managing attorney for Earthjustice.

Earthjustice also wants to end the use of the pesticide chlorpyrifos, used on corn and orchard crops, and seeks to add it to the reopened lawsuit, Goldman said.

Gore Says Bush Administration Paying Scientists To Dispute Global Warming (CNN)

MADRID , SPAIN (CNN) -- Former Vice President Al Gore said in an interview on Tuesday the Bush administration is now paying scientists to dispute global warming since the administration can no longer argue against it.

During an interview with CNN affiliate Cuatro in Madrid, Gore said, "they've lost the argument and they don't want to stop dumping all this pollution into the Earth's atmosphere. The only thing they have left is cash and now they're offering cash for so-called skeptics who will try to confuse people about what the science really say. But it's unethical because now the time has come when we have to act."

Gore was the Democratic nominee against Bush in the 2004 presidential election. His film, An Inconvenient Truth, is up for the best documentary Oscar.

China Says Rich Countries Should Take Lead On Global Warming (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0129082

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 6 — China said Tuesday that wealthier countries must take the lead in curbing greenhouse gas emissions and refused to say whether it would agree to any mandatory emissions limits that might hamper its booming economy.

Jiang Yu, a spokeswoman for the Foreign Ministry, said China was willing to contribute to an international effort to combat global warming but placed the primary responsibility on richer, developed nations that have been polluting for much longer.

"It must be pointed out that climate change has been caused by the long-term historic emissions of developed countries and their high per capita emissions," she said, adding that developed countries have responsibilities for global warming "that cannot be shirked."

Ms. Jiang's comments, combined with another briefing on Tuesday by the country's leading climate expert, represented China's first official response to a landmark report issued last week by a United Nations panel of scientists that declared global warming is "unequivocal" and warned that immediate action must be taken to prevent harmful consequences.

China is the world's second largest emitter of the greenhouse gases contributing to climate change, trailing only the United States. Last November, the International Energy Agency in Paris predicted that China would pass the United States in emissions of carbon dioxide in 2009. China had been expected to surpass the United States as late as 2020, but its soaring consumption of coal has rapidly increased the country's emissions.

China derives nearly 70 percent of its energy from coal-fired power plants, many of them equipped with substandard pollution controls.

Chinese officials have long noted that China's per capita emissions remain well below the averages in wealthier countries, including the United States. Officials also argue that China remains a developing country without the financial resources or technological prowess to make a rapid shift to cleaner, more expensive energy technology.

China has not disputed the scientific rationale behind global warming or denied the potential harm it could cause. Later this year, China is expected to release broad policy goals on how it can reduce emissions and respond to global warming. In December, it issued a report warning that climate change posed a serious threat to the country's agricultural output and economy.

"The Chinese government is taking climate change extremely seriously," Qin Dahe, chief of the China Meteorological Administration, told reporters at the briefing. "President Hu Jintao has said that climate change is not just an environmental issue but also a development issue, ultimately a development issue."

Indeed, even if Chinese leaders acknowledge the problem, they remain resistant to any sweeping measures that could threaten the country's development. Some efforts are already meeting with uneven results.

Mr. Qin, who served as a co-chairman of the United Nations panel that issued the global warming report last week, noted that China had set an ambitious five-year goal of improving energy efficiency by 20 percent. But last year, the country failed to meet the initial target in that schedule.

China's standing as both a huge developing country and as one of the world's fastest-growing economies has given it prominence in the global warming debate. Along with India, China is exempt from the requirements of the Kyoto Protocol, the agreement that calls on industrial nations to reduce emissions by 2012. (The United States signed the agreement, but has not ratified it.)

Asked if China would agree to mandatory, specific targets to reduce emissions, Mr. Qin did not answer directly.

"As a developing country that's growing rapidly and has a big population, to thoroughly transform the energy structure and use clean energy would need a lot of money," Mr. Qin said, according to [a news agency].

Ms. Jiang, the Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, said China recently ordered a shutdown of dirtier coal-fired power plants that emitted 5.4 million tons of sulfur dioxide a year.

Meanwhile, China has been experiencing record warm temperatures this winter that scientists attribute at least partly to global warming. Temperatures in Beijing have soared into the 50s in February, a month when the historical average is just below freezing.

Legacy Of Radiation Illness Stirs Objection To Nevada Bomb Test (WP)

By Sonya Geis

Washington Post, February 7, 2007

ST. GEORGE, Utah -- When the baby boomers of St. George were children, radioactive ash from nuclear test explosions in Nevada regularly drifted toward the red bluffs of their town and fell like snow. They played in it and wrote their names in it on car windows.

The federal government reassured the townspeople they were in no danger as it detonated 952 bombs in Nevada over four decades. But thousands of people who lived downwind of the test site got radiation-related cancer, and the town of 50,000 has its own cancer-treatment center today.

So when word got out recently that the government wants to test a huge conventional bomb in Nevada, sending a mushroom cloud thousands of feet in the air, people in St. George felt an unwelcome blast from the past.

At a series of emotional meetings last month in Las Vegas, St. George, Salt Lake City and the Idaho capital of Boise, people who live downwind of the Nevada Test Site expressed fear that if the government goes ahead with its code-named Divine Strake test, radioactive dust from previous tests will blow their way.

"People here have been exposed to radiation already. We don't need any little extra push," St. George native Michelle Thomas said in her home last week.

Thomas, 54, has had cancer twice, in the breast and in a salivary gland, and had a pre-malignant ovary removed. She suffers from polymyositis, a muscle-degenerating autoimmune disease. Ever since she became too sick to work as a teacher, she has spent her time on anti-nuclear activism.

"Fool me once, shame on you. Fool me twice, shame on me," she said.

The Pentagon plans to test a 700-ton ammonium-nitrate-and-fuel-oil "bunker buster" weapon on the Nevada Test Site, a 1,375-square-mile chunk of desert. Divine Strake will demonstrate the impact on deeply buried tunnels should a U.S. complex be attacked, or should the United States attack a bunker in another country. No date for the test has been set.

The Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA) planned to conduct Divine Strake last June, but a Reno lawyer got an injunction to stop it. Robert Hager filed suit in April in federal court on behalf of the Western Shoshone tribe and people living downwind of the test site. A status hearing on the suit is scheduled for March 2.

Prompted by the lawsuit and outcry by lawmakers in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, the DTRA held a series of meetings and released a new environmental assessment.

Its studies predict a mushroom cloud will rise about 4,500 feet above the desert and then settle back in place. The amount of radiation that might be released at the boundaries of the test site will be equivalent to the amount released by a smoke detector, authorities said.

"The Nevada Test Site is one of the best-studied areas in terms of meteorology," said Darwin Morgan, a spokesman for the Nevada Site Office. "We know the volume of dust picked up from the explosion. We took the weather for the worst time period: January, with the highest winds. When you model to that, it stays on the test site.

"Now, will every single microscopic atom stay on the test site?" he continued. "No, you can't do that. But the bulk of the dust will remain on the test site."

Defense officials have looked at moving the test to another site, but they say the alternatives would cost $100 million and take three years of planning. Holding it in Nevada could be done this year for $5 million.

"My personal feeling is, rather than have people completely discombobulated, like they're doing, it would be better to have it somewhere else," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said. "If it costs $100 million more, that's better than having people scared to death and worrying they're going to suffer the same afflictions their families did."

Besides citing health concerns, Hager's lawsuit also charges the test would be held improperly on tribal land, and that the government is really seeking to test the effects of a nuclear bomb.

James Tegnelia, director of the DTRA, has acknowledged there is now no way to transport a single conventional bomb of the type Divine Strake will test. Also, budget documents from 2005 and 2006 say Divine Strake will simulate a "low yield nuclear weapon ground shock environment." But the agency has since disavowed the word "nuclear," and DTRA officials said they have no plans to test nuclear weapons in the future.

Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah), whose district includes St. George, is not convinced.

"There's no such thing as a 700-ton conventional weapon," Matheson said in an interview. "Make no mistake about it, there's an effort to move into creating new nuclear weapons."

Matheson's family suffered personally from fallout, and he is just as skeptical as some of his constituents about Defense Department assurances. Matheson's father, former Utah governor Scott Matheson, died of multiple myeloma, a rare cancer that can be linked to radiation exposure.

Like others in southern Nevada, he speaks bitterly of declassified documents that show the government did not detonate nuclear bombs when the wind blew toward Las Vegas. They waited until the wind blew toward St. George.

"The people in Utah have long memories," Matheson said. "They've been lied to before. The people in Utah are so patriotic, they're among the most supportive of the government in the nation, and the government has taken advantage of that. So I'm always skeptical when someone tells me not to worry about the testing of weapons."

Democrats Rip EPA Chief Over Reforms (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, February 7, 2007

The head of the Environmental Protection Agency faced down hostile critics Tuesday in his first committee appearance before the Democratic-led Congress, denying accusations that agency decisions last year rolled back environmental safeguards.

"These decisions and actions all accelerate the pace of environmental protection. They all deliver environmental results," EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson told the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

"Nobody's fooled by this," responded the new committee chair, Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer of California.

"EPA has gone too long without meaningful oversight," she said, contending the changes "benefit polluters' bottom line and they hurt our communities."

At issue were a number of changes EPA made last year, including a new policy that reduces the role of scientists in setting air pollution standards; a move to raise the threshold for reporting releases of toxic chemicals; and the shuttering of five agency libraries where the public could look at scientific and health documents.

A Government Accountability Office study released Tuesday said that EPA did not adhere to its own rule-making in making the changes to toxic chemicals reporting. The Toxic Reporting Inventory changes, said GAO, "will likely have a significant impact on information available to the public about dozens of toxic chemicals" at facilities nationwide.

Johnson said the new rule encourages businesses to adopt better waste management practices by allowing them to reduce emissions reporting if they do so. "My interest is to do anything I can to encourage businesses to reduce emissions," he said.

The EPA libraries were closed, Johnson said, because they got barely any visitors and the information they housed was being put on the Internet.

Boxer confronted him with internal agency e-mails and Web postings indicating more libraries were closed than he seemed to be aware of and suggesting EPA staff was ordered to throw away scientific journals at one library.

Johnson said some journals were discarded after they were contaminated by mold in a flood, and that in some cases documents were destroyed if there was more than one copy of them.

"Mr. Johnson, you're reading those notes very well, but you're unaware of what's happening in the agency," Boxer said.

Several Republicans on the panel defended Johnson, praising him for streamlining agency regulations and ridiculing the idea that poorly attended libraries were necessary.

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., held up a series of books and videos he said were at EPA libraries. One was "The Lorax" by Dr. Seuss. Another was called "Fat Chicks Rule! How to Survive in a Thin-centric World." There was also a pilates exercise video and a computer software guide from 1983.

Senator Grills EPA Chief Over `environmental Rollbacks' (MCT)

By David Whitney

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. Barbara Boxer, the new chair of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, lambasted the head of the Environmental Protection Agency over "environmental rollbacks" in a hearing on Tuesday that was equal parts political theater and substance.

Conducting her first oversight hearing since becoming the panel's head last month, the liberal California Democrat detailed six areas where she said the agency's decisions have benefited industries at the expense of public health.

"EPA has gone too long without meaningful oversight," Boxer said. "I want to send a clear signal to EPA and to this administration: We are watching . . . and no longer will EPA rollbacks quietly escape scrutiny."

EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson defended the agency's actions, telling the committee that the Bush administration has a solid record of environmental achievement, including new rules on diesel fuel that he touted as the "single greatest achievement in clean fuel since lead was removed from gasoline."

"Regardless of rhetoric, our environmental record is clear," he said. "America's air, water and land are cleaner today than it was a generation ago, and under the Bush administration this progress continues."

Boxer focused the hearing on rules or policy decisions that the EPA proposed over the last six months or so, many of them in December before the Democrats took control of Congress.

Among the changes were reducing the requirements for some big industries to detail their release of toxic pollutants; weakening the role of scientists in air quality decisions; proposing to revoke the standard for lead emissions; and other changes on industrial air pollution.

Boxer and other committee Democrats complained that the changes were often at the behest of industry, resulting in less public awareness of the health threats in people's communities. Another policy they attacked was the closure of five of 26 EPA libraries and reduced hours at others.

"The pattern of these year-end actions is striking," Boxer said. "The public interest is sacrificed and environmental protection compromised."

But Johnson, a 25-year EPA employee, said each of the rules Boxer raised was subject to misinterpretation. For example, he said, only companies that had eliminated or reduced other harmful emissions wouldn't have to report certain toxic pollutants in detail.

That change was one of the most controversial taken up at the hearing because those company reports become part of the national Toxic Release Inventory, a registry that allows people to look up on the Internet the toxic substances that plants vent in their neighborhoods.

The EPA regarded the change as an incentive for industry to cut pollution, Johnson said.

"The result is a cleaner environment for us all," he said.

Boxer zeroed in on the closure of the EPA libraries and employees' reports that large amounts of material was being discarded. Johnson insisted that only reports and journals of which the EPA had multiple copies were being pared.

When Boxer began grilling Johnson on the details, however, he quickly retreated, saying he had no information to answer her questions. But when the panel's senior Republican, Sen. James Inhofe of Oklahoma, asked Johnson about specific children's books and outdated computer manuals in the library collections, Johnson knew not only the titles but also the number of shelved copies.

Boxer said she was amazed by Johnson's knowledge of those books, but also that he was unaware that, as one agency staffer told her in an e-mail, 700 linear feet of journals, 25 percent of them "irreplaceable," were thrown out.

"E-mails have given us a story you apparently are unaware of," she told Johnson.

Republican committee members attempted to portray Boxer's concerns as trivial and the policy changes as prudent efforts at modernizing and streamlining.

"We are focusing on the wrong things," said Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond, R-Mo.

"I appreciate that you consider these small in comparison to other things," Boxer retorted. "That's why we have two (political) parties."

Mining Heat From The Earth? New Technology Shows Promise. (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, February 7, 2007

Here's one vision for easing America's energy and emissions woes: Hundreds of drilling rigs are deployed throughout the country. But they're not prospecting for oil; they're looking for underground rock hot enough to produce steam-driven electricity. The potential? Enough power to provide 10 percent of US electricity by 2050 – with near-zero emissions of greenhouse gases.

That's the promise of "enhanced geothermal systems," or EGS, says a recent report by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge, Mass.

There are just two major catches. First, about $800 million in research and development is needed over the next decade to make the drilling technology cost-effective. Second, the Department of Energy is trying to kill the program by ending its funding.

On Monday, the DOE unveiled a $24.3 billion fiscal 2008 budget with more funding for nuclear power, alternative fuels, and science programs – but nothing for geo- thermal.

"The department will conduct our own internal review and assessment of the [MIT] report and its recommendations," DOE spokesman Craig Stevens said in an e-mail. But geothermal energy has "already entered the mainstream," he added. The DOE aims to fund new technologies.

Some parts of the technology are indeed mature. For years, conventional geothermal technology has been tapping mostly hot springs formations in a few isolated locations in the Western US, providing about 0.3 percent of the nation's electricity. The newer, enhanced approach identified by MIT could be developed virtually anywhere.

"It appears that large areas of the United States are suitable for future geo- thermal exploitation in the near term that have not been considered in the past," states the recent report, sponsored by the DOE and written by an 18-member panel convened by MIT. "Most of the key technical requirements to make [it] work economically over a wide area of the country are in effect, with remaining goals easily within reach."

The report, released Jan. 22, corroborates other reports – by the National Renewable Energy Laboratory last year and the Western Governors Association in 2005 – of a massive "deep geothermal" resource.

"We should give strong credence to the MIT report," says Dan Reicher, former assistant secretary for energy efficiency and renewable energy in the Clinton years. "With these deep resources, we have the potential to access new energy over most of the country, including the East Coast. This is the moment to be adding to, not cutting, the geothermal R&D budget."

Since the 1970s, a few EGS systems have been tested in a half-dozen places in the US, and test systems are now being developed in France and Australia. The EGS promise has grown along with advances in oil and gas drilling technology and US-industry research partnerships.

Unlike drilling for oil, often done in softer, permeable rock, the enhanced geo- thermal approach requires boring down one to six miles into solid rock. Power plants would inject water down one well, passing it through crevices in the hot rock, then extract steam through another well. Federal research should focus on drilling, rock fracturing, and thermal energy conversion technologies, advocates say.

That's because the cost of digging wells can be as much as 60 percent of the total capital investment of a 25- to 100-megawatt geothermal plant, the MIT study says. Today, drilling a 23,000-foot-deep well into New Hampshire granite would cost about $15 million and take nearly half a year, the report estimates. By contrast, drilling a 15,800-foot-deep oil well in 2004 cost $7.5 million on average, the report says. Advocates say more research could dramatically reduce drilling costs.

"One and all, these recent reports agree there is an enormous resource out there [that] we're still learning how to use," says Karl Gawell, executive director of the Geo- thermal Energy Association, a Washington trade group. "That's why it's so ironic when the White House and DOE say, 'Hey, we're done. There's nothing out there left to learn.' It totally contradicts what the studies are saying."

Geothermal's research budget at DOE was $24 million in fiscal 2006 – the smallest among major federal renewable energy research. But at White House budget office urging, the department eliminated geothermal funding for 2007.

In response, Congress last fall voted to restore at least $5 million to keep the program alive. Last week, Congress moved to add $300 million to the DOE's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy – but left it up to the department to allocate some of those 2007 funds to geothermal. Now there is growing concern it won't happen.

"The administration has been surprisingly hostile to geothermal energy research development and deployment," Senate majority leader Harry Reid wrote in a Feb. 1 letter to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, obtained by the Monitor. Calling the zero budget for EGS in fiscal 2007 "counterproductive," Senator Reid asked the DOE to restore funding to at least 2006 levels and to assure Congress of continued funding. "Geothermal has the potential to cleanly and renewably satisfy the new electricity needs of the West," he wrote.

With such funding, the cost of enhanced geothermal power could fall from 8 to 9 cents a kilowatt hour today to less than 5 cents as the technology is deployed, making it competitive even with big coal-fired power plants, the MIT report says. Because EGS emits little carbon dioxide, it could become competitive with coal power if regulation makes carbon emissions costly.

One possible result: Geothermal plants could supply about 100,000 megawatts – the equivalent of 200 big coal-burning power plants – by 2050, according to the report. That power could help replace the 50,000 megawatts of coal-fired power and 40,000 megawatts of nuclear power that the US is expected to lose over the next 25 years as it closes old power plants.

Tax Break With A View (WSJ)

By Rachel Emma Silverman

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Muscoe R.H. Garnett Jr.'s farm in Loretto, Va., hasn't changed much since the family acquired it in the 1600s. Now, the retired insurance executive has made sure it will stay that way.

Encouraged by recent tax legislation, Mr. Garnett has placed a "conservation easement" on much of his property, located about 80 miles from Washington, D.C. The move permanently shields the rolling pastures, timber forests and croplands from being turned into a housing subdivision or business park. Under the easement, which is a binding agreement typically made with a land trust, the Garnett family still owns the land and can continue to use it for farming and timber but most of it can never be developed.

Landowners who place conservation easements on their scenic, environmentally sensitive or historic properties have long been able to get tax breaks from the federal government, and some states have also begun offering tax incentives. Now, a little-noticed provision in the wide-ranging pension law Congress passed last summer has made the federal tax breaks even more generous. Conservation groups say this has spurred a sharp increase in the number of landowners interested in placing easements on their property.

"The incentives are fantastic, and I don't think a lot of people realize it," Mr. Garnett says.

But the expanded federal incentives, backed by some influential lawmakers from agricultural states, are due to expire at the end of this year, unless Congress acts to extend them. (A bill recently introduced in the Senate would make the changes permanent, and President Bush also called for them to be made permanent in this week's budget proposal.) For now, landowners might need to act quickly, since conservation easements can take several months to put together.

Here's how it works: A landowner typically donates a conservation easement to a land trust, a type of non-profit organization that helps put together the easement and monitors its restrictions over time. The value of the donation for income-tax purposes generally is the difference between the land's unrestricted value and its new value with limited development or usage rights.

Be careful, though. The Internal Revenue Service and Congress in recent years have been concerned with easement abuses in which donors have taken inflated deductions or placed restrictions on land with little conservation value, such as golf courses. The new law includes stiffer rules and penalties regarding appraisals, to prevent donors from overstating the deduction for their land. The IRS says it is currently auditing hundreds of easements.

But the law is designed to encourage easement donations by allowing larger tax deductions. Landowners can now deduct the value of a donation up to 50% of their adjusted gross income per year, up from the previous ceiling of 30%. That means if your adjusted gross income is $100,000, you are now eligible for as much as a $50,000 tax deduction a year, instead of $30,000. And if your income is too low to deduct the full amount of your gift in one year, you can now carry forward the deduction for 15 additional years, up from five years previously.

Property held in family limited partnerships, limited liability companies and some types of corporations may also be able to take advantage of the increased deduction limits, says Stephen J. Small, a Boston tax lawyer who specializes in conservation easements.

The law is even more generous for career farmers and ranchers who earn at least half their income from their land. These property owners, who are often land-rich, but cash-poor, can now deduct up to 100% of their income. "If you're a farmer you could pay no federal income taxes for 16 years," says Rand Wentworth, president of the Land Trust Alliance, a coalition of 1,600 land trusts across the country.

Colorado rancher Jay Fetcher in recent years placed conservation easements on two large parcels of his 2,000-acre cattle ranch near ski resort Steamboat Springs. The first donation, on 1,350 acres, was worth about $1.1 million for tax purposes. But Mr. Fetcher, limited at the time to deducting a small portion of his income, was able to take only about $60,000 of that donation in deductions over six years. "We left almost all of the donation on the table," he says.

Mr. Fetcher is planning this year to make another easement donation on 270 acres to a Colorado land trust. He expects the value of the donation will be about $1.2 million, and thinks he will be able to recoup roughly half that amount because of the higher federal tax deductions and an increase in state tax credits. "The changes helped us," says Mr. Fetcher. Still, he says the financial incentives are secondary to his desire to preserve the land, in his family since 1949, with its sweeping views of mountains and pine forest. "Our family has no desire to ever see the ranch developed. That's at the beginning of it all," says Mr. Fetcher.

The tax-rule change has generated sharply increased interest in conservation easements, say land trust officials from Washington and Wyoming to Georgia. "Some landowners whom we've been talking to for five or almost 10 years say that now it makes economic sense for them," says Laurie Wayburn, president of the Pacific Forest Trust in San Francisco.

Conservation easements can generate other tax benefits, too. They can cut estate taxes, because the land is considered to be worth less under an easement. A growing number of states offer a range of income tax breaks. Colorado and Virginia, for example, give donors state income tax credits that are transferable, which means that landowners who don't need the tax credits can sell the credits to other taxpayers for instant cash. You may even get a property tax break, depending on where you live.

Conservation easements can vary. A farm owner, for instance, could still retain the right to farm the land and to build a couple additional homes or barns, but could limit the land from being further subdivided. Property owners can sell their land, but buyers are obligated to honor the easement.

Peter Bance recently placed a conservation easement on 65 acres of the Virginia farmland that has been in his family since 1840. The property was zoned to allow construction of six housing sites, and he donated the rights to five of those sites to a state-run land trust. (He kept one site in case a descendant wanted to build a house in the future.) "We think we have a piece of heaven and we hope to keep it that way for generations to come," says Mr. Bance, 55, who is an executive with Wachovia Corp.

If you're thinking of doing a conservation easement, it's best to contact a land trust in your area to find out if your property qualifies. (Try www.lta.org, the Web site of the Land Trust Alliance.) There's no minimum size, but in order to get a tax deduction the property has to meet certain criteria, such as having significant environmental, scenic or historic value. Also, be sure to work with a tax and legal adviser familiar with local applicable laws.

The land has to be appraised (try www.appraisers.org, the Web site of the American Society of Appraisers) and may need to be surveyed, which can cost a few thousand dollars. There are also legal fees to draw up the easement, which can cost several thousand dollars, depending on the complexity of the deal. Some land trusts also recommend landowners make cash donations to the land trust to help fund the organization's future monitoring of the easement.

Because easements are placed in perpetuity, a family has to be sure it wants to permanently restrict development -- and the potential for a big windfall -- before committing.

Several months ago, after discussions with his wife, children and grandchildren, Eslick Daniel placed a conservation easement on his 200-acre farm in Columbia, Tenn., near Nashville. The easement on the farm, called "Sweet Easy," limits development, except for a couple of building sites that Dr. Daniel's descendants could use for housing. For Dr. Daniel, 65 years old and a retired orthopedic surgeon, the tax incentives weren't a factor. "We wanted to keep it where it would be open land for our family and for other people," he says.

House Committee Approves Bill To Combat Indian Meth Use (AP)

WASHINGTON -- A House subcommittee on Tuesday took a step toward helping Indian communities battle crisis levels of methamphetamine use.

A House Judiciary subcommittee passed legislation sponsored by New Mexico Rep. Tom Udall, a Democrat, that would allow territories and Indian tribes to receive law enforcement grants to battle meth use.

Udall said larger meth legislation passed by Congress last year "unintentionally left out" Indian tribes as possible applicants for some grant programs. This legislation would clarify that law so the tribes would be eligible.

He noted that meth use has been disproportionately worse in Native American communities, citing a 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health. That study reported a "past year methamphetamine use" rate of 1.7 percent for American Indians and Alaska Natives and 2.2 percent for Native Hawaiians.

Ben Shelly, vice president of the Navajo Nation, also testified at the hearing.

"The escalating problem of methamphetamine is affecting the entire nation and has reached epidemic levels," Shelly said. "Methamphetamine use and production places tremendous burden on the already severely underfunded Indian health care system and law enforcement."

The full committee will consider the legislation Wednesday. It is expected to pass the bill, which will then move to the House floor.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Combating Threat Of Cross-border Gangs Discussed (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Rodrigo Avila-Aviles came to Los Angeles from El Salvador this week to discuss an export-import problem that has nothing to do with tariffs or quotas.

As director general of the El Salvador National Civil Police, Avila-Aviles is here to talk to the FBI about what can be done about the number of gang members moving back and forth between Central America and the United States.

Once here, they learn new ways to menace neighborhoods before they are deported, the director general said.

"As a general rule, the guys who have more status in the gangs in El Salvador are the ones who have been deported from the United States, who have been in prison here," Avila-Aviles said Tuesday as he and the heads of police forces for four other Central American nations prepared to discuss the issue today with their U.S. counterparts.

In Guatemala, there are up to 20,000 gang members, about 1,000 of them deportees from the U.S., according to Erwin Johann Sperisen-Vernon, director general of the Guatemala National Civil Police.

"These deportees come to our country and organize and spread their franchises there," Sperisen-Vernon said. "They get more sophisticated in their ways of committing crime."

But the traffic goes both ways, with U.S. law enforcement struggling to deal with an influx of gang members from Central America and Mexico. Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said the large number of such criminal gang members illegally in the United States is making gang violence worse.

Law enforcement executives hope the three-day meeting at the Universal City Hilton will help them find solutions while learning from one another.

"The effort is to continue to inform, educate and develop relationships so we can have a much more concentrated effort internationally on dealing with our gang problems," said Bratton, who will address the meeting today.

Also attending will be the heads of law enforcement in Mexico, Belize and Honduras, as well as representatives of the FBI, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the federal Drug Enforcement Agency, and police chiefs from Los Angeles and other U.S. cities.

The extent of the cross-border problem was made clear during a recent raid on gang members involved in violent extortion schemes in one El Salvadoran town. Of the 120 people arrested, 40 had been deported at least once from the U.S., Avila-Aviles said.

Although gangs in El Salvador include some with names tied to the Los Angeles area — the 18th Street and MS-13 gangs for instance — Avila-Aviles is quick to add that he does not blame the U.S. for the problem.

"These guys are Salvadoran," he said. "They learn all this stuff in this country, but I cannot blame the United States for deporting them. However, even though the U.S. is not to blame, we need to look out for new mechanisms so we have more control over these guys."

Cooperative measures announced as part of a four-part plan this week by U. S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales include fugitive apprehension, international coordination on deportations, information sharing, and cross-border training and prevention programs.

To better identify, track and apprehend gang members, the FBI will accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, Gonzales said.

"This initiative will enable the United States and our colleagues in Central America to share information and coordinate law enforcement efforts as we work in partnership to target and dismantle violent gangs," Gonzales said.

Eighty out of every 100 homicides in El Salvador are gang-related, according to Avila-Aviles.

"If we put it together as a whole, the single most important criminal problem in our country is the gang activity," he said.

The directors general from El Salvador and Guatemala say they want the meeting's discussions also to focus on ways to prevent young people from joining gangs.

"We need some regional initiatives in the prevention area," Avila-Aviles said.

Central America's Top Cops In LA For International Gang Summit (MERCN)

By Andrew Glazer

The San Jose Mercury News, February 7, 2007

LOS ANGELES - Not long ago, the U.S. regularly deported convicted gang members to their home countries in Central America without tipping off local police of their criminal past, the director of El Salvador's national police said Tuesday on the eve of an international summit on gangs.

Los Angeles' pervasive and violent street gangs were seen as a local problem and not part of an international criminal web, even as some gangs such as MS-13 and 18th Street, oozed across borders into Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras.

The three-day summit beginning Wednesday in Los Angeles reflects a recent shift in that philosophy. It features top officials from several Central American and local U.S. police departments, along with the FBI.

Seminar participants said gang members have been taking advantage of the lack of information sharing to cross borders unidentified by local police - bringing weapons, ideas for criminal enterprise and rivalries.

"Now it is most important to take advantage of technology, of our shared economic interests and of our information to find new ways to make sure these violent gangs don't continue to find ways of staying in the dark," said Rodrigo Avila Avilez, director general of El Salvador's national police.

Earlier this week in El Salvador, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announced an initiative to improve anti-gang cooperation between the two countries that will ease the arrest of fugitives, coordinate training and improve information sharing and gang intelligence gathering.

Avila Avilez estimated there were as many as 15,000 gang members in El Salvador, a country of about 6.8 million. There are about 6,000 gang members in Guatemala, a country of 12.3 million, said Ervin Johann Sperisen Vernon, director general of Guatemala's national police.

By comparison, police estimate Los Angeles County has about 40,000 gang members.

The spread of Los Angeles-style gangs to Central America is in part the result of mass deportations of young men indoctrinated in the city's violent streets after fleeing their home countries during the civil wars of the 1970s and 80s. In many cases, gang members raised in Los Angeles have more in common culturally with the city than their home countries, police officials said.

"In El Salvador, they speak Spanglish, or Spanish with a Mexican accent," Avila Avilez said. "It gives them a privileged status among fellow gang members."

Robert B. Loosle, who oversees the FBI's gang investigations in Los Angeles, said crimes committed by gangs in Central America serve as a bellwether for potential criminal enterprises in the U.S.

Particularly noteworthy, Loosle said, was a spike in extortion rackets committed by gangs in El Salvador. Armed members of MS-13 regularly shake down neighborhoods for protection money and demand taxes from bus and truck drivers passing through their turf.

"Since members of gangs travel freely across borders, we need to pay attention to new trends they bring with them," Loosle said.

Sperisen Vernon said gangs in Guatemala are increasingly recruiting young children to deal drugs, stash dirty money and even kill rivals.

"It's much more complicated to jail minors," he said.

He and Avila Avilez both mentioned another disturbing trend: the spread of gang recruitment from the disillusioned poor to children from good homes who are too afraid to remain unaffiliated.

"There is a saying in some El Salvador neighborhoods," Avila Avilez said. "It is, 'If you're not in a gang, then you're against gangs.'"

L.A. Exports Gang Terror (LADN)

By Rachel Uranga, Staff Writer

Los Angeles Daily News, February 7, 2007

Bratton to open world summit focusing on links to Central America

Acknowledging that Los Angeles is the epicenter of a global gang crisis, fueling violence from Guatemala to Russia, law enforcement officials from around the world will meet this week to tackle the scourge.

LAPD Chief William Bratton will open a three-day summit today to discuss the migration of gang members from Southern California to their homelands, bringing a culture of violence and terror.

"We are seeing the international gang problem growing by leaps and bounds," said Lt. Gary Nanson, head of the Los Angeles Police Department's Valley gang unit. "They have opened up the door for the local criminal. They are more worldly in their ability to franchise, they can move stolen goods or narcotics or money across boundaries."

The summit will focus on gangs with ties to Central America. Becoming increasingly sophisticated and murderous, these transnational gangs - such as the U.S.-grown Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13 - are ravaging poor Central American communities and terrorizing Los Angeles neighborhoods.

The techniques are increasingly similar on both sides of the border.

In El Salvador, officials say, gang members commit half of the country's homicides. But there, gang members have derailed the city's infrastructure. In December 2005, Salvadoran gangs demanding "taxes" killed a series of bus drivers, shutting down service.

Local police are afraid some of the more brazen tactics Central American gangs use will emerge in Los Angeles.

"Their tactics are a lot more vicious than other gangs, they are more violent and they are everywhere," said Robert Loofle, the FBI agent overseeing Los Angeles' criminal division. "They use intimidation to get what they want, they will commit a vicious homicide to show their power and the force, then easily cross the border.

"We have to clamp down now so they don't evolve into something stronger and more vicious."

Cooperation needed

Key to slowing gang activity is better cooperation among police agencies in all countries - an item officials will focus on this week. All are clamoring for better intelligence.

Now, local law enforcement agencies contact other countries when they are looking for a suspect to be extradited. With increased cooperation, federal and local authorities hope they can eventually share surveillance on gang members and knowledge of their activities.

"Our fear is that they become franchises and unwittingly help other organizations like narco-traffickers as muscle or transporting money," Loofle said.

In areas of the San Fernando Valley, where transnational gangs such as MS 13 and 18th Street have taken root in North Hollywood and Van Nuys in recent years, violent gang crime has soared.

DOJ_NMG_0129091

Most troubling, police say, is the rising level of witness intimidation, which criminal organizations use to keep their members out of jail. In the North Hollywood area, the number of intimidation cases rose 85 percent in 2005-06, from 13 to 24.

"The part that scares us is that the percentage of increase of violent gang crime is higher in the Valley than any other regions ... we need to act fast," Nanson said.

Last year the San Fernando Valley saw a 42 percent increase in violent gang crime and citywide, gang crime jumped 14 percent. There has also been a rise in hate crimes among gang members.

New anti-gang effort

The summit comes a day before Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa is set to release a sweeping anti-gang effort and follows a high-profile report finding the city's gang prevention piecemeal and ineffective.

Community activists have lobbied for intervention efforts such as lengthening school hours and providing job opportunities. But stopping the spread of gangs - who can call on strong family ties and rooted criminal networks in both countries - will prove tough.

"The idea of eradicating them is erroneous and the way of totally severing the ties is misconceived," said Tom Ward, a University of Southern California expert on Central American gangs. "As long as you have migrants coming back, how are you going to determine which one is a gang member or an ex-gang member?

"Gangs are a reflection of society, they are symptom of sick societies, you address the social problems that bred the gangs and they won't necessarily go away but the problems they cause will be significantly diminished," Ward said.

Federal crackdown

Responding to the surge in gang activity nationally, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in 2005 launched Operation Community Shield targeting gangs across the U.S.

Under the effort, more than 4,302 street-gang members from 442 gangs were arrested, about one-fourth of those on pending criminal charges.

Over the past decade, as hundreds of gang members have been deported - immigration officials have no official estimate of just how many - and others returned home, a new gang culture emerged in their home country.

"It used to be for kids in the poor neighborhoods ... Now it's kids from well-to-do homes," said Rodrigo Avila, El Salvador's top law enforcement official. "They are forced into it, under pressure."

21 In Dorchester, Quincy Arrested (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Charles A. Radin, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 3, 2007

Called members of drug rings tying Canada to Boston area

They worked out of nondescript little storefronts around Dorchester and Quincy: a flower shop, nail salon, grocery store, and wood floor finishing business. But yesterday law enforcement officials said the unidentified businesses were covers for members of Vietnamese drug rings who had been smuggling ecstasy and marijuana from Canada over the past two years and peddling it throughout Greater Boston.

Four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday and unsealed yesterday charged 23 people, ranging in age from 22 to 56, with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering.

"This ecstasy was manufactured in clandestine laboratories in Canada, then smuggled into the United States, ending up in Boston and further distributed to gangs and other buyers in the city," said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Boston office.

The alleged drug organization was dismantled from top to bottom by investigators who targeted the Canadian supplier and arrested local gangs that sold the drugs in the Boston area, Stansbury told reporters during a news conference yesterday.

The investigation started when an immigrant, who was facing possible deportation in February 2005 after his arrest on charges involving drugs, guns, and an assault on a police officer, began cooperating with Boston police and the DEA and identified a list of local drug dealers, according to an affidavit filed in federal court.

A task force of federal agents, state troopers, and local police tapped telephones, sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials.

Investigators seized 85,000 ecstasy pills, worth nearly $2.6 million on the street, 130 pounds of marijuana, five guns, and $25,000.

Law enforcement officials raided houses in Dorchester and Quincy yesterday and arrested 21 of those charged.

The remaining two suspects were being sought last night, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0129092

US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said the indictments "will have an immediate and positive impact on the city of Boston and the neighboring communities."

Some of the ecstasy pills seized were laced with methamphetamine, which was added by the manufacturer to make the drug more addictive.

Sullivan called the mixture "a dangerous trend" that has been developing across the country over the past few years.

Boston Police Commissioner Edward F. Davis said, "These drugs that were being sold on the streets of our city were destroying the qualify of life for people and driving the crime rate up."

Among those indicted were a family that lives on Bloomfield Street in Dorchester, including Tiem Trinh , 54; his wife, Anna , 51; and their sons Antwon Trinh , 24, and Quoc Boa Trinh, 27.

Quoc Boa Trinh, an alleged ringleader, is charged in three separate indictments with conspiring to sell ecstasy and marijuana and money laundering.

His parents and brother are charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana.

Boston lawyer Michael C. Andrews, who is representing Quoc Boa Trinh, said his client works at his father's convenience store, TJ Variety, and is "a hard-working young man from a good family."

His client is "looking forward to his day in court," Andrews said.

A neighbor of the Trinhs said they "were very nice people."

"I don't know much about them, but we never had any trouble," the neighbor said.

The family had lived in the house for more than two years, the neighbor said.

But affidavits filed in federal court offered a different portrait.

A witness told investigators that Quoc Boa Trinh wore a bulletproof vest, owned a couple of guns, and obtained up to 300 pounds of marijuana a week from his supplier, Tan Dinh Phung, 43, of Dorchester. Phung was also arrested yesterday.

Last night, investigators were searching for Hung Van Le, 37, of Revere and Van H. Nguyen, 25, of Dorchester.

Affidavits also assert that Nguyen and another man indicted , Long T. Vu, picked up 40,000 ecstasy pills in Buffalo in December. They were stopped by Massachusetts State Police, who seized the drugs. Vu, 23, of Christy Lane in Randolph, is in custody.

Newton Man Faces Federal Drug Charges (DNT)

Newton (MA) Daily Tribune, February 6, 2007

BOSTON - A Newton man is among 23 people indicted by a federal grand jury on drug charges stemming from a 15-month investigation known as Operation Polar Express, a U.S. Attorney's Office spokeswoman said.

The four federal indictments and several search warrants were unsealed Friday, following the arrests of 23 men and women on conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute Ecstasy and marijuana, spokeswoman Samantha Martin said.

Vinh Dung Diep, 26, of 197 Linwood Ave., Newton, is charged with one count and faces up to five years in prison if convicted, she said.

Others arrested are from Dorchester, Quincy, Randolph, Revere, Allston, New York, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Operation Polar Express targeted wholesale and retail illegal drug distributors in Massachusetts and their sources of supply in Canada and other parts of the United States, Martin said.

According to documents filed in the case, a Drug Enforcement Administration task force had been investigating marijuana and Ecstasy distribution in Boston since October 2005.

The investigation included surveillance; wiretaps; undercover drug buys; "trash pulls;" and the seizure of drugs, firearms and other drug paraphernalia, during traffic stops and home searches, documents state.

Martin said about 85,000 Ecstasy pills and 100 pounds of marijuana have been seized.

"Complete cooperation among federal, state, and local law enforcement partners made it possible to dismantle this drug-dealing organization," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan. "(These) indictments demonstrate our resolve to make our neighborhoods safer by reducing the availability of drugs in our communities and prosecuting those who peddle their poison."

June W. Stansbury, DEA special agent in charge, said the drugs were marketed using images such as Superman, a bat, a kangaroo and even the Statue of Liberty.

"It's ironic that a group of traffickers who chose to use our symbol of liberty now face losing theirs," she said.

Former Drug Boss Sent To Prison For Life For Cocaine Ring (DDN)

Dayton Daily News, February 6, 2007

DAYTON — An ex-Los Angeles drug boss was sentenced Monday in federal court to life in prison for supplying hundreds of pounds of cocaine to the Dayton area.

DOJ_NMG_0129093

A jury in September convicted Ronald Taylor, 47, on charges accusing him of operating a continuing criminal enterprise and conspiracy to distribute and possess more than 300 pounds of cocaine.

The operation funneled cocaine from L.A. to Dayton, Columbus, New York City, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Detroit, Nashville and Washington, D.C., between September 1999 and July 2001, prosecutors said.

Senior U.S. Judge Walter H. Rice sentenced Taylor.

Prosecutors Tie Kiel Problems To Gambling (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 7, 2007

Attorney says losses at casinos may be addressed in talks

Frequent gambling losses at area casinos apparently led Chargers safety Terrence Kiel to seek other means of income, including the shipping of codeine-based cough syrup that got him arrested last year, law enforcement authorities said.

Officials were told in their investigation that gambling is "exactly what caused the problem, that he was in over his head because he gambles too much," San Diego Deputy District Attorney Damon Mosler said.

Kiel, 26, is due in court today for a trial readiness hearing on five felony charges related to the cough syrup matter. Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, said he hoped to reach a deal with prosecutors and the judge, and that it could include Kiel's addressing of the gambling issue.

"The issue of gambling may be addressed," Grimes said. "But we don't know for sure. That's one of the things that could be part of the deal or it could not be."

Law enforcement sources said gambling was suspected because selling codeine-based cough syrup isn't very lucrative and that records show Kiel had dozens of cash transactions of at least $10,000 each at area casinos.

Grimes declined to address the specifics of the gambling issue.

Kiel also has been under investigation by Immigration and Customs Enforcement for transactions involving counterfeit Nike shoes from China. Grimes said he didn't expect charges in that case.

Said General Manager A.J. Smith: "We are very much aware of Terrence's personal and legal situation. We think it's best he addresses them, not us."

While Kiel has one year remaining on his contract, it appears unlikely he will return to the Chargers in 2007.

Smith would not address whether Kiel would be a Charger beyond this month, but he said recently in response to a question about Kiel's status with the team: "We've had a lot of problems this year, and we'll clean up a little bit of our mess."

Gambling issues with players long have been a concern for the NFL, which considers them a threat to its security and integrity.

Kiel's salary was $460,000 last year, his fourth with the Chargers. He signed a six-year, $3.71 million contract as a rookie, which included a $1.25 million signing bonus.

Mosler said prosecutors and the judge could ask Kiel to do community service as part of any deal that is reached. Such community service could include speaking on the dangers of drugs or gambling.

"The idea is not to see him again," Mosler said.

Records show Kiel has struggled with financial problems in the past year. On Sept. 7, a notice of default was filed by a loan corporation against Kiel, seeking payment of $16,610 from a $591,634 mortgage. The property no longer is being foreclosed. In 2005, Kiel obtained a $50,000 home equity line of credit. When $49,438 became due, Kiel "refused to pay," according to the lender. The case was settled in April.

Prosecutors allege Kiel was illegally obtaining codeine-based cough syrup from a friend, Hope Devina Vines, who worked at a San Diego pharmacy and was stealing it from her employer. Vines, a licensed pharmacy technician at Sharp Rees-Stealy in San Diego, has been arrested on felony charges of theft and possession of a controlled substance in connection with the case. Kiel and Vines have pleaded not guilty and both are expected in court today.

Kiel was arrested in September after Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two express mail packages containing 18 pint bottles full of the drug. Authorities said Kiel admitted to shipping the cough syrup to his native Texas, where it can sell for up to $325 on the street and where it is mixed with soft drinks.

In an unrelated matter, the San Diego city attorney's office has charged Kiel with public urination, a violation of the municipal code. Police cited Kiel in the Gaslamp Quarter in December.

3 Plead Guilty In Drug Ring (CP)

Connecticut Post, February 7, 2007

BRIDGEPORT — The front for the cocaine distribution ring was an auto dealership on Barnum Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0129094

The carriers were often cars packed with cocaine and driven here from New York.

Once unloaded, the cocaine was cut, packaged and distributed throughout Fairfield County and the Naugatuck Valley.

That is, until the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's High Intensity Drug Task Force wiretapped telephones at East End Auto on Barnum Avenue and videotaped drug deals.

Three more ring members — including Luis "Papo" Robles, 42, of Evelyn Road, Derby, who owned East End Auto — pleaded guilty this week, just before the scheduled start of their trial on cocaine trafficking charges.

Robles; Raul Reyes, 36, of Main Street; and Michael Harding, 31, of Karen Avenue, all pleaded guilty to conspiring to possess with the intent to distribute cocaine.

U.S. District Judge Stefan R. Underhill set May 3 for sentencing. Robles and Reyes face a mandatory minimum 10-year prison term and a maximum life sentence. Harding faces a maximum 30-year term.

During his guilty plea, Robles acknowledged that he attempted to obstruct the probe by threatening witnesses.

The three guilty pleas bring to 13 the number of ring members who have admitted their roles in the operation.

Ryan Persad, 44, of Horton Hill Road; Ignacio Vasquez, 31, of Berkshire Avenue; and Isabel Pagan, 30, of Palisade Avenue, have maintained their innocence and are awaiting trial.

The defendants were rounded up last April. At the same time, DEA agents conducted 11 searches in Bridgeport, Derby and Naugatuck in which they seized $125,000 cash, six cars, three and a half pounds of cocaine and 500 grams of crack.

Police from Ansonia, Bridgeport, Derby, Easton, Greenwich, New Canaan, Newtown, Norwalk, Stratford, Stamford and West Haven assisted in the probe.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys H. Gordon Hall and James Smart are prosecuting the cases.

North Dakota Issues First Hemp Production Licenses To 2 Farmers (AP)

By Blake Nicholson, Associated Press

AP, February 6, 2007

DEA still must approve

BISMARCK, N.D. – North Dakota issued the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp Tuesday to two farmers who still must meet federal requirements before they can plant the crop.

The farmers must get approval from the Drug Enforcement Administration, which treats hemp much the way it does marijuana and has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it.

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana that contains trace amounts of the chemical that causes a marijuana high, though hemp does not produce the same effects. The sturdy, fibrous plant is used to make an assortment of products including paper, rope, clothing and cosmetics.

Industrial hemp cultivation is legal in Canada and other countries but is banned in the United States. Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp can shield the growing of marijuana, although hemp supporters say that fear is unfounded.

The North Dakota Agriculture Department approved rules late last year for hemp production with the DEA's concerns in mind, State Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson has said.

The state issued permits Tuesday to Wayne Hauge and Dave Monson, who is also a legislator. The state Agriculture Department is processing 16 other hemp applications, Johnson said.

“It's taken us a lot longer than (expected) to get here, and I'm thinking we still have a ways to go,” said Monson, the House assistant Republican majority leader.

Joseph Rannazzisi, an administrator with the DEA, said federal law does not allow the agency to delegate its ability to regulate hemp to state officials. Although the DEA may waive registration requirements, it has done so only for law enforcement officers and other officials, he said.

Johnson asked the DEA in December to waive its $2,293 registration fee, but federal officials rejected that request. Johnson said he will hand-deliver Hauge's and Monson's applications when he meets with DEA officials in Washington early next week to try again to persuade them to relax the annual fee requirement.

North Dakota is one of seven states that have authorized industrial hemp farming. The others are Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Montana and West Virginia, according to Vote Hemp, an industrial hemp advocacy organization based in Bedford, Mass.

Hemp Farming Licensees Have Different Plans (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

BISMARCK, N.D. The first two North Dakota farmers to be licensed to grow industrial hemp have different plans for their future crops, assuming the federal government allows them to be cultivated.

DOJ_NMG_0129095

Dave Monson of Osnabrock, in northeastern North Dakota, and Wayne Hauge of Ray, in the northwestern corner of the state, on Tuesday received the first two licenses issued under new state rules for growing the crop.

Hemp can be used to make numerous products, from food to clothing, and Monson said he has received calls from potential buyers as far away as Taiwan. Monson, who also is a state lawmaker, wants to sell both hemp seed and fiber.

"I hope to capitalize on every part of (the plant)," he said. "There will be no problem finding a market."

Hauge said he wants to grow and sell registered hemp seed to other farmers.

"I think it's a viable crop," he said. "I think it would work well in rotations in both eastern and western North Dakota."

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana and falls under federal anti-drug rules, even though it does not produce a high. That means farmers licensed by North Dakota to grow hemp must also obtain approval from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, which is not certain.

The annual federal registration fee is $2,293. Monson said the federal fee to import seed from Canada, where hemp is legally grown, would be an additional $1,147, though he and state Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson said one person could import seed for several farmers.

The state license costs a minimum of $202. Monson said with licensing, registration and seed expenses, "before you even get out of the chute you're looking at $400 an acre (in costs)."

Hemp still can be profitable, Monson said.

"You're looking at $500 an acre for seed and whatever you can get for fiber ... $100 per acre for straw would be realistic," he said. Organically grown hemp could fetch as much as $900 per acre, Monson said.

If he gets federal permission, Monson plans to seed 10 acres of industrial hemp this spring to "test the waters." Hauge plans to grow 100 acres.

Both farmers also grow other crops, including the more traditional wheat and barley. Monson also grows canola, and Hauge last year experimented with black beans.

Neither farmer plans to build a fence around his hemp field. A fence is not part of the state licensing requirements, though one would be needed under federal rules.

"They have this additional crazy requirement that is designed for drugs," Johnson said. "Chain-link, razor-wire topped, 10 to 12 feet high, 24-hour surveillance."

Johnson has urged the DEA to ease its rules, and plans to meet with officials in Washington, D.C., again early next week to "request that they work in every way possible with us."

Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp crops could shield stands of illegal marijuana. Supporters of legalizing hemp cultivation say that fear is unfounded.

In a related development, the North Dakota House on Tuesday approved legislation that gives North Dakota State University the authority to import and resell industrial hemp seed. The bill now goes to the Senate.

GOP Lawmakers Press Bush On Afghanistan (LAT)

By Josh Meyer, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

Four leading House members call for new tactics to turn the tide in the fight against insurgents and drugs.

WASHINGTON — Four ranking Republican lawmakers on a committee with oversight of U.S. policy in Afghanistan are calling on the Pentagon and State Department to dramatically change their tactics in that country to better contain its growing insurgency and flow of opium to the rest of the world.

In a letter dated today, the GOP House members are urging the Bush administration to act quickly to counter a host of problems in Afghanistan that they say are being made worse by mismanagement and misplaced priorities. They are calling for the appointment of a special coordinator of overall narco-terrorism policy for Afghanistan to prevent losing the fight against insurgents and drug traffickers.

The letter describes in detail how various U.S. agencies such as the Pentagon, State Department and Drug Enforcement Administration are not working together and essentially are fighting separate wars against insurgents and drugs even though they believe that the booming heroin trade is fueling the insurgency and financing terrorist attacks.

"As we will soon face another massive opium harvest in Afghanistan, and a related spring offensive by anti-coalition militants (ACMs), it is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for Al Qaeda. We need to act now to prevent that," wrote Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), Mike Pence (R-Ind.), Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) and Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach), all members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The letter was sent late Tuesday to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, with copies delivered to the White House, DEA, Office of National Drug Control Policy and the British government, said a senior congressional staffer who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the letter.

The four Republicans say they may introduce legislation to enact and fund some of their proposals, but urge the White House to quickly implement other policy changes on its own. Democrats in Congress also have complained about rising drug trafficking and the growing insurgency in Afghanistan.

White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said he had not seen the letter and could not comment on the lawmakers' requests. But he said the administration had been actively reassessing its policies in Afghanistan in recent months as part of a comprehensive "strategic review," which prompted senior officials to call for at least $10.6 billion in additional funding for Afghanistan over the next two years.

The new funding was a recognition "that we needed to make a larger effort … so that we can help the Afghan government succeed and we can defeat the Taliban," Johndroe said. "But obviously our counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics programs in Afghanistan work hand in hand. This is something that our people are coordinating on the ground."

The additional funding, though much needed in Afghanistan, is virtually worthless without a coordinated policy that ensures that all U.S. counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics agencies are working together, and not against each other, the senior congressional official asserted. "We have so many different views of narcotics within our own government and with our allies that somebody has to bang everybody's heads together and get something done on this," the staffer said. "We are out of time, and losing Afghanistan."

The Republican House members also said the United States must resolve a growing dispute with Britain over how to best fight the booming opium trade. British authorities who are now in charge of much of the counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan are refusing to go along with a controversial U.S. policy to eradicate entire fields of poppy by aerial spraying.

Britain, as well as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which leads the forces battling the insurgency in Afghanistan, believes the U.S. policy is dangerous because it alienates farmers and the population at large and undermines Western efforts to turn them against the narco-traffickers and the Taliban, several U.S. and British counter-terrorism officials said.

The senior congressional staffer said the four lawmakers didn't want to get into the middle of the dispute over whether poppy eradication should be stopped. Instead, they want the U.S. government and its allies to more forcefully go after kingpins who preside over global narcotics trafficking enterprises that together bring in more than $2 billion a year in wholesale drug profits.

They are urging the Bush administration to force the Pentagon to provide more operational assistance to DEA agents operating in Afghanistan and to order the arrests of senior-level drug traffickers under a provision of the Patriot Act passed last year that allows such suspects to be extradited to the United States for prosecution.

A similar campaign has worked well in Colombia and is urgently needed in Afghanistan because that country has no judicial infrastructure to prosecute drug traffickers, the lawmakers say. "We must establish deterrence where none now exists," their letter says.

They also are urging the Pentagon to make good on a promise to provide at least eight Russian-made Mi-17 helicopters to Afghan authorities and their U.S. counter-narcotics advisors for the drug war, along with qualified pilots and maintenance and operational support.

"We have waited long enough to get this vital air lift…," the lawmakers' letter says. "We need someone put in charge of getting this done now, enough time has gone by already."

Venezuela: Nation Doesn't Need U.S. Aid (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuela's foreign minister on Tuesday dismissed the U.S. government's decision to cut anti-drug aid to the South American nation, saying it does not need money from "the devil."

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Monday that President Bush's proposed 2007-2008 budget eliminated $2.2 million in counter-drug aid originally requested for Venezuela.

"Venezuela is a sovereign country. (U.S. officials) can take their resources and do whatever they think they need to do," Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro told reporters Tuesday. "We will continue fighting against drug-trafficking."

Maduro accused the U.S. government of offering aid only to countries that "submit to its commands."

President Hugo Chavez, who often refers to Bush as "the devil," broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in August 2005 accusing its agents of espionage, and has refused to draw up a new agreement since.

Venezuela is a major transit route for cocaine headed from neighboring Colombia to the United States and Europe.

Venezuelan officials say they are fighting drug trafficking with increasing success, but Washington claims that because of corruption and a weak judicial system the amount of drugs smuggled through Venezuela is increasing.

Washington also has watched uneasily the close alliance between Chavez and Bolivian President Evo Morales, who have spoken of plans for Venezuela to help its Andean neighbor industrialize coca, the base ingredient for cocaine, into legal products.

In comments to the press afterward, Choquehuanca said his country would not permit that "our sacred leaf, the coca leaf, be Satanized."

Troubled U.S. Presence On Ecuador Coast (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

MANTA, Ecuador (AP) -- The U.S. military's lone outpost in South America is a modest affair -- some 220 Americans share space with a local air force wing and an international airport. They are allowed no more than eight planes at a time.

But these surveillance planes play a vital role in keeping Andean cocaine and heroin from reaching the United States and are responsible for about 60 percent of drug interdiction in the eastern Pacific.

That matters little to newly inaugurated President Rafael Correa, whose rejection of a U.S. military presence in Ecuador reflects widespread resentment over Washington's foreign policy in a region where President Bush's administration now has few reliable allies.

"We've said clearly that in 2009 the agreement will not be renewed because we believe that sovereignty consists of not having foreign soldiers on our home soil," Correa said recently.

No matter that the planes intentionally avoid Ecuadorean airspace after takeoff, and that U.S. operations at Manta contribute some $7 million a year to the local economy.

Many Ecuadoreans believe the U.S. is trying to draw them more deeply into the Colombian conflict spilling over their borders: Leftist rebels frequently cross into Ecuador, and tens of thousands of Colombian refugees crowd lawless border towns plagued by drug traffickers and child prostitution.

Although U.S. officials deny that Manta's planes spy on leftist rebels in Colombia, they do intercept drug flights and eavesdrop on radio communications there.

"There is a widespread feeling that Washington is carrying out an extensive, mostly security, anti-drug program with Colombia, with little regard for the severe consequences -- growing violence and refugees -- on Ecuador," said Michael Shifter, deputy director of the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington.

The Bush administration's efforts to maintain the U.S. role as Latin America's No. 1 commercial and military partner have suffered badly with leftist presidents winning office from Venezuela to Bolivia and now Ecuador, where many resent Washington's tough bargaining for trade pacts that lock in preferential terms for U.S. industries and seem anything but "free."

Located on the coast some 160 miles southwest of the Ecuadorean capital of Quito, Manta is well situated for its mission. But the U.S. military, which got the Manta lease after it was forced to abandon Howard Air Base in Panama in 1999, would be wise to start looking elsewhere, according to Anna Gilmour, a Latin American analyst with Jane's Defense Information Group.

Colombia is not a good option -- U.S. troops based there would be at great risk of attack from the same leftist rebels Colombian President Alvaro Uribe is fighting with U.S. training, logistics and intelligence support.

Nor are its neighbors: Presidents Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, Alan Garcia of Peru and Luiz Ignacio Lula da Silva of Brazil have shown no interest in basing U.S. military units on their soil.

The region's leftist governments already have turned away from U.S. defense contractors, going instead to Russia, France and Brazil for military hardware. Venezuela said last week it hopes to buy Russian anti-aircraft missiles to protect its oil industry.

The Bush administration upset many in the region when it emphasized bilateral trade pacts and denigrated the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act, a package of trade benefits offered in exchange for cooperation against drugs. The act expired Dec. 31, though the administration extended it for six months.

Colombia and Peru have bilateral pacts, but they have not been ratified and the newly Democratic-controlled Congress has raised objections. Trade talks with Ecuador broke down last year, long before Correa became president, and show no signs of resuming.

Correa, a U.S.-trained economist, has said the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act "isn't charity" but rather "just compensation" for commitments to battling drug trafficking.

Chavez, for his part, has called the drug war "the excuse that imperialism obtained a few years ago to penetrate our countries, to oppress our peoples and to justify its military presence in Latin America."

The State Department has recommended eliminating all drug interdiction aid for Venezuela, which got $2.2 million in the current fiscal year, and slashing overall aid to Ecuador some 30 percent to $20 million.

With the exception of Colombia, drug interdiction funding cuts were proposed across the Andean region.

In mid-2006, the United States had just short of 2,000 active duty military personnel stationed in Latin American and Caribbean countries, more than half at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

In all, some 6,000 Department of Defense employees are assigned to the region, many of them in Texas and Florida, where their bosses are headquartered at the U.S. Southern Command.

That is a small sliver of the nearly 1.4 million U.S. troops deployed around the world, mostly in Europe and Asia.

But those 220 Americans in Manta have had an outsized impact against drugs.

In the 1990s, most drug smuggling from the region was by air. That later shifted to the high seas as the so-called air bridge was essentially shut down.

Thanks to the Manta-based U.S. interdiction efforts, more than 275 tons of illegal drugs -- mostly cocaine -- were seized or intercepted last year, said Air Force Lt. Col. Javier Delucca, the base's U.S. administrator.

Ecuador Assails US Antidrug Funding Cuts (FT)

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Ecuador criticised Washington on Tuesday for proposing a 40 per cent cut in antidrug aid to the Andean region over the next two years, a move that will be seen as retaliation for the election of leftwing nationalistic governments hostile to the US.

María Fernanda Espinosa, the foreign minister, said: "There are principles of joint responsibility and fairness, and under those principles the US must respond to the efforts Ecuador has made."

She said the Bush administration should recognise "the enormous efforts made by a poor country like Ecuador to combat narcotraffic. Now we need the US to commit itself to supporting those efforts."

In the budget he presented on Monday, President George W. Bush proposed a cut in the Andean counter-drug initiative from $722m last year to $570m this year and $443m in 2008.

The programme supports efforts such as eradicating coca, the plant that is the raw material for cocaine, which is primarily grown in Colombia, Peru and Bolivia. It also helps programmes to combat narcotrafficking in countries such as Ecuador and Panama.

The cuts will be seen in the region as a response to the election of hostile governments in Ecuador and Bolivia, and the failure of others to co-operate fully in the "war on drugs".

The one exception is Colombia, Mr Bush's closest regional ally. His administration has requested that Congress extend the $600m Plan Colombia, the US-funded military counter-narcotics programme, which is due to expire this year.

Last year Evo Morales, a former coca-growers' leader, became president of Bolivia and this year Rafael Correa took office as president of Ecuador, pledging to shut the US military base at Manta, the only one of its kind in South America and an important staging post for interception efforts.

Mr Correa's government has reacted angrily to Colombia's aerial spraying on its border with Ecuador. Last month Quito made an official complaint about the issue to the Organisation of American States.

The cuts will also be viewed in the region as a reaction to what is perceived to be Washington's frustration with antidrug efforts in the Andes. Unlike Colombia, which depends heavily on aerial spraying to destroy the plants, Peru and Bolivia, the second and third producers, rely on manual eradication, since coca is more culturally sensitive in those countries due to its use as a traditional stimulant.

Last month, Pilar Mazzetti, Peru's interior minister, and Romulo Pizarro, head of the antidrug agency, admitted that Peru is fighting a losing battle against trafficking. Officials in Lima estimate that Peru would need $200m a year to provide an effective eradication and interception programme.

Intensifying eradication in Colombia while cutting budgets to other producers will feed concerns about a "balloon effect" in which production crosses borders to avoid antidrug activity.

A US State Department report last year said coca cultivation increased by 38 per cent in Peru in 2005, while the total area rose for the fourth consecutive year in Bolivia, up by 8 per cent to 63,000 acres, the highest figure this century.

IMMIGRATION:

Border States' Burden (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

GEORGE W. BUSH, throughout his presidency, has talked a consistently good game about the federal government's responsibility to take a lead role in dealing with the unique challenges of immigration. But when budget time comes around, he's all talk, and California is once again left holding the bill.

In what has become an annual ritual, Bush is seeking to place the entire burden of jailing criminal illegal immigrants on individual states. His new budget would eliminate the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program, which has provided meager federal assistance to states that house a disproportionate share of the non-federal population of illegal immigrant inmates.

The administration's argument in favor of killing the program? That reimbursing the states for incarcerating illegal immigrants does not reduce the number of crimes they commit. White House analysts also warn that because illegal immigrants are hard to identify, there's a chance that states actually could be getting more than their due. Heaven forbid.

California's prison system spent $684 million last year to incarcerate and supervise the parole of about 19,000 illegal immigrants, according to the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. (That number doesn't include county jails; L.A. County alone processed an estimated 40,000 illegal immigrants last year.) Congress, which funded the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program last year despite Bush's lack of enthusiasm, kicked in $160 million to California. This year, with the state price tag rising to an estimated $865 million, Bush wants to back out.

In all probability, the program will be funded somewhere between the $0 proposed by the White House and the $900 million authorized by Congress last year. The program enjoys bipartisan support, and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer say they are prepared to do battle.

Immigration, like free trade, is a boost for the economy and society in general but more challenging in the communities that bear the specific brunt.

California gladly accepts its role as the 21st century Ellis Island, but the Bush administration should be honest about the real costs of illegal immigration. The least the administration can do is provide economic relief to the few states that have to clean up after Washington's mess.

Next Stop: Underground (WP)

REPUBLICAN state lawmakers in Virginia have advanced a grab bag of legislation designed to hound, harass and hassle illegal immigrants. The idea, as expressed by the author of one such bill, Del. Jackson H. Miller of Manassas, is "to make Virginia an unwelcome place if you are in this country illegally." Translation: Drive the immigrants out of the state. In this the bills are overwhelmingly likely to fail, since most immigrants are likely to remain near jobs despite official persecution. But the bills do threaten to push undocumented immigrants further underground, forcing them to live in fear, draw their curtains and keep their children indoors even as they fill a niche in the local economy.

Many of the measures are so patently obnoxious that they are unlikely to become law. One bill, Mr. Miller's, would cut off the flow of state and local funds to charities that might assist illegal, and presumably needy, immigrants. Another would make it a crime for an undocumented immigrant even to be in Virginia -- even though immigration is properly the purview of the federal government. There are bills to deny in-state tuition rates at public colleges and universities to illegal immigrants, even to those who have grown up in the state; to withhold business licenses from firms that would employ the immigrants; and to expand the power of state and local police to detain them.

Many of the bills are similar to ones making their way through legislatures across the country, particularly in states whose vibrant job markets have made them magnets for people who are here illegally. Two years ago, 500 immigrant-related bills were introduced in state legislatures nationwide, according to a survey by the National Conference of State Legislatures. No survey is yet available for this year, but it appears, according to the evidence from Virginia and elsewhere, that the number will have grown exponentially.

Not all the Virginia bills are heading for enactment; cooler heads in the state Senate will make short work of some. Still, taken together, the proposals transmit a message of hostility to newcomers. And good luck telling green-card-holders that the state doesn't object to them -- just to their cousins and nephews and aunts who lack the right papers.

The fact is, as many of the same conservative Republicans voting for the anti-immigrant bills know, the primal forces of economics -- hunger, need, the human thirst for self-advancement -- will generally trump official attempts at discrimination. If there is legislation to penalize landlords who rent to illegal immigrants, some will evict their tenants, and others will just demand more money under the table. If employers face sanctions for hiring illegal immigrants, many will nonetheless continue doing so, perhaps through subcontractors willing to assume the risk. Lawmakers who propose anti-immigrant legislation may be responding to the legitimate complaints of their constituents or to the worst instincts in American politics. Either way, their measures could inflict considerable pain while failing to solve a problem whose causes, and ultimate solution, lie with the federal government.

MINNEAPOLIS A St. Paul tax preparer accused of filing false tax returns that overstated deductions for recent immigrants is now barred from preparing federal tax returns for others.

The Department of Justice said a federal court in Minnesota issued the permanent injunction order against Nash Sonibare, who operated Liberty Financial Group in St. Paul.

The Justice Department lawsuit alleged that the Nigerian immigrant repeatedly prepared returns for his customers containing false or inflated credits and deductions. The complaint alleged that many of Sonibare's customers were from various African countries and had limited English-language skills.

Deadline Nears For 2006 Health-Care Accounts (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

Time is running out for many employees to drain their flexible spending accounts for 2006.

More companies are offering these accounts, which let you use pretax dollars to pay for health-care and dependent-care expenses. But there is an important catch: Under what is known as the use-it-or-lose-it rule, you must spend every penny you set aside before the deadline or lose the balance.

The deadline varies among employers. Many have set a cutoff date of March 15 -- only about five weeks from now. That represents a big change from just two years ago, when the deadline typically was Dec. 31. After congressional pressure, the Treasury changed its rules in 2005 and allowed employers to give employees a grace period of as much as 2½ months into the following year.

Initially, many employers were undecided about whether to offer the grace period. Health-care specialists now say most large employers they work with offer the additional time.

"I don't think I have a client who isn't offering the extension," says Blaine Bos of Mercer Health & Benefits in Minneapolis, a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos.

Separately, a new law may offer additional relief for some FSA participants. Individuals can now make a one-time transfer to a health savings account, which is for people with high-deductible health-insurance plans, from a health-care flexible-spending account or from a health reimbursement plan. Health reimbursement plans allow employees to use employer contributions to pay for medical bills.

This provision is part of a tax bill signed by President Bush Dec. 20.

In a typical flexible-spending account, you tell your employer to set aside a certain amount of your pay -- say $4,000 or $5,000. If you don't spend every penny of that amount by the deadline, the money goes back to your employer. You are allowed to spend the rest on such items as glasses, sunglasses, aspirin, teeth cleaning and other health-care-related items.

Among the companies that offer them is Liberty Tax Service, a tax-preparation firm in Virginia Beach, Va. The company recently added a popular new benefit: Participants were given a debit card with their contribution amount preloaded, says Martha O'Gorman, a Liberty Tax vice president.

"It is very handy," she says, "and makes the plan attractive to those folks who were sometimes hard-pressed to pay for the services rendered -- and then wait for the reimbursement."

Ms. O'Gorman is keenly aware of the use-it-or-lose-it rule. "My first year I left some money in the pool, so I reduced my contribution amount last year and exceeded it by almost $1,000," she says. "This year I've gone back to the same amount I pledged the first year, and I am keeping a close eye on it."

Some merchants seek to capitalize on the use-it-or-lose-it rule. Mercer's Beth Umland says an eyeglass store in her Brooklyn, N.Y., neighborhood has a sign in the window urging customers to buy soon to avoid forfeiting money parked in health-care FSAs.

Many experts praise the general FSA concept. "I think they're very useful if you have the ability to budget expenses and you understand the tax advantages," Mercer's Mr. Bos says. "They're a very tax-efficient way of using your money."

If you participate, be sure to keep a close watch on your account balances. If your employer gives you until mid-March to drain your 2006 account, make sure your expenses for the first 2½ months of this year are applied against your 2006 account, rather than your 2007 account.

A Mercer survey of employer-sponsored health plans last summer found a record 81% of large employers -- those with 500 or more employees -- offered a health-care flexible-spending account in 2006, up from 77% the prior year and 68% in 2001.

The percentage of eligible employees participating remained about the same: 20% in 2006, 21% in 2005 and 19% in 2001.

THE APRIL TAX DEADLINE comes two days later this year.

Usually, the deadline is April 15. This year, it is Tuesday, April 17. April 15 falls on a Sunday this year, and the following day is a holiday in Washington, D.C. Thus, "the entire country has an April 17 deadline" this year, the Internal Revenue Service says.

Don't pay attention to the April 16 deadline you will see in various IRS publications, the IRS says. That is now out of date.

The April 17 deadline applies to 2006 federal individual income-tax returns. It also applies to requests for a six-month tax-filing extension. It applies to tax-year 2006 balance-due payments and to tax-year 2006 contributions to individual retirement accounts.

Also, it applies to individual estimated-tax payments for the first quarter of this year, whether made electronically or by check.

REMINDER: Don't overlook a phone-tax refund on your tax return for 2006.

This year, there is a special one-time refund of the telephone excise tax on long-distance and bundled service. An IRS survey of early filers shows one in three early filers this year are failing to request the refund. To get the refund, you have to file.

Taxpayers can choose a standard refund amount between $30 and $60, depending on the total number of exemptions on their 2006 return -- or, if they kept good records, they can deduct the actual tax paid.

For details, see the IRS Web site (www.irs.gov).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cabinet Members Go To Congress To Push The Budget (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — One day after the Bush administration proposed deep cuts in domestic spending, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. told Democratic critics in Congress on Tuesday that the proposals for Medicare and Social Security were “a starting point for a discussion” and could be revised.

Democrats, on the other hand, promised to reshape the priorities to some extent, though several said they would take Mr. Paulson at his word, for now, that negotiation was possible.

On Social Security, Medicare and taxes, however, Democrats did not indicate what steps they would take, and that is a source of frustration to administration officials.

If tax increases are to be a part of any budget solution, Republicans want Democrats to propose them. Democrats are reluctant to do so. They distrust the administration’s promises of willingness to negotiate, noting that Vice President Dick Cheney and others seem to have ruled out compromise.

It was thus hard to tell whether Mr. Paulson’s call for negotiations was serious or just an effort to have Democrats make unpopular counterproposals. For the moment, conciliatory talk held sway.

Mr. Paulson appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee, defending the administration proposals on domestic spending cuts, taxes and military outlays.

But he said, “We really welcome everybody’s ideas.”

He was referring specifically to the proposals to reduce Medicare and Medicaid costs by cutting payments to doctors and hospitals and requiring some recipients to pay out more, but his promise to negotiate extended to other areas, as well.

The comments were echoed in part by those of President Bush at a factory tour at Micron Technology in Manassas, Va. Mr. Bush was more combative in defending the budget, saying it “can work if Congress resists the temptation to raise your taxes.”

He also called on Democrats to do more than criticize.

“Now’s the time for members of the Congress in both parties to bring their best ideas to the table as to how to solve the problems involved with entitlement programs,” Mr. Bush said, referring to Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, also defended the budget, before the House Budget Committee. Mr. Portman said that in response to years of criticism the administration had been more open in its projections of military spending and was calling for a slight increase in domestic spending, not an unrealistic freeze.

Possibly recognizing political realities, Mr. Paulson all but invited Congress to reject the cuts for the health program known as S-Chip. It provides health insurance to low-income children.

"It just may be that the Congress believes that that's something that should be funded at a higher level," Mr. Paulson said.

On another hot topic, Mr. Bush's desire to replace Social Security benefits for some future retirees with private investment accounts, a proposal that never came to a vote even when Republicans were in charge of Congress, Mr. Paulson said, "No one should be surprised that personal accounts are in the budget."

"That's his idea," the secretary said, referring to Mr. Bush. "A lot of people share that idea, and there are different views on that and on taxes. But everything's on the table."

Democratic criticism of the budget was tempered by repeated promises to take Mr. Paulson's promise of bipartisanship at face value, at least initially.

"We hope that you're our new best friend," Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, told Mr. Paulson. "We look forward to working with you."

At another point, Mr. Rangel dismissed the budget proposals as pre-campaign talk.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt encountered deep skepticism when he defended the budget at a hearing of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Democrats accused Mr. Leavitt of favoring spending on Iraq over spending for the poor and the sick.

President Bush Asks Lawmakers To Resist Raising Taxes (NYS/BL)

By Brendan Murray

New York Sun/Bloomberg, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush, a day after sending Congress a $2.9 trillion budget, urged lawmakers to resist raising taxes and to address the unsustainable growth in entitlement programs by restraining spending.

The president said his spending plan will lead to a balanced budget by 2012 while keeping tax rates at current levels and spending a record amount on defense and the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rolling back the tax cuts he pushed through Congress would be a drag on the economy, he said.

"Do tax cuts work? They work," Mr. Bush said yesterday at a Manassas, Va., plant operated by Micron Technology Inc. Boise, Idaho-based Micron is the biggest American memory chipmaker. "Low taxes means economic vitality, which means more tax revenues" to bring the budget in balance.

As hearings on the fiscal 2008 budget got under way in Congress yesterday, members of the Democratic majority greeted Mr. Bush's spending blueprint with skepticism and signaled they will press forward with their own priorities. The party's congressional leaders say they have no plans to repeal all of the tax cuts approved during Mr. Bush's first term.

Mr. Bush's budget for the fiscal year that begins October 1 would increase federal spending 4.2% over the current year, even as funding for agencies outside defense and homeland security would rise an average of 1% in each of the next four years. That effectively is a cut because it is less than the rate of inflation, which was 2.5% in 2006.

The Senate Budget Committee chairman, Senator Conrad, a Democrat of North Dakota, said yesterday that the president's spending plan is "filled with debt and deception."

The biggest challenge, Mr. Bush and his advisers say, will be dealing with escalating costs for Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security, known as entitlements because benefits and eligibility are set in the law. Outlays for all three would total $1.2 trillion in fiscal 2008.

"There is now nearly universal, bipartisan agreement that the unchecked growth of these programs presents real long-term threats to beneficiaries, our federal budget and the economy," Mr. Bush's budget director, Rob Portman, said yesterday in testimony to the House Budget Committee.

Mr. Bush proposes to trim the growth of Medicare, which provides health insurance for those 65 and older, and Medicaid, which benefits low-income individuals, by $78 billion over five years. The reductions would come from boosting costs for beneficiaries and cutting payments to some providers.

Mr. Bush's budget doesn't offer a legislative solution for Social Security, the government's retirement assistance program that last year covered about 49 million American retirees with $539 billion in benefits.

As the number of Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security beneficiaries swells so do outlays. Mr. Portman said mandatory spending programs accounted for 53% of the budget in 2006, up from 26% in 1962.

Mr. Bush has been prodding lawmakers to open a discussion about how to deal with the projected shortfalls in the program as the number of retirees drawing benefits rises relative to the number of workers paying into the system. The trustees of the system project that Social Security will begin paying out more in benefits than it takes in from payroll taxes by 2017.

"We have a fundamental problem when it comes to a program like Social Security," Mr. Bush said. "Now's the time for members of Congress from both political parties to bring their best ideas to the table."

Mr. Bush's effort two years ago to overhaul Social Security and add private accounts for workers never got off the ground because a lack of support from lawmakers and the public.

Micron Plant Provides Backdrop For Bush (WP)

By Cecilia Kang

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Micron Technology's plant in Manassas makes some of the most sophisticated memory chips in the world, semiconductors made from wafers of silicon 300 millimeters thin that run MP3 players, smart phones and satellite navigation systems.

But the finer details of the 650,000-square-foot plant's operations may have escaped the company's most esteemed visitor yesterday, President Bush.

They "tried to explain all the big machines that were there to a history major. I played like I understood," Bush said in a speech to 150 Micron employees.

Bush nevertheless praised the company for its growth, exports and creation of high-skill jobs -- a model, he said, for the nation's economic growth.

"One thing about Micron is that it is clear that the role of government is to encourage investment and enhance educational opportunities," Bush said. "I mean, when you walk through the halls of this innovative company, it's pretty clear to me that you need to know what you're doing in order to make this company survive and thrive like it is."

It was the president's first visit to the Manassas plant, which Micron bought in 2002. The company was lured to Northern Virginia by about $25 million in local and state tax incentives and it has grown impressively since, albeit with a few setbacks along the way.

Micron initially laid off 560 workers but has since undergone a $3.5 billion expansion that has brought in 800 new employees. About 1,700 people work there now.

More recently, the parent company, with manufacturing plants around the world, was granted immunity for cooperating with a federal investigation into whether some of the biggest companies in the semiconductor industry have fixed prices. Micron agreed to pay $91 million to settle a class-action lawsuit by chip purchasers, and still faces legal action from many states, including Maryland and Virginia. The company overall is now dealing with falling prices worldwide for some chips.

Steven R. Appleton, Micron's chief executive, said the White House approached Boise, Idaho-based Micron about the tour last week, impressed by the firm's decision to expand operations domestically.

"We've been investing here in Virginia for quite some time and have put our most advanced technology here," Appleton said.

About 60 percent of the company's products are exported overseas, he said: "This is a good example of how companies can invest in the U.S -- and we're manufacturers."

Bush came to Micron primarily to promote the $2.9 trillion budget he submitted to Congress on Monday and to preach the importance of fiscal responsibility.

Bush promised to balance the federal budget by 2012 by "keeping taxes low and being wise about how we spend your money." He said his hallmark economic policies -- the promotion of trade and tax cuts -- have helped companies like Micron grow.

"By cutting capital gains taxes and taxes on dividends, it encourages capital flow; it makes it easier for Micron to attract capital to buy new equipment to expand your business and to remain competitive," Bush said.

With just a few days' notice of the president's visit, crews rushed to spruce up the plant. They painted parts of the building and cleared rocks in a parking lot for the four White House helicopters that carried Bush, Secret Service agents and journalists between the District and Manassas. Inside, workers hung blue velvet curtains in the assembly room, played patriotic music through speakers, and set up a large promotional backdrop displaying the various products that use Micron's chips.

"We feel incredible pride, beyond what you can imagine," said Stephen Silberstein, facilities manager at the Manassas plant.

About 150 employees at Micron Technology's Northern Virginia plant had a morning visit from President Bush.

Bush toured Micron's plant in Manassas and spoke to employees at about 10:30 a.m. Tuesday, telling the audience that Micron is helping support the national economy through continued investment and job creation in states like Virginia.

"On thing about Micron is that it is clear the role of government is to encourage investment and enhance educational opportunities," Bush said. "When you walk through the halls of this innovative company, it is pretty clear to me that you need to know what you're doing for a company to survive and thrive like this."

Bush was accompanied by Micron Technology's chief executive Steve Appleton.

Micron began investing in its memory chip plant on Godwin Drive in 2005. The plant has undergone a $3.5 billion upgrade, and the expansion has created about 1,000 new jobs. The plant manufactures both DRAM memory and NAND flash memory chips, demand for which has surged with the popularity of MP3 players and cell phones with cameras.

Micron actually downsized the facility when it bought the plant from Toshiba in 2002, slashing 560 of its then 1,200 jobs, part of company-wide cost-cutting.

The plant now employees 4,000, according to Micron spokesman Dan Francisco, who describes them as well-paid jobs held by highly-trained technology workers.

Bush Touts Fiscal Responsibilityin Speech At Micron Plant In Virginia (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 7, 2007

MANASSAS, Va. — President Bush preached the virtues of fiscal responsibility Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit alleging it had engaged in price-fixing and violated antitrust laws.

Bush went to computer chip-maker Micron Technology Inc. to talk about the $2.9 trillion budget he had unveiled a day earlier. His spending plan gives the Pentagon a record $50 billion budget boost but squeezes programs cherished by Democrats, including health research and heating subsidies for the poor.

Bush said his plan would lead to a balanced budget in five years after soaring deficits.

He said Congress needs to set priorities in spending taxpayer money.

"The temptation in Washington is to spend your money on everything that sounds good," Bush said. "That's not how you run your family budget. That's not how this company runs its company budget, and that's certainly not how the government ought not to run its budget."

Micron Technology, based in Boise, settled a class-action lawsuit last month that was filed in 2002 in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on behalf of customers, generally computer manufacturers and others, who bought dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM, directly from suppliers between April 1, 1999, and June 30, 2002.

The White House knew about the lawsuit when it scheduled Bush's appearance, deputy press secretary Dana Perino said.

The lawsuit is one of several filed following a U.S. Justice Department investigation into whether computer-chip companies conspired to manipulate the number of DRAM chips released to market in a scheme to inflate prices.

The investigation resulted in more than $730 million in fines and guilty pleas from four companies — Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

The Justice Department granted Micron immunity from criminal charges in exchange for its cooperation, but the amnesty did not shield it from lawsuits.

Steven Appleton, chief executive officer of Micron Technology gave $2,000 to Bush and $15,000 to the Republican National Committee during Bush's 2004 re-election campaign.

Appleton escorted Bush on a tour of the Manassas plant.

The recent $3.5 billion upgrade at the plant has created more than 1,000 jobs at the site over the past year.

"It's an honor for Micron to host President Bush at our Manassas site," Appleton said in a statement after the visit.

"We believe in innovation and ingenuity of the American work force, and we continue to invest not only in Virginia, but also our other U.S. locations."

Budget Talk Venue Carries Baggage (LAT)

MANASSAS, VA. — President Bush promoted his newly released federal budget Tuesday at a company that recently settled a class-action lawsuit over alleged price-fixing and antitrust violations.

DOJ_NMG_0129105

Bush used his visit to Micron Technology Inc., a semiconductor manufacturer, to argue that Congress should look to private sector companies as examples of responsible budgeting. His spending plan for next year forecasts a balanced federal budget by 2012.

"I appreciate very much the fact that companies like Micron actually have a budget. It's a concept that the government needs to get used to too," the president said.

Bush called Micron an "innovative company" that is made up of "smart people back there making the products that people want."

In January, Micron settled a class-action lawsuit built on accusations that it had engaged in price-fixing and had violated antitrust laws, along with the other makers of dynamic random-access memory chips, or DRAM.

Bush made no reference to the lawsuit, which was filed after the Justice Department launched an investigation of the company's pricing policies in 2002. The suit was one of several legal actions facing the company that were brought by computer manufacturers, consumers and states.

At the Micron plant, in a suburb about 30 miles west of the White House, Bush promoted the $2.9-trillion budget for 2008 that he submitted to Congress on Monday.

"By keeping taxes low and being wise about how we spend your money, we actually achieve balance in the budget," he said. "This budget can work if Congress resists the temptation to raise your taxes."

The White House said it was aware of Micron's former legal difficulty before Bush's visit.

"From what we could see, they followed all the procedures in dealing with the Department of Justice and cooperated as required," said Deputy White House Press Secretary Tony Fratto.

A Micron spokesman said the company, which is based in Boise, Idaho, had cooperated with the department's probe, a step that he said protected it from the risk of criminal penalty.

Paulson: Growth Can Spur Balanced Budget (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, February 7, 2007

President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget plan on Capitol Hill got a predictably cool reception from congressional Democrats Tuesday, while Bush's GOP allies said it's up to the new majority to come up with an alternative that balances the budget without raising taxes.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said he saw Bush's budget — which appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives while curbing Democratic priorities — as a missed opportunity for Bush to reach out to Democrats, who for the first time in Bush's presidency control both the House and Senate.

"The president has to be a party to this. He can create a climate that would allow us to move forward in a bipartisan way," Rangel said.

The $2.9 trillion Bush budget for the budget year that begins next Oct. 1 would provide a massive boost for the Defense Department, seek an additional $245 billion in spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for this year and 2008 and restrain spending across a wide swath of the rest of government.

The spending restraints allowed Bush to project gradually declining deficits, with the budget going into surplus in 2012, three years after he has left office.

His budget plan would make his first-term tax cuts permanent, at a cost over the next decade that the administration estimates at $1.6 trillion — which the Bush team says is key to maintaining economic growth.

"We are submitting a budget that includes a surplus in 2012, which is achievable if we keep our economy growing," Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson told the House Ways and Means Committee.

Democrats, however, charged that the president is able to produce a surplus only on paper by using overly optimistic assumptions about how much revenue the economy will generate over the next five years and by leaving out expensive items such as further war costs after 2009 or providing money beyond this year to fix the alternative minimum tax so that it doesn't hit millions of middle-income taxpayers.

House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt Jr., D-S.C., said the Bush plan shortchanges domestic programs such as heating subsidies for the poor, education and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which helps children of low-income working families that earn too much to qualify for Medicaid but not enough to afford private insurance.

Democrats said the plant doesn't provide enough money for the program to cover all of the children who are currently enrolled.

"I couldn't believe that the president could be so unthinking as to want to deny poor children health care," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif.

For their part, congressional Republicans rallied around the Bush plan and challenged Democrats to pass an alternative that doesn't raise taxes.

Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., called the budget "a defining issue for ... whether (Democrats) can govern."

Despite requisite calls among all parties to work together, many also expressed pessimism that they could.

"We hope we can find common ground, but we also find the differences between us are substantial," Spratt told White House budget director Rob Portman.

Paulson and Portman are on friendly terms with many lawmakers, including Democrats, but many Democrats harbor distrust toward Bush and Vice President Cheney, whom they see as less flexible.

Paulson and Portman both disputed contentions by Democrats that the budget achieves its projected $61 billion surplus in 2012 by adopting overly optimistic economic assumptions.

"While no one has a crystal ball, our economic assumptions are close to the consensus of professional forecasters," Paulson said.

Paulson has been given the task by President Bush to see if a consensus can be reached on overhauling the government's huge benefit programs such as Social Security and Medicare. He said he looked forward to sitting down with Democrats and Republicans to see if a bipartisan consensus can be obtained.

He said the reductions in the new budget in spending on Medicare and Medicaid would lay the foundation for more comprehensive reform of the benefit programs.

Portman told the House Budget Committee that while the administration's budget projects balance in the short term, shortfalls in Social Security and Medicare promise to swamp taxpayers in the long term.

"The progress we are making in getting our fiscal house in order short-term must not distract us from this long-term challenge," Portman said. He added that it was possible the government's improving revenue picture could reduce the deficit from the $244 billion projected by the White House for the current year.

Hill Democrats Critical Of Bush's Budget Plan (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Administration officials dispatched to Capitol Hill to defend President Bush's budget received a frosty reception yesterday from congressional Democrats, who argued that the president's proposal to target health care, education and other Democratic priorities suggests a White House more interested in scoring political points than in genuine compromise.

The $2.9 trillion budget blueprint contains little to appeal to, but much to infuriate, the Democratic majority, Democrats said. In a series of hearings, they rattled off a list of their objections: More than $100 billion to be sliced from projected Medicare and Medicaid spending. Further restrictions on the federal food-stamp program. Insufficient cash to maintain health coverage for millions of children. And deep cuts proposed for a range of programs that help communities put police on the street and fund community projects.

When you combine the cutbacks with the large sums the White House is seeking to support the military, the war and tax cuts, "this is not a budget we can support," House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.) told reporters after his panel finished grilling White House budget director Rob Portman.

In the House Ways and Means Committee, Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) told Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson that he was particularly annoyed by the health-care cuts and yet another request from the White House to create private retirement accounts that would allow taxpayers to shift billions of dollars out of the Social Security trust fund.

The proposal went nowhere two years ago, when Republicans controlled Congress. Democrats have refused even to discuss changing Social Security unless Bush backs away from the plan. At a time when the president is trying to engage Democrats in a politically risky effort to restructure Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, Rangel told Paulson, the budget represents a "missed opportunity."

"They're playing politics at a time that I'm trying to be bipartisan," Rangel said later. "I don't think that I can tell the president what to put on the table and not to put on the table. But I can tell him: Don't pick a . . . fight."

Paulson replied that "no one should be surprised that private accounts are in the budget," because they represent the president's preferred path for restructuring Social Security. But, he said, "everything is on the table" for discussion, and "the president has been very clear and very sincere" about that.

Despite what they consider unpalatable budget proposals, Rangel and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said Democrats remain hopeful that they can work with the administration to rein in spending on the three programs, which threaten to swamp the federal budget as the baby boom generation retires. "We all need a win," Rangel said.

Health care was also a major topic in the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt endured more than 2 1/2 hours of questions from Democrats complaining that the budget request would hurt children and the elderly and shortchange funding for research into cancer and other diseases.

The lawmakers focused on Bush's proposal to increase funding for the state-federal Children's Health Insurance Program by $4.8 billion over the next five years -- too little, experts say, to continue covering the 4.4 million children enrolled in the program last year. Analysts have said the program, which costs about $5 billion a year, would require an increase of $12 billion to $15 billion to keep pace with current enrollment because of rising health-care costs.

Some Democrats want to use the 10-year-old program, which must be reauthorized this year, to extend coverage to some of the nation's 8.3 million uninsured children. Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), the committee's chairman, said Bush's budget "misses an historic opportunity" to do so.

"Seven out of 10 uninsured children qualify for either Medicaid or the State Children's Health Insurance Program but are not yet enrolled. Yet, the president instead makes cuts in the program, ensuring that we will not reach those children, and that more children and their parents will become uninsured," Dingell said.

Democrats also panned the president's proposals to stop enrolling childless adults in the program and to provide less federal matching money for enrolled children whose families earn more than the targeted cutoff of twice the poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four.

Leavitt called the proposed funding "adequate" and said the program should not be used "as an engine to pull us toward a point where everyone is covered by the federal government."

While Leavitt is an old hand at budget hearings, the hostile audience was a new experience. Both he and Portman, a former congressman from Ohio who served on both the Budget Committee and Ways and Means, handled the long hours of contentious questions with calm assurance.

But Paulson, the former chairman of Goldman Sachs who joined the administration last summer, seemed less comfortable with the interrogation, which ranged over a wide array of topics, not all of them familiar.

In addition to attacks from Democrats, Paulson took fire from Rep. Jerry Weller (R-Ill.), who demanded to know why the administration had chosen to extend the federal unemployment surtax. (Paulson said he did not know and suggested that Weller talk to Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao.) And Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) said that it was "not appropriate" for the White House to recommend cuts to the federal home-heating program at a time when the wind-chill factor back home was 40 degrees below zero. (Paulson thanked him for the question and changed the subject.)

"This is not like running Goldman Sachs," Rep. Richard E. Neal (D-Mass.) joked.

Paulson smiled. "You can say that again," he said.

Gleams Of Hope For '08 Budget Deal (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON

Within hours of the arrival Monday of President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget proposal on Capitol Hill, Democrats dubbed it "disingenuous" and "filled with debt and deception" – not unlike their response to previous Bush budgets.

The chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. John Spratt Jr. (D) of South Carolina, questioned if even Republicans would rally around it.

Despite such predictions, GOP leaders have already pledged to rally around one part: tax cuts. "Raising taxes now will not only increase the family tax burden, [but] it will have devastating consequences on our robust economic growth that is creating the new jobs of tomorrow," said House Republican leader John Boehner (R) of Ohio.

But behind the tough talk, conditions exist for a potential compromise in this year's budget negotiations.

For the first time in Mr. Bush's tenure as president, Democrats control both the House and Senate. Their leaders are convinced that to keep that control after 2008 – and even to take back the White House – they need to show that they can govern. That means avoiding a budget train wreck and completing spending bills for the next fiscal year.

At the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, an unpopular president is looking to leave a domestic legacy.

"There's an opportunity for compromise this year, because if Bush wants to get anything done in the last two years, he's going to have to work with the Democratic Congress to do it," says Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a public interest group that aims to balance federal budgets.

"And if Democrats come across as just being obstructionist or tax-and-spend, the public could take offense. Presuming that they both want to accomplish something, there's an opportunity," he adds.

In the run-up to the release of the budget this week, administration officials have taken careful soundings on Capitol Hill and consulted widely with Democrats. Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), says he began his consultations on the budget this year by going first to Congress "to hear what they were looking for," and then to the administration.

In response to urging from Congress, especially Democrats, the Bush administration for the first time this year included war costs as part of the regular budget. With war costs, the proposed fiscal year 2008 budget raises military spending 11 percent and nondefense domestic spending by 1 percent. While praising the move, Democrats note that OMB's $50 billion estimate for the Iraq war in 2009 is well below previous spending levels. Administration officials describe it as a "place holder."

OMB officials say they also reined in the number of user fees used to demonstrate "savings" in the budget that have little chance of being enacted by Congress.

In a move that budget watchers say could be significant, Mr. Portman says that he heads into budget negotiations this year with "no preconditions" – which he describes as a "change in position" for the Bush White House.

"Our attempt here is to provide a credible, more transparent budget and one that is more realistic," he said at a briefing on Monday. "And so there are a number of different areas where we tried to be responsive [to Congress]. One is showing more war costs in greater detail."

One flash point in budget negotiations will be Bush's proposal to make tax cuts set to expire in 2010 permanent – at a cost of $1.6 trillion over 10 years. Democrats call the proposal a nonstarter.

But budget analysts note that the White House has already put taxes on the table, with one proposal to reform the alternative minimum tax (AMT) in a revenue-neutral way. The AMT was designed to ensure that the highest income tax payers paid their fair share of taxes, but it now impacts millions of Americans.

"The idea that you do AMT reform in a revenue-neutral way means you're going to have to raise taxes from somewhere else," says Mr. Bixby. "They're implicitly putting tax revenues on the table as a way to pay for something else."

For Democrats, the flash point could be the president's proposal to reduce Medicare benefits for upper-income seniors.

While early discussions with lawmakers over reining in entitlement spending prompted "immediate negative response," Portman says he also heard "a lot of response that says, 'Let's look at this,' on both sides of the aisle."

Analysis: Budget Deal Seems Unlikely (NSDY/AP)

By Andrew Taylor

Long Island Newsday, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Many of the necessary ingredients are there for the budget chefs in Washington to whip up a bipartisan deal.

Take the bountiful revenues that make it much easier to balance the budget. Add in the fact that it's not an election year, so politics shouldn't spoil the policymaking.

Warm with the relationships that have formed between key administration officials and lawmakers. Even having a government divided between a Democratic Congress and a GOP president can be a plus -- especially a president looking for a recipe to establish his legacy.

But rather than improve prospects of agreement with Democrats, President Bush's proposal for next year seems to have left the budget kitchen in turmoil.

Bush's budget appeals to anti-tax GOP conservatives and advocates of private accounts within Social Security while slighting Democratic priorities like health insurance coverage for children in low-income families.

"I don't think that I can tell the president what to put on the table and not to put on the table, but I can tell him, 'don't pick a damn fight,'" said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y. Private accounts, entitlement cuts and less money for the poor aren't the way to win cooperation, he suggested.

The poor start toward agreement on any number of budget issues dismays people like Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D., who's hoping for action on the nation's long-term fiscal problems.

Big budget agreements like a 1997 deal forged by President Clinton and congressional Republicans often occur in odd-numbered, non-election years like this one. Then, like now, tax revenues were surging, and that made it much easier to grease the deal -- as did Clinton's willingness to call for Medicare cuts when submitting his budget that year.

It's often easier to take painful steps such as cutting benefit programs or raising taxes when the government is split between the two parties. That way, both share the political heat. That's what happened in 1990, when congressional Democrats and President Bush's father enacted a major deficit-cutting deal.

But that 1990 deal -- in which the elder Bush broke his "read my lips" pledge on taxes -- had big political consequences for George H.W. Bush, who lost his re-election bid.

And a tax-laden 1993 bill, passed with only Democratic votes, contributed to a Democratic disaster at the hands of voters the following year.

That's the rub: Voters often punish politicians who take difficult steps on the budget. That may be why GOP leaders on Capitol Hill are in no hurry to work with Democrats on the budget.

There's certainly no shortage of budget problems crying out for solutions: tax cuts that expire in four years unless renewed; federal retirement programs like Social Security and Medicare that need to be overhauled to absorb tens of millions of baby boomers, a looming hidden tax hike on the middle class under the alternative minimum tax.

Bush's GOP allies in Congress have made it clear they'll insist on no rollbacks on his tax cuts -- even though such an agreement might make some of the tax cuts permanent instead of expiring at the end of 2010. Even a smallish rollback seems sure to rile core conservative GOP voters.

And if Democrats fall on their faces and are unable to pass a budget blueprint, that may be OK with the GOP, too.

"They have a responsibility to govern," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. "It's been clear for some time that they're likely to have a balanced budget, but they're going to raise taxes and increase spending."

Since Democrats won back Congress last year, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and White House Budget Director Rob Portman have met repeatedly with Democrats and Republicans alike. They have said repeatedly that there are "no preconditions" for talks on Social Security. That's been interpreted as an openness to increase payroll taxes, something Bush was previously unwilling to do.

"We think everything should be on the table, and that's a change," Portman told the House Budget Committee Tuesday.

But the recent spadework by Paulson and Portman was undercut by Vice President Dick Cheney, who went on Fox News last month to declare, "This president has been very, very clear on his position on taxes, and nothing's changed."

Democrats think Portman and Paulson are more eager for an agreement than Bush and Cheney.

"The president's looking for a legacy and Republicans in Congress are looking to regain power, and it's not clear that compromise on the budget helps congressional Republicans get back the majority," said longtime budget expert Stan Collender, managing director at Qorvis Communications.

Bush Tax Cuts' Fate Hangs In Balance (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

Democrats said President Bush's new budget is a "missed opportunity" to find common ground, but they are left with few good alternatives other than tax increases if they hope to boost spending and match the president's goal of balancing the budget by 2012.

It took an independent, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who called for a new "war on terrorism tax," to broach the issue of tax increases.

"People keep saying that we're not asking sacrifice of anybody but our military in this war, and some civilians who are working on it," said Mr. Lieberman, a former Democrat who supports the war in Iraq. "When you put together the [Department of Defense] budgets with Homeland Security budgets, we need to ask people to help us in a way that they know when they pay more it will go for their security."

But he exposed the key question that will lie beneath this year's budget debate: Can the government expand the war in Iraq and continue Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts while increasing spending and bringing the budget into balance by 2012?

Mr. Bush on Monday sent Congress his $2.9 trillion budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1. It includes a 1 percent increase in basic domestic spending, a giant boost for defense spending and a request for more than $93 billion in emergency war spending for the rest of 2007 -- all while bringing the budget into balance in 2012.

Democrats said Mr. Bush makes wrong assumptions on future tax revenue, such as the Alternative Minimum Tax, but admitted they will probably make the same choices when they pass their own budget so they can also show a balance by 2012, and so they can compare "apples to apples" with Mr. Bush.

Democrats also will have to decide whether to show continued costs for the war past 2008 -- something Mr. Bush does in a cursory manner -- and whether to plan on having Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts expire in later years, which would help government revenue but would put them on a collision course with the president.

Mr. Bush, stumping for his budget at Micron Technology Inc.'s plant in Manassas, said Congress should choose the path of lower taxes.

"Step One to balancing the budget is to keep taxes low," the president told company employees. "As a matter of fact, not only do I think we ought not to raise them, I think we ought to make every tax cut we passed permanent."

Stepping out from behind the lectern and hefting a foot-thick stack of congressional reports, which Congress uses to attach add-ons to spending bills, Mr. Bush challenged lawmakers to drop most pork-barrel spending projects called earmarks.

Meanwhile, the Congressional Budget Office yesterday said if Congress passes the new war-spending bill for 2007, but does not otherwise increase spending before October, the deficit will drop to about $200 billion this fiscal year. That's down from the actual 2006 deficit of $248 billion, and lower than the administration's $244 billion projection for this year.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, said there is a chance to work together with the president, but that Mr. Bush will need an attitude change.

"It sounds to me like this is pre-campaign talk," Mr. Rangel said of Mr. Bush's call to make the tax cuts permanent. "I just want someone at the White House to know that Democrats won and we want to work with Republicans."

Still, Democrats said they see no need to rush to put forward their own solutions to big budget problems such as Social Security, arguing Mr. Bush himself still hasn't come to the table with a serious proposal.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, challenged Republicans: "Why is it our turn when it was your turn and you didn't do something?"

Still Against Taxes, Bush Embraces User Fees (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration may be squarely against new taxes, but its proposed fiscal 2008 budget seeks to raise almost $81 billion in new revenue over the next five years by hiking user fees and other charges on taxpayers and businesses.

Technically, changes to these fees aren't taxes. But for anyone who must pay them - everyone from recreational hikers to war veterans - it's a question of semantics.

The big revenue gains would come from changes to federal health-care programs.

Bush would raise more than $15 billion through 2012 by allowing the Defense Department to raise enrollment fees and deductibles for medical care provided to military retirees under age 65. It would also raise retail pharmacy co-payments for all military retirees.

He'd raise another $1.6 billion over five years by increasing the pharmacy co-pay for all veterans and another $526 million by raising medical care fees for non-disabled, high-income war veterans. Veterans with household income above $50,000 a year would pay an annual enrollment fee of $250, which would jump to $750 a year for vets with household income above $100,000.

The president also seeks to limit the growth in health care subsidies for high-income beneficiaries of Medicare, the federal health-insurance program for the elderly. His budget estimates collecting $5.5 billion over five years through "reduced subsidies for certain high-income beneficiaries."

Bush also proposes to end the practice of indexing for inflation the income thresholds that determine just how much wealthy Medicare beneficiaries must pay out of their own pockets. Over time, failure to index those income thresholds for inflation would allow more Americans to shoulder a greater share of their health-care costs.

Corporations of many stripes also would have to pay new fees.

The biggest single new revenue generator under Bush's user-fee section is $35 billion he'd collect over five years from airlines for use of the nation's air traffic control system. This would ostensibly eliminate ticket taxes and other charges imposed by airlines on consumers.

But this isn't necessarily good news for flyers, since the airlines would still be expected to pass on the new costs to the flying public. It simply would make funding of the Federal Aviation Administration less vulnerable to swings in passenger traffic.

Businesses that still offer pensions to their employees would get nicked too. The president seeks almost $5.5 billion over five years from increases in the premiums that companies pay to the Department of Labor for defined-benefit pensions. This would help close the $19 billion deficit faced by the Pension Fund Guaranty Corp., which pays worker pensions, at least in part, when employers go bankrupt.

Bush also seeks to raise $325 million in fees from U.S.-based businesses that are seeking certification from the Department of Labor that they cannot find sufficient workers in the United States and need to bring in foreign workers.

And he envisions raising $461 million in user fees to fund regulation by the Commodity Futures Trading Corporation. The CFTC regulates trading of contracts for future deliveries of everything from oil to orange juice, but remains the only federal financial regulator not funded by those it supervises.

No federal activity is too small to escape a fee. Take the Corps of Engineers. Its civil works division manages 4,300 recreation areas, mostly at lakes and reservoirs, on 12 million acres in 43 states. This costs $267 million annually. Bush wants the Corps to charge unspecified entrance fees at some high-use areas. This could raise $65 million in fees collected from ordinary citizens over five years.

The administration also hopes to raise $2 million over five years by charging conference fees for events put on by the Minority Business Development Agency, part of the Department of Commerce. It hopes to raise another $1 million through registration fees at Federal Election Commission events.

Bush's Stealth Tax Increase (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Even President Bush acknowledges that he can't balance the budget without raising taxes.

The president would never put it that way, of course. In fact, his message is exactly the opposite. But the coming tax increase is the unavoidable, unstated subtext of his supposedly balanced-by-2012 budget.

The reason is the governmental cash cow known as the alternative minimum tax. Assume for the moment that the administration could somehow convince the newly Democratic Congress to accede to its pincer-tight domestic spending levels and to significant reductions in entitlement spending.

Assume also that the administration is right about how much tax revenue the government will take in -- though the Congressional Budget Office says it's too rosy by $155 billion over five years.

Even then, the only way the administration achieves its balance is by assuming that it will continue to rake in billions of dollars in revenue from the alternative minimum tax. More than billions, actually: CBO estimates that if left unchanged, the AMT would bring in an extra $1 trillion through 2017.

So the president achieves balance only with a stealth tax increase in the form of the AMT. If he means, as he says and nearly everyone agrees, to fix the AMT, that revenue has to come from somewhere else.

The AMT, as you may have had the misfortune of discovering, is hitting growing numbers of taxpayers who are further down the income scale. That's because (1) the level at which it takes effect isn't adjusted for inflation, so more taxpayers find themselves covered over time and (2) the Bush tax cuts lowered regular income tax rates, sweeping additional taxpayers into the alternative system.

Figures compiled by the Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center demonstrate the AMT's dramatic effect. If nothing is done to fix the AMT and the Bush tax cuts are extended as he wants, 89 percent of married families with two or more children and incomes between $75,000 and $100,000 will be hit by the AMT by 2010 -- compared with less than 1 percent in 2006. By 2017, almost half of all taxpayers -- 53 million -- will owe the AMT. The tax will hit two-thirds of those making between $75,000 and $100,000 and 90 percent of those making $100,000 or more.

Looked at another way, what the Bush tax cuts give to taxpayers, the AMT grabs back. By 2012, if it isn't changed, the AMT would take back almost one-third of the Bush tax cuts. As the accompanying chart shows, it would take back more than half of the tax cut for people making between $100,000 and $200,000.

In fact, in an irony that only a tax geek could love, the AMT has been transformed from its original purpose, a means of assuring that the wealthiest pay at least some taxes, into a way of underwriting tax cuts for the wealthiest. Because the AMT hits fewer of those with the highest incomes, the rather comfortable end up subsidizing Bush's tax cuts for the super-rich.

Instead of dealing with the AMT, the administration has simply slapped on another one-year fix. It says it wants a permanent solution but in the context of revenue-neutral comprehensive tax reform. This is Washington-speak for "we have to find the money somewhere, but we're not ready to say how yet."

So where will the money come from? The Tax Gap Fairy isn't going to leave enough under the budget pillow; the administration's calculation of how much owed but uncollected tax revenue can be brought in comes to just $29 billion over the next decade. The working poor don't pay income taxes -- in fact, they get money back through the earned-income tax credit and the refundable child tax credit, and even this administration isn't proposing to do away with them.

That leaves the middle class, the better-off and corporations to divvy up the tab. In that context, does it really make sense to permanently repeal the estate tax? To leave in place lower tax rates for the richest Americans? To continue to tax capital gains and dividends at far lower rates than ordinary income? These are the choices that the Bush budget entails, even if it fails, deliberately, to spell them out.

Dems May Override Bush On Kid Insurance (AP)

By Ben Evans

DOJ_NMG_0129112

AP, February 7, 2007

Democrats may try to override a decision by President Bush to leave stopgap children's health insurance money out of his 2007 emergency war spending proposal.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi asked the president last week to propose $745 million in supplemental spending for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, which primarily covers children in low-income working families.

Bush declined the lawmakers' request in the $93 billion emergency war spending proposal he submitted Monday to cover the remainder of 2007. But Democrats, eager to show policy differences with the White House, are saying they may add the $745 million when the bill comes up in the coming weeks.

"It's certainly an option," said Drew Hammill, a Pelosi spokesman. "We know the states are running out of money on this. We're exploring all options."

If allocated, the new money would keep 14 states with looming shortfalls from having to cut off coverage until Congress renews the program later this year.

Georgia, for example, insures some 273,000 children under its PeachCare program but could be forced to end coverage in just a few weeks. Iowa's Hawk-I plan, which insures more than 30,000 children, expects to exhaust its budget by the end of June.

"We are putting the health coverage of thousands of Americans in jeopardy," Reid, D-Nev., and Pelosi , D-Calif., wrote in a letter to Bush on Friday. "The cost of filling the funding shortfall is minor in comparison to your other emergency requests."

The move could get significant backing from Republicans, particularly those from states with shortfalls.

"That's certainly something I could support," said Sen. Johnny Isakson, a Georgia Republican. "That would help Georgia."

Dennis Smith, director of Center for Medicaid and State Operations, defended the administration's omission by saying Bush has called instead for forcing states with SCHIP surpluses to give up unspent money more quickly to help states with deficits.

"We proposed a solution," Smith said. "There's plenty of money. It's just in different places."

States — and their representatives in Congress — have strongly resisted giving up surplus money, arguing that they will need it as participation grows and federal budgets tighten.

According to the nonpartisan Government Accountability Office, while some states still don't spend their full individual allotments, state spending overall has outstripped federal funding in recent years. So the pool of unspent money is quickly shrinking.

SCHIP insures some 6 million people nationwide and is aimed at working families who make too much to qualify for Medicaid but not enough to afford private insurance.

Along with Georgia and Iowa, states facing shortfalls are Alaska, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Wisconsin.

Congress passed a temporary fix before adjourning last year, redistributing some unspent money. The federal government released the first installment of that money this week, but state officials say it buys only a few months at best.

Funding Fears To Halt Some Cancer Trials (WSJ)

By Amy Dockser Marcus

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The 10 federally funded cancer cooperative groups, which enroll nearly half of the patients in the nation who are participating in cancer trials, have begun to shut down trials and stop studying certain cancers amid funding concerns.

Robert L. Comis, president and chairman of the Coalition of Cancer Cooperative Groups, a nonprofit group comprising cancer centers, hospitals and patient- advocacy groups that work to increase participation in clinical trials, said 3,000 patient spots in clinical trials will be eliminated in 2007 at centers around the U.S. Although the decrease will affect all cancers, among the hardest-hit will be rarer cancers such as sarcoma, rare childhood tumors and head-and-neck cancers, Dr. Comis said; some of the cooperative groups are totally eliminating trials in those diseases.

The National Cancer Institute, which provides funding for the cancer cooperatives, had asked the groups to come up with cuts because federal funding for the agency has been flat, and inflation is eating into its spending power. All agencies under the Department of Health and Human Services have been operating under a "continuing resolution," which extended the fiscal 2006 budget levels until Feb. 15, when Congress must either pass the fiscal 2007 budget or extend the resolution. Both the '06 and proposed '07 budgets maintained essentially flat funding levels for the NCI, which is part of the National Institutes of Health.

President Bush's proposed fiscal '08 budget includes an increase of 0.8% for the NIH overall, but a decline of 0.2%, or $9 million, in the NCI's budget, to $4.78 billion. So NCI officials are anticipating further financial constraints.

Many groups are facing hard choices as a result of budget woes. The cuts at the cancer cooperative groups come at a time when, for the second year in a row, the number of people dying from cancer declined. The development of so-called targeted therapies that attack cancer cells but don't damage normal cells has increasingly led to cancer being considered a chronic condition rather than a death sentence. Many of the trials that led to the approval of those drugs by the Food and Drug Administration were sponsored by cancer centers participating in the various cooperative groups.

The Southwest Oncology Group recently said it was shutting down its sarcoma and head-and-neck cancer trials and no longer will run trials in those diseases. The Eastern Cooperative Oncology Group will be closing its brain cancer and sarcoma trials. Many of the groups also will stop acquiring new tissue samples for their ovarian, endometrial and lung-cancer tissue banks. The tissue is used by researchers to search for new drug targets, among other things.

Dr. Comis said the cooperative groups are postponing by one to two quarters all Phase II clinical trials. This will delay the chance of getting a new drug approved or getting existing ones approved for additional types of cancer. "The cooperative groups are really the engine for establishing new standards of cancer care for the public," Dr. Comis said.

James Doroshow, director of the division of cancer treatment and diagnosis at NCI, said the agency had asked the cooperative groups to "make contingency plans for the worst-case scenario" and that the cuts are the result of the continuing effort to streamline operations. He said the institute is studying ways to ensure that promising studies can go forward even when the patient population is small. "We won't close down our interest in rare diseases," he said.

Deborah Banker, vice president for research communications at the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society, said the organization is studying ways it can support cooperative-group trials, including the possibility of raising private funding.

Can Bush Reach Ethanol Goal With Proposed Spending Plan? (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In his State of the Union address, President Bush set an ambitious goal of cutting U.S. gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years. Now that Mr. Bush has unveiled his blueprint for federal spending, it isn't clear he is putting enough money on the table to accomplish that goal.

Mr. Bush is calling for millions of dollars in new spending to boost development of alternative fuels, chief among them ethanol, the corn-based additive. Targeted alternative fuel programs at the departments of Energy and Agriculture would benefit from increases of more than $250 million in the coming fiscal year, above what the president proposed for the current year. The administration also is proposing to spend another $1.6 billion in the next decade to boost ethanol production, as part of the farm bill to be written by Congress in coming months.

Many industry officials and lawmakers found the Bush plan wanting after sifting through the details yesterday. They said much broader federal action will be needed, especially to meet the president's goal to have the country using 35 billion gallons of alternative and renewable fuels by 2017, quadruple the current federal mandate.

"We have long ago given up relying on this president to act boldly to break the nation's addiction to oil," said Rep. Ed Markey (D., Mass.), a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. "His rhetoric looks to the future, but his budget proposals are mired in the past."

Tom Buis, president of the National Farmers Union, which represents 250,000 farm and ranch families across the country, agreed: "The rhetoric of the president in the State of the Union doesn't match the reality of what they're proposing here [in the budget]. To hear the president, it sounded like a massive effort, and this doesn't match that effort."

An Energy Department spokesman defended the proposed new spending on alternative fuels, saying it is part of a broader effort to make the U.S. "more reliant on farmers of the Midwest, than on oil sheiks of the Mideast."

At a minimum, the Bush budget looks to offer a down payment on the goal of greater ethanol production. Much of the Bush plan focuses on boosting the range of materials used to produce ethanol, now made principally with corn. Analysts suggest that increasing production of corn-based ethanol would result only in enough fuel to meet half of the president's alternative fuel-usage goal for 2017.

The rest largely would be accounted for with increased production of so-called cellulosic ethanol, which is made from wood chips and switchgrass, among other things. Currently, cellulosic ethanol isn't produced commercially in the U.S.

In the new budget, the president has proposed to spend $397 million next year on renewable energy projects at the Department of Agriculture, representing an increase of $161 million over what has been proposed for this fiscal year. A main focus of the spending would be development of cellulosic-ethanol technologies.

At the Energy Department, the president is proposing to spend $179 million on the department's biofuels initiative, an increase of $29 million. Financing for biofuel-research programs under the department's office of science would rise to $113 million, up $78 million.

Matt Hartwig, communications director for the Renewable Fuels Association, an ethanol trade group, said the president's proposal represents "a step in the right direction." The increased support will help attract private capital, encouraging investments in refineries that produce cellulosic ethanol, he said. "Clearly, the president has indicated he understands there is a need for the government to play a role," Mr. Hartwig said. "But there's certainly more that could be done."

Sweetheart Deal For Airlines (USAT)

By Ed Bolen

USA Today, February 7, 2007

For the giant airlines, Valentine's Day comes early this year. The president's budget, released Monday, is a sweetheart deal for the airlines. It would give them a massive tax cut, to be paid for largely by a "general aviation" industry that serves many of the nation's small and mid-sized businesses and their communities.

In supporting the president's budget, the airlines will likely defend their tax break as an opportunity to provide consumers with cheaper ticket prices. But, if history is a guide, this would be just another empty promise. Twice in the past decade, the airlines' federal taxes lapsed and, according to a 2004 Government Accountability Office report, "carriers generally raised base airfares."

Another driver of the airlines' support for the budget is the advantage it gives them on funding and control of the nation's Air Traffic Control (ATC) system. Considered the best in the world, the system uses an efficient "pay-at-the-pump" approach for fuel and ticket taxes that is consistent with widely accepted international standards. Yet, to hear the airlines tell it, we need a radical change that would, of course, let them pay far less into the ATC system. They propose taxing every aircraft at the same rate, whether it's carrying four passengers or 400.

This argument, made by the airlines for decades, fails the credibility test with experts the world over, because the costs for our aviation system aren't determined by a small airplane crossing an air traffic controller's radar screen over Kansas at midnight. Instead, the system's costs are driven by the airlines' hub-and-spoke network, which moves hundreds of flights through big airports at peak travel times. That requires a massive amount of people, resources and infrastructure, so it makes sense that the airlines bear the costs.

Rather than working to shift their responsibilities onto others, the airlines should lobby for a budget that serves everyone's interests. We hope the carriers will look past their own narrow agenda and join us in supporting a plan to truly modernize our nation's aviation system.

Ed Bolen is president of the National Business Aviation Association, which represents companies that use small planes for business.

Rangel Open To Tax Cuts In Wage Measure (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, February 7, 2007

The chairman of the House taxwriting committee said Tuesday he would be willing to link tax breaks for small business to a hike in the minimum wage but that the $8 billion tax package adopted by the Senate was unacceptable.

The comments by Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, were the first public acknowledgment by a top House Democrat that some tax cuts might be necessary to win approval of an increase in the federal wage floor.

"I'm prepared to send something over there for (the Senate) to be able to attach a tax package," Rangel said in an interview with reporters. "The problem, which I can't answer, is what would I accept."

The House last month approved an increase in the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over two years. The Senate last week passed the same wage hike but attached tax cuts for businesses that Republicans demanded to win their vote. The two bills would have to be reconciled in a House-Senate conference committee.

House Democrats, encouraged by labor organizations, have been pressing the Senate to pass a "clean bill" without any added provisions. But Senate Democrats argued that they need Republican votes to get the 60 votes required to overcome a filibuster or other procedural delays.

Rangel's view is especially important because constitutional precedents require tax legislation to originate in the House. Without Rangel's cooperation, the Senate tax plan would have a difficult time surviving.

But Rangel left no doubt that he would reject the Senate tax package — worth $8.3 billion over 10 years. He refused to speculate on what types of tax cuts would be acceptable and placed the burden for lowering the tax package on Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Max Baucus, D-Mont.

"When we start with $8 billion my hearing aid is off," the 76-year-old congressional veteran said. "I see no reason to waste anybody's time."

Baucus said later he would continue to work with Rangel and said he was certain that their goal of raising the minimum wage would overcome differences on other provisions in the Senate bill.

Labor Pushes Dems To Deny Bush Extension Of Authority (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 7, 2007

The AFL-CIO, United Autoworkers and other groups representing organized labor are pressing Democrats to deny the Bush administration an extension of its authority to send free-trade deals to Congress for up or down votes, partly by reminding lawmakers of the role trade played in Democrats' re-taking of majorities in the House and Senate.

"We're going to be talking to members of Congress extensively about why it would be a huge mistake to give this administration the authority," UAW's legislative director, Alan Reuther, said.

Labor groups already helped organize a letter to House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) from 39 members of the freshman House Democratic class that said the "vocal stand against the administration's misguided trade agenda" was vital to their electoral success.

AFL-CIO Assistant Director for International Economics Thea Lee said the group is "flat-out opposed" to extending the existing fast-track authority, which expires at the end of June, and sees an extension limited to allowing the Bush administration to finish negotiations on the current World Trade Organization talks, known as the Doha round, as a non-starter.

"I definitely don't trust the Bush administration to negotiate a good Doha round," said Lee, who charged that issues such as labor rights and currency manipulation are not being discussed seriously in the talks.

Lee does not completely rule out fast track for the Bush administration, but said the policy would have to be overhauled fundamentally from the existing authority. Noting the letter from freshman Democrats to Rangel, she said last year's elections have placed labor in a strengthened position for battles over trade policy this year.

Organized-labor groups were among top financial contributors to many of the new Democrats elected in November. For example, labor political action committees (PACs) contributed $247,200 to the campaign of Rep. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio), and $265,500 to Rep. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.). PACs representing labor groups gave $215,000 to Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine), who with Sutton helped organize the letter from freshman Democrats to Rangel.

The pressure from labor is important because of possible splits within the Democratic Party on trade, including the possible extension of fast track requested by President Bush last week.

For example, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) called on Congress to approve a new fast-track law with some modifications in a column in The Wall Street Journal at the beginning of January, and last week described fast track as vital to U.S. trade. Rangel also has been open to considering a fast-track extension, but has stressed that Congress must first receive assurances on how the administration would use it.

Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), who chairs the Ways and Means trade subcommittee, has been more explicit in setting out conditions on extending fast track. He told The Hill last week that meaningful discussions on fast track cannot start until after the administration renegotiates labor provisions in three pending deals with Latin American countries to the satisfaction of congressional Democrats. Levin also wants the administration to persuade South Korea to agree in free-trade talks to end practices that he said prevent U.S. autos and auto parts from being exported to that country

"There is no question there are divisions within the Democratic Party over the trade issue," Lee said.

In the end, business representatives are hopeful that Rangel will be the key player on trade among House Democrats. "At the end of the day, if we're going to move the trade agenda forward, Charlie Rangel is going to have to sign off on it," the director of international trade policy for the National Association of Manufacturers, Christopher Wenk, said.

Wenk said House Democrats will want to find some issues, such as trade, where they can work with business.

Another business source noted that tax and healthcare issues could pose even greater problems for Rangel in trying to reach a compromise with committee Republicans and the administration. The source said trade is an issue on which Rangel might be able to forge a middle-ground consensus with Republicans, which would allow Rangel to show he is chairing Ways and Means differently from his predecessor, former Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), who was charged with shutting Democrats out of the legislative process and passing legislation with all Republican support.

Two committee aides said committee Republicans and Democrats have a shared desire to reach a compromise on trade, and agreed that finding common ground there could be easier than on healthcare and tax policy. They also emphasized, however, that the challenges remain significant.

Some key Democratic figures, including former President Clinton economic adviser Gene Sperling, have already spoken out in favor of at least extending fast track to allow the Bush administration to complete the Doha talks. During a hearing on trade and globalization last week, Sperling warned Ways and Means members that Congress could be seen as killing Doha if it did not extend fast track. Alluding to global warming and the Iraq war, he said this would contribute to international sentiment that the U.S. is intent on taking a unilateral approach to global issues.

Lee said such arguments might sound good to the Brookings Institution, a centrist Democratic think tank, but will not play well in the heartland. She said granting the administration a short-term extension of fast track to conclude Doha should be a non-starter for Congress.

Senate GOP Threatens Filibuster Over Budget (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Senate Democrats and Republicans are headed for a classic game of chicken this week over the nine remaining fiscal 2007 appropriations bills.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is poised to bring up a joint funding resolution for 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and numerous independent agencies as early as today, but he has said repeatedly that he will not permit any Senators to offer amendments to the measure.

That stance has prompted Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) to threaten a Republican filibuster, and both sides are waiting to see who will blink before a possible government shutdown upon the expiration of the current continuing resolution on Feb. 15.

"At some point you get to Feb. 15 and something has to give," said Senate Appropriations ranking member Thad Cochran (R-Miss.).

Cochran added that Republicans are likely to call Reid's bluff and oppose his expected efforts to cut off debate, or invoke cloture, on the $463 billion measure. Reid would need 60 votes to prevail on cloture and move the funding resolution toward passage.

"I don't think they can get cloture," Cochran said. "We'll be protesting the process."

The Senate could vote as early as Thursday on a procedural motion to limit debate on the motion to proceed to the bill. Even if Senators are allowed to proceed to the bill, Republicans indicated that they would require Reid to file another cloture motion on the bill itself. The whole process could bring the Senate dangerously close to the Feb. 15 deadline.

However, Democrats could try to avoid a government shutdown by pushing another short-term continuing resolution in lieu of the larger joint funding resolution that would cover all eight months left in fiscal 2007. A continuing resolution, however, would keep funding at 2006 levels or lower, whereas the joint funding resolution would provide some government agencies with small boosts in funding.

The House already has passed the fiscal 2007 joint funding resolution, and Senate passage without amendment would send the bill directly to the president. Congress already approved fiscal 2007 funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments last year.

Before Congress resorts to short-term measures, however, Reid said he would move to use Senate procedures to block all amendments, because Republicans already have vetted the bill.

"In getting to the point where we are, there's been total consultation by the majority and minority" on the Appropriations Committee, Reid said on the floor Tuesday. "If there were ever a bipartisan measure, it's the [joint funding] resolution."

But Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) said Reid's statements are "not a fair argument for abridging the rights of Senators to offer amendments."

And Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), a member of the Appropriations panel, said, "There's a lot more people in this Congress than just the Appropriations subcommittee chairmen" and ranking members. Gregg added that Republicans are looking to offer only two or three amendments.

"It seems to me that you don't have to bring it up and close down debate," he said. "We know it's got to be done ... on a timely basis. But to bring a $463 billion bill to the floor without amendments would be unprecedented. That's never happened before."

One of the amendments Republicans would like to offer is a restoration of cuts to the Base Closure and Realignment Commission funding, which was used as a way to address shortfalls in veterans' medical care accounts.

But Appropriations Committee member Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said Republicans are trying to have it both ways, considering they had an opportunity last year to pass full BRAC funding in the fiscal 2007 military construction spending bill only to see it blocked by members of their own Republican Conference.

"That was an example of a bill that was held up by Republicans. So to come back and say we want a do-over is a real challenge," Reed said.

What's more, Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) wants to restore funding for BRAC later this year as part of a nearly $100 billion emergency war spending bill.

"Senator Byrd has every intention to work to make BRAC funding whole in the supplemental appropriations bill," said Byrd spokesman Tom Gavin.

In the meantime, Gavin said the Pentagon has $2.5 billion available for BRAC, which is "certainly enough to begin the [BRAC] process."

Democrats Set To Unveil Agenda (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Preparing to return the House to regular order after an initial legislative sprint full of popular bills and closed rules, Democratic leaders said Tuesday they are finally primed to roll out a long-term agenda.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) confirmed Tuesday that Democrats will unveil their new agenda next week, although he declined to provide specific details.

Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said the plan will not be an itemized blueprint, but rather would feature "guideposts" and serve as a broad outline of the goals the new majority hopes to complete over the next six months.

While Hoyer stated at a weekly press briefing the House will address health care and education bills in coming weeks — specifically mental health parity, the No Child Left Behind Act and re-authorization of the Head Start pre-kindergarten program — in a later interview he would not discuss which topics will take precedent under the new agenda, asserting that House committees must first be allowed to act on the measures.

"Obviously the committees are working," Hoyer said. "We just don't know how fast."

Democratic leadership sources suggested, however, that the plan will target broad topics such as environmental protections and health care initiatives that eventually will be translated into bills focused on clean water and spinal injuries, as well as efforts to address the ongoing recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

While Democrats spent their initial weeks in the House majority focused on their "100 hours" agenda — which included a half-dozen bills that Democrats touted during the 2006 campaign cycle — party leaders subsequently gave little indication about what issues would take precedence on House floor aside from must-do legislation, such as the federal budget and appropriations bills.

In the immediate future, the House is scheduled to debate a resolution next week condemning President Bush's proposal to increase troop levels in Iraq. (See story, p. 1.)

While Democratic sources acknowledged the lull prompted some minor grumbling among Members, Republicans more openly criticized the perceived standstill.

"They didn't have a plan. As the saying goes, when you fail to plan you plan to fail," said one GOP leadership aide, who asserted the Democrats' start paled in comparison to how Republicans began their majority in 1995, when the GOP pushed through the "Contract with America."

"They really haven't delivered much more than a few sound bites when you take a look at the legislation," added the aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

But Democrats defended their control of the chamber, noting that in addition to completing their initial agenda, House lawmakers dealt with a continuing resolution to fund the federal government for the duration of fiscal 2007, a necessity given that the Republican-controlled 109th Congress did not complete work on those spending bills.

"It's important to remember that under normal schedule it would only be our second week here," Hoyer spokeswoman Stacey Bernards said Monday, referring to the fact that recent House sessions have begun in mid-January and typically have not produced significant legislation. "Committees are just now gearing up."

A Democratic leadership aide, who asked not to be identified, echoed that argument.

"We got a massive amount done in January and now we're formulating the agenda for the rest of the year," the aide said Tuesday, adding: "Just because we haven't put [our goals] in a one-pager and called them something doesn't mean we don't have a weighty agenda in the coming months."

Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) also cited Democrats' vow to move legislation through the chamber's regular order, particularly the committee process of hearings and markups.

"The Republicans say, 'Why isn't anything on the floor?' The answer is we don't want to bypass the committees," Frank said. Among the first items his panel will send to the House floor are bills including terrorism risk insurance and executive compensation.

Rep. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), who chairs the centrist New Democrat Coalition, also noted that the new majority hopes to eschew the "truncated process" that many Democrats perceived under the then-Republican majority.

"I think we will not be reactive like the former majority was, where you saw a lot of social agenda, a lot of divisive agenda coming forward because something happened out in the real world that caused people to say, 'That's something that's driving our base,'" Tauscher said. "Regular order is a very important thing for us to do. It's also how you get bipartisan support on legislation."

One Democratic operative, who asked not to be named, said the slow development of an agenda also could be attributed to a learning curve for the new majority.

"It's going to take some time to work out which parts of the system we've had for 12 years stay and which get thrown out," the operative said.

Members Earmarking Without Earmarks (RC)

By Kate Ackley And John Stanton

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

Nobody wants to give up the power of the purse — especially not Members of Congress.

Even though most of the appropriations bills for fiscal 2007 got stripped of practically all Congressionally mandated "earmarks," Members — and the lobbyists who push for funding of specific projects — have turned their attention to the executive branch agencies doling out chunks of money that otherwise would have gone for earmarks.

Members, especially those on the Appropriations and authorizing committees, can wield considerable behind-the-scenes power to make sure their favored projects get funded by executive-branch agencies.

One appropriations lobbyist, who would not be quoted by name, said Members and staffers alike have been calling agency officials to protect their 2007 earmarks.

"I heard Members and staff already made the calls before they put the money in the" omnibus bill, this lobbyist said. "They would say verbally, 'If we have this group submit an application — as long as it is complete and accurate and fits within the parameters of the program — you will honor that, right?' The answer was in the affirmative every time."

And for good reason.

Jim Dyer, a longtime House Appropriations staff member who is now managing director at the consulting firm Clark & Weinstock, said if anyone knows what an agency's spending priorities are, it's the Appropriations committees. And Members can use that power to get their own spending priorities through.

"The agencies recognize that they're up there for the '08 budget," Dyer said. "If they're going to disregard what the Congress wants [for 2007], they're doing it at their own peril. They know they could pay a long-term price for alienating Members."

Michael O'Bannon, president of the budget-focused EOP Group, said that within 30 days of passing the omnibus spending bill, the agencies must provide funding details to Congress.

"To the extent that the Congress does not like what the administration plans to do, obviously when they get that 30-day plan from the agency, they can go back and say we don't really like what you did here," O'Bannon said. "That, too, is an earmark."

Like the unnamed lobbyist, O'Bannon said that the process of calling agency officials is already going on in an informal way, with Appropriations staffers "calling budget officers over at the agency."

And, he said, it's likely that the agency budget officer will do what the Appropriations Committee staffer asks "without any acrimony because of the immense power Congress has" over the agencies' budgets.

But a Senate Appropriations Committee source said that while there may be a push by some Members to bring their clout with an agency to bear, at this point no reports of Senate lawmakers looking to influence how money is spent have surfaced. The aide predicted it likely would take several months before it is clear whether Members have sought to influence agency spending or whether it is a "myth everyone assumes is going on."

However, the committee source did say that Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) was not "happy about turning over the power of the purse" to the executive branch and that the committee would be aggressive in its oversight of the spending process. The aide also said that Byrd and other lawmakers would pay close attention to reports on how federal funds are being doled out.

Nevertheless, Senate aides privately acknowledged that their offices likely would begin contacting agencies to stress their desire that funds earmarked in the appropriations bills passed last year make it to those specific projects.

Gerald Warburg, executive vice president at Cassidy & Associates, one of the biggest appropriations-focused firms, said that one of his clients, the Sacramento Area Flood Control Agency, is fighting to keep funding levels from the Army Corps of Engineers budget, which Congress gave more than $2 billion to give out.

Warburg said a Member of Congress already has had a face-to-face meeting with the agency head to keep the flood-control funding stable. Warburg would not name the Member, but according to published reports, Rep. Doris Matsui (D-Calif.), who represents the Sacramento area, has championed the flood-control programs and met with top officials. A Matsui spokesman did not provide a comment on the issue.

"The best projects are the ones that have to do with public health and safety," Warburg said. If the agencies don't fund those types of projects, then when agency officials are on the Hill this year "defending their FY '08 budget, the legislators are going to be furious."

Another appropriations lobbyist, who would not be quoted by name, said Members on the oversight committees have a better shot at influencing a particular agency than their rank-and-file colleagues.

"Members are going to treat this like regular earmarks," this lobbyist said. "They are going to help their districts and the lobbyists they like that raise money for them."

Colin Wellenkamp, a vice president at the Washington Linkage Group, represents state and local governments — many of which saw their earmarks derailed in the '07 budget.

Wellenkamp said that because cities and other clients lobbying for earmarks have been making their case to Members and staff for more than a year, "These are projects that Congressional offices are intimately aware of, and they are more than equipped to advocate to the agency on our clients' behalf."

Wellenkamp added that much of the money that would have been used for earmarks will now be given out in the form of competitive agency grants.

"We have several clients that are certainly going to try and take advantage of the grant process, to supplement the loss of earmarks in the bill, absolutely," he said. "The money is still around. It's just going to be channeled differently."

Appropriations lobbyists say they worry that some of their peers will end up getting clients funding while they'll be left saying that no one got earmarks when that's not entirely true — because some of the most plugged-in Members and lobbyists will score agency victories for clients.

"Everyone is looking at ways of getting these FY '07 projects funded, and there is some window of opportunity, and it is going to be abused," said the first appropriations lobbyist.

While there might still be uncertainty about the 2007 budget, one thing remains clear: In the 2008 budget, there is going to be "a tremendous amount of pent-up demand," Dyer said.

Pelosi's Push For Jet Remains Up In Air (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The Bush administration has agreed to provide House Speaker Nancy Pelosi with regular access to an Air Force passenger jet, but the two sides are negotiating whether she will get the big aircraft she wants and who she may take as passengers, according to congressional and administration sources.

A congressional source said that Rep. John P. Murtha, chairman of House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, which controls the Pentagon's spending, has telephoned administration officials to urge them to give the speaker what she wants.

The congressional source said Pentagon officials complained that Mr. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, is accusing them of sexism for not immediately heeding her request.

Megan E. Grote, Mr. Murtha's press secretary, said, "Mr. Murtha absolutely never said anything about being 'sexist.' We have no further comment."

Meanwhile, Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida said Mrs. Pelosi's request represents "an arrogance of office that just defies common sense" and called it "a major deviation from the previous speaker."

Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri called it a "flying Lincoln Bedroom," and Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican, labeled the speaker's plane "Pelosi One."

"This is a bullet point to a larger value -- Pelosi's abuse of power continues," Mr. McHenry said yesterday. "It began when the speaker denied minority rights to Republicans, continued with her 'TunaGate' scandal, and now she's exploiting America's armed forces and taxpayers for her own personal convenience."

"TunaGate" was a reference to Democrats exempting American Samoa from legislation to increase the minimum wage. Star-Kist Tuna, whose parent company Del Monte Corp. is based in Mrs. Pelosi's district, had lobbied against the wage increase.

An aide to Mrs. Pelosi, who is arguing she needs the jets for security reasons, yesterday referred questions to the Air Force, which is studying the California Democrat's request along with lawyers at the Pentagon and at the White House. "A lot of people are working this," an Air Force source said.

The congressional source said government lawyers are trying to reconcile Mrs. Pelosi's request with Defense Department policy and congressional travel rules.

The Washington Times first reported last week that Mrs. Pelosi's staff was pressing the administration for access to Air Force aircraft. Sources said the request went beyond what was offered to former House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

Mr. Hastert used an Air Force commuter-type jet to travel to and from his district. Mr. Hastert gained the access for security reasons after the September 11, 2001, attacks. Previously, the House speaker, who is second in the line of succession to the presidency, used commercial flights for such trips.

Mrs. Pelosi wants a larger aircraft that can fly to her home district of San Francisco nonstop. She also wants to be able to ferry other members of the congressional delegation, family members and her staff.

The speaker's request is being handled by her chief counsel, Bernard Raimo, a veteran Democratic lawyer on Capitol Hill.

"Who she can take is being worked out, outside the Air Force," said Ed Gulick, an Air Force spokesman at the Pentagon.

He said the Air Force is studying what types of planes are available for long, cross-country flights. Currently, three planes assigned to the 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force Base can make such nonstop flights year-round -- the C-32, C-40B and C-37.

Such VIP planes are in high demand.

"She's effectively taking a bird out of the fleet," said a defense source. "It will most directly impact the House, because they're the heavy users of the large aircraft. Congress looks at that Andrews fleet as their Hertz rent-a-car."

The congressional source said the speaker's office requested an Air Force plane to take her to a weekend Democratic retreat in Williamsburg, but the Pentagon declined.

The source said Mr. Hastert on one occasion used an Air Force plane for such an event. The Air Force later determined it was a mistake, and such flights were not repeated.

The source said the Pentagon will likely give in to Mrs. Pelosi's requests for a large plane and travel entourage, given her and Mr. Murtha's power over defense spending.

Mr. Raimo argues that Mrs. Pelosi needs a military aircraft, as opposed to commercial flights, for security reasons.

The defense source, who asked not to be named, termed her request "carte blanche," saying she wanted a plane that could carry an entourage just like President Bush, who flies on Air Force One, and Vice President Dick Cheney, who also always flies on military planes.

Department Of Peace Bill Off To A Rocky Start — Again (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 7, 2007

Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) may need to stage a sit-in on the House floor before a Department of Peace and Nonviolence is created.

Kucinich, newly empowered as chairman of the domestic policy subcommittee on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, vowed yesterday to hold hearings on legislation lawmakers have discussed since the dawn of the republic: a bill to establish a Department of Peace and Nonviolence.

It seems that, like the Founding Fathers before him, Kucinich won't get past the talk — even with a bit of Hollywood backing.

Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), whose job is to manage the flow of legislation to the House floor, said that he considers Kucinich a "thoughtful, substantive guy and a good friend," but that "a lot of members have a lot to say about [the bill] and we're going to give them a lot of time to say it."

Perhaps unintentionally, other Democrats slighted the initiative yesterday. The majority governs room assignments, and Kucinich had to hold his peace press conference in a cramped room in the Capitol basement. Meanwhile, a gathering of centrist Republicans, the Tuesday Group, had a better room despite its minority status.

Plus, Hoyer met with reporters while Kucinich was making his announcement. Hoyer's appointment was a regular one — he talks to members of the press at the start of every workweek when Congress is in session — but it perhaps could have been rescheduled. While plenty of cameras showed up at Kucinich's event to get a few frames of "Walk the Line" star Joaquin Phoenix — wearing a black suit and pale green shirt without a tie — few print reporters opted out of the weekly briefing.

Phoenix did not speak; he lent his support, Kucinich said, by his presence.

Several other B-list celebrities were on hand, including actresses Amy Smart and Francis Fisher, as well as Nicole Brown Simpson's sister, Denise Brown, who has founded a charitable organization in her sister's name.

Pointing to Phoenix, Smart and Fisher, Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), a chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, said, "You humble us because we think we're big shots until you show up."

She thanked the celebrities for bringing attention to the peace movement, saying, "We can't do anything if the people in this country don't care."

Despite the logistical hurdles and legislative roadblocks, Kucinich made history when he said he would hold hearings on H.R. 808, which has 52 cosponsors, including centrist Democratic Reps. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.) and Albert Wynn (Md.).

Tauscher pointed to a letter she and Kucinich wrote in 2002 urging Bush to postpone a vote on going to war until after the midterm election. At least one left-leaning political action committee has suggested finding a liberal Democrat to challenge Tauscher; Wynn nearly lost his primary in 2006 to a more liberal Democrat.

"We have to have a balance. For too long we have had a knee-jerk reaction to overuse the military for things like nation-building and reconstruction," Tauscher said. "Politics is never a factor."

Wynn, a new convert to the bill who has called his 2002 vote for the war in Iraq a mistake, said, "It makes sense to send a signal to the world that we'll at least consider non-violent solutions."

Kucinich said as chairman he would revisit the work of the Kerner Commission, which in 1968 issued a report on the causes of riots and violence in American society.

While the activists and actors in attendance agreed on the need to create a Department of Peace, they did not agree on who should become secretary of Peace.

Phoenix said nothing when asked for an informal nomination.

Wynn suggested Kucinich for the job — if he does not become president, that is.

Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.), who questioned President Bush on his handling of the Iraq war on Saturday at the House Democratic retreat, suggested Ret. Gen. Anthony Zinni. The chairwoman of Peace Alliance, Marianne Williamson, said the job should go to Jan Hartke, an environmental activist whose father, while an Indiana senator in the 1960s, introduced legislation to create a Peace Department.

Throughout the hour-long event, Kucinich remained upbeat and positive.

"There will be a Department of Peace," he said, speaking of a department that Jesus Christ, Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr. would have wanted to be a part of government.

"It's not about blaming anyone for anything. We want to capture the human potential … to create peace in our homes to influence peace in the nation," Kucinich said.

Even House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) lavished praise on Kucinich, saying his is the standard by which all other presidential candidates will be judged in terms of their commitment to the peace movement.

The event ended when Kucinich's aide held a hand-written sign from the back of the room that read, "You need to get to the House floor."

White House Wreath Placed In Honor Of Ronald Reagan's Birthday (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

SIMI VALLEY — Former President Ronald Reagan was remembered in a ceremony today on what he would have called another anniversary of his 39th birthday.

Former Attorney General Edwin Meese III and Col. James B. Seaton III, commanding officer of the Marine Corps' Camp Pendleton, placed a wreath of white roses on behalf of President Bush at Reagan's grave at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Museum.

Bush said in a proclamation that the wreath and military honors were sent "in tribute to his distinguished service to a grateful nation."

Two World War II vintage military aircraft flew over the ceremony and Marines offered a 21-gun salute.

Reagan, who died on June 5, 2004, at 93 after a 10-year battle with Alzheimer's disease, was remembered by Meese as a Cold War warrior for his "peace-through-strength" mantra. Meese said Reagan led the United States out of a national malaise and ended the Cold War.

"He had integrity," Meese said. "And he had perseverance.... We celebrate the legacy of Ronald Reagan."

Seaton told the crowd of about 600 seated on a sunny lawn near the grave that Reagan was an inspiration to the Marine Corps during his presidency and that legacy lives on today as the military faces adversaries in Iraq.

"America didn't become great because we took the easy road," the colonel said.

Former first lady Nancy Reagan, reported feeling a bit under the weather and reserving her energy for an evening library fundraiser honoring former President George H.W. Bush, said in a statement that her husband would have enjoyed the tributes.

"It's hard to believe that Ronnie would have been 96 years old today," Mrs. Reagan said. "I know he would have been thrilled to see the military band and color guard, the Naval Academy Glee Club and the flyover at his library today, and he would have been touched that so many of his old friends are coming to celebrate on his behalf."

Tonight, Mrs. Reagan planned to present former President Bush with the 2007 Ronald Reagan Freedom Award during a gala at the Beverly Hilton Hotel.

The award is given to those who "have contributed greatly to the cause of freedom worldwide." Past recipients include Colin Powell, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Jordan's King Hussein, Lady Margaret Thatcher, the Rev. Billy Graham, Bob Hope and Rudolph Giuliani.

"George was not only my husband's dedicated vice president, but he was also Ronnie's loyal friend," Mrs. Reagan said in a statement.

"Working closely with Ronald Reagan was one of the great joys of my life, and receiving this prestigious Reagan Freedom Award is something I will treasure always," former President Bush said in a statement.

The Biggest Secret In Health Care (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

President Bush might seem a candidate for OCD treatment, what with his insistence that the fix for health care is tax reform. He was at it again in his latest budget proposal, which calls for reforming the unlimited tax break for job-related health insurance.

Where does he get such ideas?

The answer: From every recent president that went before him, including Presidents Reagan, Bush and Clinton. And from all the wonks in wonkdom, who've long understood that the tax code was the problem and who've occasionally even shared this understanding with the public, most recently during the heady days before the Clinton health plan was submitted to a congressional dumpster.

A newspaper we know and love, in 1993, reported as a nearly uncontested fact: "The tax breaks on this enormous transfer of wealth have created a health-care market characterized by inefficiency, ignorance and excess."

The head of Blue Cross & Blue Shield declared: "The most powerful incentive is the tax code. We've been through five decades of teaching the individual that health care is a free good."

Paul Ellwood, godfather of the Clinton plan, said: "Changing the tax status of health benefits is the glue that holds managed competition together."

Bill Clinton himself said: "There has to be some sort of personal responsibility in this health-care system we set up."

Let the current President Bush give voice to the same analysis, however, and it must be some kind of supply-side hokum.

To rehearse: The tax code is the original hectoring mommy behind our health-care neuroses. It gives the biggest subsidy to those who need it least. It pays the affluent to buy more medical care than they would if they were spending their own money. It prompts them to launder our health spending through an insurance bureaucracy, creating endless paperwork. It prices millions of less-favored taxpayers out of the market for health insurance. It fosters a misconception that health care is free even as workers are perplexed over the failure of their wages to rise.

Clark Havighurst, a Duke University sage, points to one of the many destructive consequences: "With insured consumer-voters generally believing that someone other than themselves is paying for their health care, they see no reason not to approve regulatory and other public policies that raise the cost of that care and foreclose opportunities to economize."

He was thinking of the congressional rage to prevent managed care from saving us money, after Congress and everyone else first championed managed care as a way to save us money.

Others point to a destructive consequence for the practice of medicine itself. Patients, because their only skin in the game is their skin, end up listening to doctors and hospitals who are massively incentivized to expose them to more procedures, more tests and more drugs than patients, quite apart from any consideration of costs, would choose for themselves.

Guess what? The patients are right. Much of this superfluous care is bad for their health. (Such is the finding of a long-running Dartmouth Medical School study of national treatment patterns.)

Much better, in our view, would be simply to do away with the tax break and let businesses and consumers adjust. The insurance industry wouldn't stand around and watch its livelihood vanish. And tax rates could be adjusted to make sure the overall tax burden remains unchanged. You'd be shocked at how quickly the system would right itself.

Alas, there is panic on K Street when anyone suggests doing away with the tax break directly. The health industry goes ape. (Think doctors, hospitals, drug makers, insurers, etc. don't enjoy having a $200 billion-a-year tax subsidy to encourage consumption of their products? Think big business doesn't like having a tax subsidy for a good chunk of its employment costs? Think they don't lobby?)

So Mr. Bush makes peace with the tax code's bias toward health spending in order to do battle with the particular vice of our overreliance on third-party payment. He does so by equalizing the tax treatment of health dollars whether they flow directly from a consumer pocket (the vehicle here is health savings accounts) or through a third-party laundromat.

He would do so by equalizing the treatment of health insurance whether you buy it yourself or your employer buys it for you (his latest plan).

No, hosannas will not be sung to him by left or right. However, keep something in mind as the 2008 debate heats up. The oft-mouthed goal of expanding health insurance to the poor would be far easier to achieve if we stopped subsidizing overconsumption by the non-poor.

There's a lesson in presidential leadership here. Mr. Clinton lost interest in health care after a few months when he discovered health care wouldn't result in a monument to his presidency. In a very pre-postmodern approach, Mr. Bush identified the same basic problem and has worked steadily away at it, showing that a president can accomplish something as long as he's willing not to receive any credit.

The one great and glaring fault in his record is the creation of an unsustainable drug benefit to add to the unsustainable burden of future Medicare spending. Then again, what is unsustainable is unsustainable.

The pattern for that reform is already present between the lines -- towards greater reliance on saving than taxing, towards greater reliance on individual responsibility than on the illusory free-lunchism of government transfers. For the problem of Medicare is the problem health care writ small: The illusion that somebody else is available to pay our bills for us.

Beyond Health-Care Band-Aids (WP)

By Ezekiel J. Emanuel And Victor R. Fuchs

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

It seems everyone has ideas for health-care reform. President Bush has proposed tax breaks to encourage the uninsured to buy coverage. Massachusetts has approved and California has proposed individual mandates with state subsidies to allow people with low incomes to buy coverage. Maryland wants to raise cigarette taxes to pay for coverage for the working uninsured. John Edwards wants to require employers to provide insurance or pay into a fund that would help individuals buy insurance. Sen. Hillary Clinton has proposed increasing the income eligibility limits for the State Children's Health Insurance Program. And the list goes on.

This profusion of proposals means that health care is getting more attention, and this makes reform more likely. But these proposals are like band-aids and fall far short of what our sick health-care system needs.

They build on what everyone agrees is a broken system. Ultimately, they prop up the sagging employment-based insurance system, with all its inefficiencies and inequities, and preserve the second-class income-tested programs such as Medicaid. By focusing on covering the uninsured, they fail to address either administrative inefficiency or long-term cost control. Consequently, in the short run they require ever more money to cover the uninsured, and in the long run the unabated rise in health costs will quickly revive the problem of the uninsured.

At $2 trillion per year, the U.S. health-care system suffers much more from inefficiency than lack of funds. The system wastes money on administration, unnecessary tests and marginal medicines that cost a lot for little health benefit. It also provides strong financial incentives to preserve such inefficiency.

By building on the existing health-care system, these reform proposals entrench the perverse incentives.

Moreover, even plans that reduce the number of uninsured today may find that those gains will disappear in a few years if costs continue to grow much faster than gross domestic product. As costs rise, many companies will drop insurance and pay the modest taxes or fees that have been proposed. States will find that costs exceed revenue and that cuts will have to be made.

The State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) provides a good example of the toxic interactions between public and private coverage. When it was enacted in 1997, SCHIP filled a hole, offering insurance to children whose parents earned too much to be covered by Medicaid but not enough to buy private health insurance. By 2005, 6 million children received health coverage through SCHIP. But SCHIP has had only a small impact on the overall number of uninsured children. In 2006, there were nearly 9 million uninsured children, compared with 10 million uninsured in 1997. Why? As costs rose, some companies stopped offering insurance, others dropped coverage for dependents, and others raised employee contributions to the point where some workers preferred covering their children through SCHIP.

Band-aids are not enough. The country needs comprehensive reform. Here are five essential changes:

Â· Get businesses out of health care. Health care is not part of their core competencies but something they use as a part of labor relations. It creates job lock and distorts employers' hiring and firing decisions.

Â· Guarantee every American an essential benefits package. This package -- modeled on what members of Congress get -- should be provided by qualified plans that would receive a risk-adjusted payment for each enrollee. Americans could choose their health plans, with guaranteed enrollment and renewability; "cherry-picking" and "lemon-dropping" would be minimized.

Â· The universal basic package should be financed by a dedicated tax that everyone pays, such as a value-added tax.

Â· Administer the program through an independent National Health Board and regional boards modeled on the Federal Reserve System. They would oversee health plans, define the benefits packages and, through strong incentives, facilitate adoption of patient safety measures and electronic management of medical records.

Â· Establish an independent Institute for Technology and Outcomes Assessment to systematically evaluate new technologies and quantify their health benefits in relation to their costs. These evaluations would be used by the National Health Board and health plans.

Reform based on these measures would eliminate job lock, increase workers' wages and make labor markets more efficient. It would also give Americans -- rather than their employers -- their choice of health plans, doctors and hospitals. And it would eliminate the $200 billion business tax deduction for providing health coverage.

Most important, such measures would improve efficiency and provide cost control for the health-care system. Eliminating employers' vetting of insurance companies and all associated costs would save tens of billions of dollars. Since all Americans would be guaranteed coverage, means testing and determination of subsidies necessary for Medicaid and SCHIP would be eliminated. Finally, the expected consolidation of the health insurance industry would also increase efficiency.

Only comprehensive change of our broken system can provide universal, portable coverage, reduce inefficiency, control costs and secure health care for all Americans long into the future.

Hollywood Takes Its Concerns About Piracy And Taxes To Washington (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Hollywood has often been a whipping boy here, but with a new Congress in session, the heads of the major movie studios converged on the capital Tuesday to pitch their industry in the unaccustomed role of good guy: boon to the trade balance, engine of economic growth, polisher of the nation's image and employer of a big, uncelebrated, middle-class work force.

Cheered by the Democratic takeover, the industry's leadership hopes to press its agenda of fighting piracy, obtaining new tax advantages and reining in movie and television production from going abroad.

So the Motion Picture Association of America put on a daylong show for lawmakers, lobbyists and Capitol Hill aides, armed with some A-list talent — the actor Will Smith gave a morning speech, and Clint Eastwood received an award at dinner — and a new study showing that film and TV production accounts for $30 billion in wages, $10 billion in taxes, more than 400,000 jobs and a trade surplus of $9.5 billion.

"When people read about us, they read about celebrity and glitz," said Dan Glickman, the trade association's chairman, who said he learned much about other industries from such programs while he was a congressman. "That's an asset we have, but that's not enough."

Judging from a few panel discussions, the M.P.A.A. had calculated that it would be hard to drum up sympathy for an industry symbolized by its highly paid stars and largely made up of giant conglomerates. So, atop the talking points, apparently, was the idea that the movie business is really made up of middle-class guild and union members who often live hand to mouth.

"It's not just me and Tom," said Mr. Smith, referring to Tom Cruise, one of his peers who can command $20 million a picture. He said his latest film, "I Am Legend," was employing 1,000 local crew members and actors on location in New York.

The director Paris Barclay told of trying to hire one of his favorite technicians recently, and learning that the man had moved his wife and three children to Vancouver, because that is where the work is.

And Taylor Hackford, the director of "Ray," in establishing his credentials, added: "I'm working class."

DOJ_NMG_0129125

The conversation often turned to piracy, the existential issue that dominates the association's agenda. Mr. Hackford, who spent more than a decade developing "Ray," told of finding a bootleg DVD of the movie on the day of its theatrical release, and said 42 million illicit copies were sold within five months.

That meant millions of dollars in lost revenue — "and DVDs is how people get their money back," he said of movie financiers. "If they don't, will I be able to sell a hard-to-sell picture like 'Ray'? No."

In a rare moment of newsmaking, Barry M. Meyer, the chairman of Warner Brothers, issued a sharp rebuke to the president of the Consumer Electronics Association, Gary Shapiro, who warned in January that antipiracy efforts could "smother" technological progress and said that "private conduct may be unauthorized, but that does not mean it is piracy."

Mr. Meyer took issue with calling the theft of intellectual property merely unauthorized rather than illegal, and said that Hollywood's promotion of so-called digital rights management technology had made it possible for consumers to rent or buy movies and TV programs at a variety of prices.

"It's easy to demonize it, but without some level of control and order, things don't work," he said. "The only choice we're not offering is free."

He added: "Unlike the technology industry, which can outrun pirates by upgrading their product, there is no 'Gone With the Wind 2.0.' "

Mr. Glickman took Mr. Meyer and some of his peers — Brad Grey of Paramount and Michael Lynton of Sony Pictures — to the capital for meetings with the new Senate leader, Harry Reid of Nevada; Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the minority leader; and Representative Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi; Mr. Hoyer; Senator Christopher Dodd of Connecticut; and Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York attended an evening reception.

Almost no mention was made of the M.P.A.A.'s movie rating system, which Mr. Glickman recently tweaked. And it was not a Republican, but Senator Dianne Feinstein of California who, departing from a paean to everything else the movie industry stands for, called for the studio chiefs in the room to cut down on gratuitous sex and violence.

More typical of the day, however, was Representative Charles Rangel, the new Ways and Means chairman, promising to press the Bush administration to take a tougher line in trade talks with Russia, China and other countries concerning rampant piracy or barriers to Hollywood movies.

And then there was Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, vowing to press the Justice Department to do more about piracy — moments before rushing over to the actor James Cromwell and complimenting his performance as Prince Philip in "The Queen."

Mystery Solved (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, February 7, 2007

It had been one of the best little puzzles of the 110th Congress so far: Why did Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) miss 19 House votes over four days in mid-January? Where was he?

Burton's office hadn't returned several calls from HOH over the past couple of weeks on this subject, nor did it respond to inquiries from the local press. No one in the Republican leadership seemed to know, either.

Now, when HOH finally learned Tuesday where Burton had been — courtesy of a report in The Indianapolis Star — he kicked himself for not figuring it out earlier. As anyone who has followed Burton over the years should have known, he was playing golf.

Specifically, Burton was at the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic in lovely Palm Springs, Calif., where he played in the pro-am event at four local golf courses over four days.

Keeping with tradition, Burton's office did not respond to HOH's request for comment Tuesday, and his staff didn't return the Star's calls, either.

And really, why should they? Why should an elected official like Burton have to explain his whereabouts to anyone? So what if he just decided not to go to work for a week? Can't you do that at your job? How important was it really to vote on stem-cell research funding, the minimum wage or energy policy when he had the chance to play golf with celebrities such as Yogi Berra, George Lopez, Michael Bolton, Huey Lewis and Maury Povich? This whole story is working HOH into a Lou Dobbs-style populist lather.

Anyway, Burton has been playing in the annual Bob Hope event for several years and often has missed House votes to do so. Sometimes, however, Burton has been able to make his tee time without missing any House work.

HOH's favorite example came in 2000, when Burton, at the time still the chairman of what was then known as the Government Reform Committee, scheduled a panel field hearing in nearby Los Angeles the same week as the Bob Hope event.

DOJ_NMG_0129126

The purpose of the hearing — HOH is not making this up — was to study whether Soviet agents had ever hidden secret stashes of weapons in the United States in case World War III broke out. The hearing was definitely NOT an excuse for Burton to fly out to sunny Southern California in the dead of winter on the taxpayers' dime.

"It's my understanding that there are many potential targets for Russian sabotage in California," Burton said at the time. "If there are hidden caches of explosives in the state, that's very dangerous. ... That's why we are here."

Then in 2005, HOH told you about Burton missing an important International Relations Committee vote on UN reform because he was playing at the Booz Allen Hamilton pro-am golf tournament over at Congressional Country Club in Bethesda, Md. That probably didn't do much for Burton in the race for the top GOP slot on the International Relations Committee, a contest he ended up losing to Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (Fla.).

As for the Bob Hope tournament, the Star reported that Burton may have paid at least part of his annual entry fee — this year's was $12,000 — to the charitable event out of his campaign account, which may not be acceptable given that Federal Election Commission rules allow Members to give campaign funds to charity only if they don't get anything in return.

And the donations Burton did make from his campaign account to Eisenhower Medical Center, the main charity involved with the Bob Hope event, apparently were part of Burton's pledge to give away contributions he had received from incarcerated lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Of course, Burton probably thinks all those rules are kind of overblown anyway. Back on Jan. 4, the House voted 430-1 to sharply restrict gifts and privately funded travel for Members; Burton, of course, was the lone "no" vote.

Maybe HOH is being too cynical about Burton. All this week, the AT&T Pebble Beach National Pro-Am is going on out in scenic Monterey, Calif., and yet the Indiana lawmaker has been right here on Capitol Hill, voting on the House floor. Maybe by skipping the event, Burton is showing that he's changed his ways.

Or maybe he just didn't get an invite.

The Truth About Cats and Dogs. Normally, HOH makes a point of noting when celebrities are coming to Capitol Hill. In the case of an event today, however, he'll just settle for telling you which celebrities are going to be taken to the woodshed.

At 10 a.m. in 1116 Longworth, Reps. Jim Moran (D-Va.) and Mike Ferguson (R-N.J.) will join Wayne Pacelle, president and CEO of the Humane Society, to reveal details of that group's investigation into the ongoing use of cat and dog fur in fur products sold in the United States.

Apparently the Humane Society's tests have shown that fur coats from some high-end designers have at least some dog and/or cat fur in them. Yuck.

What's the celebrity angle? One issue that is expected to come up at the event is the fact that, according to the Humane Society, two of the designers who may be mixing some Fido and Fluffy into their products are none other than Jay-Z, proprietor of Rocawear, and Sean "Diddy" Combs, designer of Sean John (though Diddy has reportedly pledged to pull the offending garments off the shelves).

Tempted as he's been, HOH remains pleased with his recent decision not to buy any of Jay-Z's fur coats.

Government Inside Out (NYT)

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

The United States is quickly becoming a government of the contractors, by the contractors and for the contractors. While the private security personnel in Iraq have attracted the most attention, many day-to-day operations are no longer in the hands of federal employees. Functions as disparate as clerical work and tax collection are handled by private companies, while oversight of this always for-profit work is being sorely neglected.

There are plenty of examples of good contracting. The Interstate highway system was built in large part by contractors. The problem is that the explosion of government outsourcing under the Bush administration has not been accompanied by a sufficient increase in civil service personnel to oversee it and ensure that the work is done properly and without squandering taxpayer dollars.

As Scott Shane and Ron Nixon reported recently in The Times, spending on outsourced contracts has nearly doubled under this administration, to roughly $400 billion last year from $207 billion in 2000, while oversight staff levels have remained flat. At the same time, fewer and fewer contracts are being put up for competitive bids. While 79 percent of contracts were competitive in 2001, the number dropped to 48 percent in 2005. The top contractors are spending millions on lobbying and campaign contributions to ensure that the work keeps coming.

The conventional wisdom — which owes as much to the Clinton administration's emphasis on "reinventing government" as the Bush administration's fealty to the superiority of the private sector — holds that outsourcing saves money because the private sector is supposedly more efficient.

But if there is to be any chance of cutting costs, that will have to come from competitive bidding. In one example from Mr. Shane and Mr. Nixon's story, a group of contract employees at the General Services Administration cost roughly double what the pay and benefits of comparable federal workers would have. What is most needed is a return to pragmatism, where each decision of whether to use government workers or outside companies is dictated by cost, rather than ideology or political favors.

Fed Chief Warns Of Widening Inequality (WSJ)

By David Wessel

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke cautioned that widening economic inequality may make Americans "less willing to accept the dynamism ... so essential to economic progress." But he warned politicians to avoid responses that would make labor markets less flexible or create barriers to international trade and investment.

In an unusual speech for a central banker, Mr. Bernanke said a wiser approach to the problem would be to improve education and training and to cushion dislocations caused by technology and globalization. He cited such steps as making health and pension benefits more portable and offering retraining and job-search assistance to displaced workers.

Mr. Bernanke's comments at the Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce add to a chorus of concern about widening economic inequality from top government officials, including President Bush, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, as well as prominent Democrats.

Wandering beyond the boundaries of monetary policy, his area of responsibility, Mr. Bernanke said: "Although average economic well-being has increased considerably over time, the degree of inequality in economic outcomes has increased as well ... for at least three decades." A text of his speech was released by the Fed in Washington.

In his 15-page lecture, complete with 48 academic references, Mr. Bernanke documented the inequality evident in data on wages, household incomes and even baseball players' contracts. He also examined economic forces behind the trend, from changes in technology that have increased employers' appetite for more-educated workers, to the decline of unions, to the surge in chief executives' salaries, to the impact of globalization. He said the effect of the latter has been "moderate and almost surely less important than the effects of ... technological change."

The Fed chairman noted that in professions ranging from entertainment to investment banking, the forces of globalization and technological innovation have increased the value of the most-talented individuals -- the "superstars" -- over the merely good. "Two decades ago, the highest-paid player for the Boston Red Sox (and in the American League), Jim Rice, earned (in inflation-adjusted terms) just over $3 million. In 2004, the highest-paid player on the Red Sox (and in all of major-league baseball) was Manny Ramirez, who received $22.5 million for the season."

"The number of fans who can fit into Fenway Park has not increased much ... presumably the Red Sox owners believed that Ramirez's highest salary was justified by the increases in broadcast and merchandising revenues he might generate as a result of the confluence of new distribution channels (such as Internet-based broadcasts of games) and a larger and wealthier potential global audience," he added.

Mr. Bernanke spoke explicitly about the degree and causes of inequality, and more carefully about the increasingly loud political debate over what, if anything, to do about it. "Firm conclusions about the extent to which policy should attempt to offset inequality ... are properly left to the political process," he said.

But he offered three principles that he said are "broadly accepted in our society" -- economic opportunity should be as widely distributed and equal as possible, economic outcomes needn't be equal but should be linked to a person's contributions, and people should get some insurance against very painful outcomes.

"We ... believe," he said, referring to Americans generally, "that no one should be allowed to slip too far down the economic ladder, especially for reasons beyond his or her control."

Mr. Bernanke, who served briefly as an economic adviser to Mr. Bush before becoming Fed chief a year ago, avoided any mention of tax policy, a favorite tool of Democrats interested in reducing the inequality produced by market forces. He noted that eliminating inequality altogether would be unwise.

"Our market-based economy, which encourages productive activity primarily through the promise of financial reward, would function less effectively," he argued. The dynamism that has propelled the U.S. economy for decades brings with it "painful dislocations" for some workers, he added. But he said, "If we did not place some limits on the downside risks to individuals ... the public at large might become less willing to accept the dynamism that is so essential to economic progress."

When Mr. Greenspan was Fed chairman, he occasionally expressed concern about the widening gap between winners and losers in the American economy, though usually in response to questions from members of Congress, rather than in public speeches. At the Joint Economic Committee in June 2005, for instance, Mr. Greenspan observed, "As I've often said, this is not the type of thing which a democratic society -- a capitalist democratic society -- can really accept without addressing."

Mr. Greenspan generally attributed the disparities to the extra wages that employers pay more-educated workers. Mr. Bernanke acknowledged that is a major factor, but not the only one.

Bernanke Suggests Job Skills To Combat Inequality (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 7, 2007

The growing income gap is largely the result of disparities in skill and education between the rich and poor, though globalization, trade and the waning influence of labor unions have played a role, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday.

To remedy inequality, Congress and the Bush administration should enact measures that ensure all Americans receive an equal opportunity to succeed by receiving good education and job skills, while resisting pressure to erect barriers to trade that will prevent Americans from enjoying the overwhelming benefits and higher living standards afforded by global markets, he said.

"Workers with more education are better positioned to adapt to changing demands in the workplace," and such flexibility has been a hallmark of America's economic success, he said. That has enabled overall living standards to grow steadily, even as the gap has widened between earners at the top and bottom of the income scale.

Congressional Democrats have floated a variety of measures to address the income gap, including raising the minimum wage, increasing taxes on the most highly paid executives, making it easier for unions to organize workers, and requiring negotiators to focus on the job and income impacts of international trade.

Mr. Bernanke acknowledged that growing income disparities are an important problem for Congress to address, and said many approaches can be considered to ensure everyone receives an equal opportunity to succeed and to provide social safety nets for those whose jobs and incomes are cut off by international competition.

"A bedrock American principle is the idea that all individuals should have the opportunity to succeed on the basis of their own effort, skill and ingenuity," he said. "We also believe that no one should be allowed to slip too far down the economic ladder, especially for reasons beyond his or her control."

But he cautioned against remedies that try to eliminate the disparity altogether.

"We do not guarantee equality of economic outcomes, nor should we," he said. "Without the possibility of unequal outcomes tied to differences in effort and skill, the economic incentive for productive behavior would be eliminated" and economic growth would be sacrificed.

People with the best educations and skills have been able to command higher and higher incomes because of the increasing complexity of technology-driven jobs and businesses, while people with minimal education have had to compete with billions of workers around the world who have similar job skills -- keeping their wages relatively flat, Mr. Bernanke said.

Evidence of the dramatic link between education and income is seen in the 75 percent gap between the average wages of college graduates and high school graduates and the 42 percent gap between those with high school degrees and those without them, he said.

Studies have documented that globalization -- including both trade and immigration -- puts pressure on the wages of low- and middle-income earners who compete with foreign workers even while trade and labor flows overall increase jobs and economic growth, he said.

Lower rates of unionization also accounted for between 10 percent and 20 percent of the increase in wage disparity among middle-income men in the 1970s and 1980s, he said.

But by far the largest factor causing inequality has been the skills gap.

Between 1979 and 2006, because of a combination of forces, the earnings of the top 10 percent of workers soared by 34 percent, while the wages of middle-income workers grew by 11.5 percent and the wages of the bottom 10 percent increased only 4 percent, he said.

Even taking into account extensive tax and spending programs that transfer income from the top earners to the bottom half, the disparities have grown, he said. The share of after-tax income enjoyed by the top fifth of workers grew to 50 percent in 2004 from 42 percent in 1979, while the share of those in the bottom fifth shrank from 7 percent to 5 percent.

Bernanke: Fixing Income Gap Will Take Education (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

DOJ_NMG_0129129

USA Today, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Globalization isn't the main cause of rising U.S. income inequality, and attacking the problem by imposing barriers to trade and technology would "do far more harm than good," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday.

A better way to address the gap between lower- and higher-income Americans — and to ease the sometimes "painful dislocations" of free markets — would be to improve training and education or alter current policies to let workers keep health care and pension benefits when they change jobs, Bernanke told the Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce.

Bernanke cautioned that without steps to smooth the effects of a changing economy, people could "become less willing to accept the dynamism that is so essential to economic progress." But the Fed chief, who sat at a table with billionaire investor Warren Buffett, stressed that determining the proper balance between free markets and social policy was a job for politicians, not the Fed.

"Although we Americans strive to provide equality of economic opportunity, we do not guarantee equality of economic outcomes, nor should we," Bernanke said. "That said, we also believe that no one should be allowed to slip too far down the economic ladder."

His remarks come as Democrats, who now control Congress, are building an agenda around inequality and middle-class economic concerns. Their initiatives include raising the minimum wage, limiting CEO pay, boosting college aid, making it easier to form unions and addressing labor and trade concerns.

"Despite the growing economy and skyrocketing corporate profits, the typical American family has actually seen its income decrease," says Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

President Bush acknowledged recently that income inequality is a problem, but Democrats differ with his economic remedies, which include a focus on tax cuts.

In his speech, Bernanke noted that even though average living standards have risen considerably in recent decades, wealth distribution has become more skewed. The wealthiest fifth of households received 42% of after-tax income in 1979, a figure that rose to 50% in 2004. The share of those in the bottom fifth dropped to 5% from 7%.

There are many reasons for the trend, Bernanke said, including the fact that wages for better-educated workers have risen faster than for their lesser-educated counterparts. Technology seems to have improved the efficiency of highly skilled workers more than of less-skilled workers. The decline of unions has altered pay patterns.

But he warned that erecting barriers to globalized trade would undermine key sources of economic growth and rising living standards. And in any case, Bernanke said, globalization, including trade and immigration, isn't the main culprit.

"Overall, I read the available evidence as favoring the view that the influence of globalization on inequality has been moderate and almost surely less important than the effects of skill-biased technological change," he said.

USA Today, February 7, 2007

NEW YORK — Stocks slogged through a day of uneventful trading Tuesday after National Semiconductor issued a profit warning and investors awaited results from networker Cisco Systems.

The Dow Jones industrials rose 4.57 points to 12,666.31, the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 1.01 points to 1448.00, and the Nasdaq composite index climbed 0.89 points to 2471.49.

National Semi, which makes chips used in mobile telephones, dropped 64 cents to $22.68 after it warned late Monday that it expects sales to fall more than previously expected. That sparked a sell-off among chipmakers, including Texas Instruments, off 37 cents to $31.22, Advanced Micro Devices, down 28 cents to $15.32, and Maxim Integrated, off 72 cents to $31.70.

Investors also awaited results from Cisco, often considered a tech bellwether. The report marks one of the last closely watched companies to issue results as fourth-quarter earnings season winds down. After the close, Cisco said its earnings rose slightly more than expected. (Story, 2B.)

Investors have been reluctant to buy into the market without some kind of news that might indicate where the economy or corporate earnings are heading. The market gained some traction during the day Tuesday but drifted lower after a speech by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke didn't address interest rates. (Story, 5B.)

"The market is not expensive, it's not dirt cheap, and the catalyst over the past few weeks has been earnings," says Matt Kelmon of Kelmoore Strategy Funds. "Everything is really on hold until the market finds something else to talk about, but there's still no huge sign of an imminent pullback."

Highlights:

Las Vegas Sands slid $3.41 to $100.68. The casino operator said fourth-quarter profit rose as it made more money off of losing gamblers. The company earned an extra $30 million in operating profit at table games for high rollers.

·Anadarko Petroleum lost 48 cents to $42.47. The oil refiner said fourth-quarter profit doubled because of a gain from the sale of a Canadian unit.

·IAC/InterActiveCorp lost 55 cents to $38.72. The website company that operates Ticketmaster and Ask.com reported fourth-quarter profit fell 85%.

·Myriad Genetics added 82 cents to $35.87. The biotech company reported its fiscal second-quarter loss widened, but it was able to beat projections.

DJIA Edges Up To 12666.31, 7.37 Points Shy Of Record (WSJ)

By PETER A. MCKAY

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

For a second straight day, the stock market inched upward but finished shy of a record, as investors continued to take a breather from last week's buying spree.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 4.57 points, just 0.04%, to 12666.31, up 1.6% on the year and 7.37 points shy of its record set last Thursday.

Even remarks by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke couldn't cut through the market's torpor. In a speech to the Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Bernanke warned that increased wage inequality could impede economic progress. He avoided any pronouncements on interest-rate policy, a more pressing short-term issue for investors.

Wall Street increasingly believes it has figured out the Fed's likely strategy, with many investing pros betting on a long period of unchanged interest-rate targets from the Fed, allowing solid-but-unspectacular growth in corporate profits.

The last holdouts to that guardedly sunny outlook seemed to buy into it last week, as the Dow industrials rallied 166.47 points. This week, it seems players are avoiding any new, big bets.

"The market is digesting the recent gains, waiting to see something bigger on the horizon," said analyst Richard Sparks of Schaeffer's Investment Research.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.01 points, or 0.1%, to 1448.00, up 2.1% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index was nearly unchanged, up just 0.89 point, at 2471.49, up 2.3% on the year.

Keith Hembre, chief economist at mutual-fund firm First American Funds, said he expects that a rise in the unemployment rate will eventually prompt the Fed to cut its rate targets, perhaps in the second half of the year. Such a move would lower borrowing costs throughout the economy, prompting consumer spending and investment in stocks and other assets.

"In the meantime, the economic growth we're seeing is still enough to produce real earnings gains," which help the stock market, Mr. Hembre said.

The government released weekly data showing a rise in U.S. inventories of crude oil. Still, a continuing cold snap in the Northeast buoyed prices.

Crude contracts for March delivery inched up 14 cents, or 0.2%, to $58.88 a barrel, off 3.6% this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange but up 17% from its 52-week low less than three weeks ago.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.6%, or 1.51 points, to 248.62.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose, as did bond prices. The 10-year Treasury note jumped 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.765%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 120.12 yen, compared with 120.41 yen. The euro strengthened to $1.2981 from $1.2928.

GOP Views Clinton As Virtually Unbeatable (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield And Jim VandeHei

The Politico, February 7, 2007

What many conservatives regard as the nightmare scenario -- President Hillary Rodham Clinton -- is increasingly seen by veteran Republican politicians and strategists as virtual inevitability.

In GOP circles, the Democratic front-runner is seen as so strong, and the political climate for Republicans so hostile, that many influential voices -- including current and former lawmakers, and veterans of President Bush's campaigns -- have grown despairing. These partisans describe a political equivalent of the stages of grief, starting with denial, then resentment and ending with acceptance.

For now, these Republicans say the party needs good luck, including a change of fortune in Iraq, and a revival of organization and leadership in the conservative movement to avert another Clinton presidency.

"If the conservative movement and Republicans don't understand how massive the Clinton coalition is, she will be the next president," former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said in an interview last week, after giving a private talk to GOP lawmakers. Clinton will win, he added, "if we don't use everything available to us and motivate our base, the people that believe in us."

In his closed-door comments to conservative House members, DeLay warned of the wealth and political potency of the Clinton fundraising network.

"We do have to get our act together, and I'd agree with Tom DeLay on that," said Rep. Steve King of Iowa. "At this point, short an inspirational Republican nominee, then I would agree that it's going to be very difficult to beat Hillary if she wins the nomination."

Those comments echoed those by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich last month on Fox News: "I think you have to start with the idea that, if we don't get Baghdad solved, and if we continue to drift, that it will be very hard for a Republican to win next year, no matter what our values and what our beliefs. And, second, you have to believe that, at the present moment, she is the odds-on favorite to be the Democratic nominee."

Even some well-connected outside advisers to Bush said in interviews they essentially accept this analysis. These strategists are advising Republicans that it will be next to impossible to win the White House if Bush's popularity remains so low, and public disgust with the war so high. Beyond the polls, some said there are gaps between the organizational prowess of the Clinton operation and any of the Republicans currently competing for the nomination.

Jack Oliver, former deputy chairman of the Republican National Committee, said Clinton is a prodigious fundraiser who can be beaten only with a specific and optimistic vision. "The challenge for Republicans is to avoid the temptation of just being against her," Oliver said. "It's not enough to keep the White House."

The comments are striking at several levels. The flagging conservative morale about beating Clinton comes at the same time many Democrats regard the New York senator as newly vulnerable because of the competition she faces from Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and skepticism she faces from activists opposed to the Iraq war. On the Republican side, there is a disconnect between grass-roots, red-state Republicans and the mostly Washington-based operatives who surround Bush. While conservative publishers and organizers have made a fortune off the loathing for Clinton among workaday Republicans, people around the president have always expressed a grudging respect for her wiles and willpower and have long warned that she would be a formidable national candidate.

Several top Republicans said the fears that Clinton could be a prohibitive favorite have contributed to overall blahs that activists feel about the GOP field. One presidential adviser said that Clinton dread was actually helping Republican leaders stomach candidates who might otherwise be unacceptable. "People are willing to sacrifice some of their ideological principles to win," the adviser said.

The conservative movement, ascendant for much of the Bush presidency, is now divided and dispirited. GOP leaders report that it is harder than ever to organize Republicans around a common cause and that Democrats have made progress in recent years in rebuilding the infrastructure of their party. In this mood of malaise, the prospect of a Hillary Clinton presidency is one prod leaders use to shock conservative troops into action.

Some Republicans say a Clinton presidency might even be good for Republicans. "If Americans actually have to witness and live through a Hillary Clinton presidency, it will remind us why we are fundamentally traditional conservatives in America. We believe in hard work, strong families," said Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla.

Conservatives are slowly starting to organize against Clinton, but the effort lacks the vitality and vitriol of the attacks on former first lady in the 1990s. Dick Morris, the former top adviser to President Clinton, is raising money to help produce a documentary critical of Clinton. Morris has argued publicly that Clinton is poised to win in 2008.

The movie is being made with Citizens United, a conservative advocacy group run by longtime Clinton opponents David N. Bossie and Floyd G. Brown. "Hillary Movie Coming Soon!" says the group's Web site, which solicits credit-card donations to "help finance this movie." The site brags that the film "will expose the truth about her conflicts in the past and her liberal plot for the future."

Former House member John LeBoutillier of New York is heading up the Stop Hillary PAC, which has run an anti-Clinton ad in Iowa. The group has grabbed headlines but not a lot of money for its efforts.

Reflecting the views of many well-known Republicans, DeLay thinks a Clinton juggernaut may provide the flattening the party needs in order to be reborn in Reagan's mold. "Hillary Clinton as president may be the best thing that ever happened to the conservative movement and the Republican Party," says the man known as the Hammer. "I mean, Bill Clinton as president was the best thing that ever happened to the Republican Party. It was because he was president that we gained the majority in 1995." And he would know.

The only reason Sen. Clinton is seen as unbeatable is because of the money she can raise for candidacy?

I thought there was campaign reform and level playing field on funding. Silly ME!!

Sen. Clinton is beatable when she will campaign for 45% top tier tax rate - which will be necessary to support her proposed health care reform. It will be interesting to see how Sen. Clinton votes on budget for the military that President Bush has submitted. If Sen. Clinton votes for cutting of funding she will appear weak on defense. IF she votes for the current budget, she will appear to be funding the war. Either way. Sen. Clinton will have to explain her position.

A respectful Good Luck Sen Clinton - we will be listening.

Maybe.

by Lady Bird Johnson on 02.06.2007 at 11:15 PM

Reserve psychology in full effect. If Hillary Clinton gets the nomination it will be like 1980 when President Reagan smoked President Carter. They want to run against Hillary Clinton.

by GGPSmith on 02.06.2007 at 11:15 PM

Unfortunately, Senator Clinton suffers from the 21st Century version of that late 20th Century disorder known as "Ted Kennedy Syndrome" (TKS): No matter what she does (cure cancer, negotiate a Middle East peace, etc.), about 25% of the people in this country will still hate her. I think that any Republican currently seeking their party's nomination in 2008 would like nothing more than to run against Senator Clinton, especially Senator McCain.

However, if Senator Obama is her running mate, then I believe the GOP strategists' currently advertised analysis that Hillary will inevitably win is true. But talk about something to energize soon-to-be-former-president Bush's base! There's nothing quite like Hillary as the opposition's front-runner.

But Senator Obama, especially as Senator Clinton's running mate, will no doubt energize more than enough of the 75% absolutely disgruntled with the status quo to get out there and give America another President Clinton, no matter what the religious right or self-proclaimed "Billary" haters say or do.

by John Galt on 02.06.2007 at 10:45 PM

I think that any talk about someone being inevitable this early in the game is pure foolishness. C'mon were still a year out from anything meaningful happening. I've got to agree with others here. Talk of Hillary as president is more an attempt to revitalize the republican base than anything else. That being said, republicans need to realize a Hillary president is very possible. A fact some still don't want to admit.

by alex forshaw on 02.06.2007 at 09:40 PM

What is with the religion of inevitability? There are a lot of Republicans who fear Hillary, but they don't see her as more "virtually unbeatable" than Edwards or Obama. And they generally underestimate Obama because they still see him as the media's baby to be aborted whenever they feel like it. (They completely underestimate Obama's intelligence. That will change.)

I have also heard tons of life long Republicans say that they would vote for Obama.

I agree with sssidney that the Republicans would rather run against Hillary. She has a crushing amount of baggage.

I see it as the media trying to sucker Democrats into nominating Hillary. I have seen a really, really suspicious amount of "Hillary is THE INEVITABLE CANDIDATE," and whatever your feelings about the Democratic field, "inevitable" is not a word that comes to mind.

Obama is the one to dread. But Hillary has a lot of media friends who like her campaign's nice expense accounts.

by anoodle on 02.06.2007 at 09:25 PM

I think they really are afraid of her. The whole "throw us into the briarpatch" argument I think is nonsense. She has amassed an incredible machine, she will raise much more than anyone in the history of American politics, and the national climate will tremendously favor democrats. Why wouldn't they be afraid? Especially with no sitting VP or anointed nominee on the GOP side, they should be nervous.

by jimmyo on 02.06.2007 at 09:15 PM

Sounds like the inside the beltway "moderates" are using Hillary-fright in an attempt to sucker the base into accepting a "moderate" like Guiliano. Let's see how things develop. If --and it's a very big if -- if Bush can quickly salvage a respectable outcome in Iraq, then the possibility of brother Jeb as a candidate comes into play. If --again a big if -- Iraq gets resolved quickly and reasonably he would be the strongest Republican contender and would beat Hillary or any other of the Dem hopefuls. Otherwise the base needs to find the best true Republican and let the chips fall where they may.

by polarbear on 02.06.2007 at 09:02 PM

Regarding the authors' comments about the electorate being hostile to Republicans, I would add that the local folks to whom I have spoken are pretty hostile about Iraq, but I am hearing distinctions being made between different Republicans. Where there is a strong assocation between the Republican and Iraq, yes, I am hearing strong opposition. For others, especially local Republicans focused on local issues, with distance from the war, there is acceptance. Most folks do not articulate "neocon" in their views, but their vitriol is directed at Republicans who talk the neocon talk.

In any case, I think it is pretty early in the race to be quite so sure of a Hillary Clinton nomination. Clearly the signs are in her favor, but a lot can happen between now and then.

by vwcat on 02.06.2007 at 08:40 PM

The gop dreams of Clinton getting the nomination because they know it will get all the voters of republicans out and keep half the democrats home. They know the loathing most left of total center despise this woman. I know of so many democrats who would stay home rather than vote for Hillary. And it is her machine that is trying to put out the word that she is inevitable and no one can defeat her. BS. She is peaking now due to name but, once the campaigns get going and voters are more familar with Edwards and Obama I see them both overtaking her. One thing most dems feel if not outright dislike is a cool nuetral to her. Hold your nose. They are excited about Obama and Edwards. So, while the pundit class buys into the Hillary machine spin of inevitability and the gop spin of fear in hopes that we would be dumb enough to vote for her, we, the real democrats will go about supporting our candidate of choice.

by Sidney on 02.06.2007 at 08:21 PM

I wouldn't pay too much attention to the GOP views. They would like her to be the nominee then they would tear in to her....

Anyhow, the race has just started and like most races, the front runners when the race is in the home stretch, it is then the winner shows itself. So I wouldn't place too much attention to the candidates right now.

We still have Gore to look at, should he decide to take another shot.

A dark horse and a long shot could be Sen Jim Webb. I nicknamed him "Boots". If he make that move he could win everything.

by sssidney on 02.06.2007 at 08:03 PM

I think the republicans are trying to sucker the dems. They want to run against Hillary.

Iraq War And History Favor The Democrats (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 7, 2007

Can the Democrats lose in 2008?

Can they possibly lose the next presidential election considering all they have going for them?

Well, yes. Of course, they can. They're Democrats!

But, seriously, can the Democrats really blow this one?

"I don't care who the Democratic nominee is," Bill Daley told me recently. "He will become president in '08."

Daley, who is backing Barack Obama, is not given to mindless boosterism. He has run both a presidential campaign and a precinct, and he knows a great deal about practical politics.

But go ahead and dismiss his comment as wishful thinking. Then consider this from a Republican:

"I don't want to contribute to my own party's demoralization and it doesn't necessarily mean there will be a Democratic landslide, but I think there is a thumb on their side of the scale that's not going to come off until after the next election," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman, who is backing Mitt Romney.

But it is early, right? And anything can happen right?

So try this out:

"The 2008 election is a catastrophe waiting to happen," a senior Republican, who has served in a previous White House, told me. "When Ronald Reagan was leaving office after two terms, everyone said electing George H.W. Bush was Reagan's third term. But is anybody looking for the third term of George W. Bush?"

Now that is a question for you.

Some think President Bush will work very hard for the Republican nominee for the same reason Ronald Reagan worked hard for Bush's father.

"Reagan felt all along that if a Democrat were elected to succeed him, it would be a repudiation of his eight years," said Ken Duberstein, who was Reagan's chief of staff. "For that reason, he went all-out for the election of George H.W. Bush. And I would anticipate George W. Bush will go all-out for whomever the Republicans nominate."

If the nominee wants him to, that is. If, in the fall of 2008, Bush's poll numbers are still hovering somewhere around freezing, the Republican nominee might want him to stay home and write letters to Eagle Scouts.

The Democrats do have history on their side. My crack research staff (i.e. Wikipedia) tells me that although George H.W. Bush succeeded Reagan after Reagan served two full terms, to find the next example of voters rewarding the same party that way, you have to go back to Rutherford B. Hayes succeeding Ulysses S. Grant in 1877.

Then there is the war. We cannot know what state the Iraq war will be in by Election Day 2008, but President Bush has assured us it will still be going on.

And, as of now, the war looks like a losing issue for Republicans. But Weber sees a small window of opportunity for his party: If the Democratic nominee gets pushed too far to the left during the Democratic primaries, he or she may look like a wimp when it comes to protecting the homeland.

"Obviously, Republicans are afraid of this war as a political issue," Weber said, "but Democratic fears about the war as an issue may grow. They might be dragged into a dangerous political position on the core issue of national security."

Weber is a realist, however.

"I would say that a sober historical analysis would probably lead you to conclude that the Democrat trend exhibited in 2006 is really a two-election trend," he said. "That's not written in the stars, but Republicans should go into 2008 facing that distinct possibility for both the presidency and Congress."

Poll Favors Giuliani In New Hampshire (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 7, 2007

New Hampshire residents likely to vote in the Republican presidential primary a year from now think more highly of former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani than any of his rivals, a poll released Tuesday shows.

Giuliani's net favorability rating — the proportion of people viewing him favorably minus the proportion viewing him unfavorably — was 56 percent, well ahead of Sen. John McCain, 32 percent, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, 26 percent, in the University of New Hampshire poll for WMUR-TV in Manchester.

"He's the lesser-known candidate, but he has that rock star quality," poll director Andy Smith said of Giuliani. "He has a charisma that was built after 9-11."

This long before an election, political professionals pay more attention to favorability than voters' choices if they had to vote today. McCain and Giuliani were essentially tied at about 27 percent on that question among likely GOP primary voters, followed by Romney at 13 percent and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich at 9 percent.

The GOP portion of the telephone poll reached 311 likely voters from Thursday to Monday and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.6 percentage points.

Former Sen. John Edwards and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama had net favorability ratings ranging from 61 percent to 55 percent, too close to be statistically significant.

When asked for whom they would vote, 35 percent of likely Democratic voters picked Clinton, 21 percent Obama and 15 percent Edwards. Eight percent chose former Vice President Al Gore, who is not running.

The Democratic portion of the phone poll reached 353 likely voters and had an error margin of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points.

Independents may vote in either primary, and 68 percent of them indicated they planned to vote in the Democratic primary compared to 32 percent leaning toward the GOP contest.

"This will hurt Republican candidates who try to appeal to more moderate, independent voters," Smith said.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrat John Edwards has joined the growing list of presidential candidates who are skipping public financing of their campaigns.

Edwards' decision, first reported Tuesday in USA Today, applies to both the primary and, if he wins the nomination, the general election. It will allow him to raise and spend unlimited private money.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton also is forgoing the public funds, and several other candidates are expected to follow their lead.

Edwards spokesman Jonathan Prince said Edwards supports public financing for presidential campaigns and would require it if elected president. But he is skipping the current system to compete in what is expected to be the most expensive campaign in history.

Strategists from both parties had estimated last year that the 2008 race could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund could afford. It is financed through the $3 checkoff on federal income tax returns.

The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money.

While both President Bush and Democratic challenger John Kerry rejected public funding for their primary campaigns in 2004, they did accept $74.5 million each for the general election campaign. The funding for the general election was expected to reach $85 million for the major party candidates in 2008.

CHARLESTON, S.C. (AP) — Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani will deliver the commencement address at The Citadel in the pivotal primary state of South Carolina, the military college announced Tuesday.

The former New York City mayor was asked to speak to graduates on May 5 "because of his leadership in the wake of the terrorist attacks on New York in September 2001," the school said in a news release.

Giuliani visited South Carolina last weekend, which will hold the first Republican primary in the South.

On Monday, he filed a "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission, which moved him closer to a full-fledged campaign.

Unlike chief GOP rivals Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Giuliani had thus far been ambiguous about whether he would pursue the Republican nomination, even though he had taken the initial steps.

The event is not open to the public. Tickets are distributed to cadets in April, the school said.

LAS VEGAS (AP) — Sen. Hillary Clinton has agreed to attend a Nevada forum for Democratic presidential candidates later this month, state party officials said Tuesday.

Clinton joins five other presidential hopefuls already confirmed for the Feb. 21 event in Carson City: Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

Billed by as a kickoff to Nevada's new early 2008 caucus, the forum faced some resistance from top-tier candidates.

Representatives for Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards complained last week to national party officials about the number and early timing of forums and debates scheduled in Nevada and other key states.

Nevada's caucus was moved to Jan. 19, between Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus and the New Hampshire primary, as a way for minority and union voters in the West to get a say in picking the Democratic nominee. However, the state has not yet been showered with attention from the candidates.

Nevada Democratic Party spokeswoman Kirsten Searer said some candidates also had expressed concerns about the format of the forum, and the party agreed to accommodate them. Candidates will appear on stage individually, give a statement and answer a series of questions posed by a moderator, Searer said.

Clinton Lifts Fund-Raising Stakes (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a show of financial muscle, Sen. Hillary Clinton today kicks off a fund-raising effort of volunteers working to direct donations from $25,000 to $1 million to her presidential campaign.

The million-dollar target for some fund-raisers demonstrates the overheated pace of the 2008 money race and raises the stakes for Sen. Clinton's competitors. Her allies will be able to generate that level of giving by soliciting checks of as much as $4,600 -- the maximum allowed for the primary and general election -- from friends and family, and recruiting others to become money raisers for their account.

"We'll do what we can to be competitive," said Blake Zeff, a campaign spokesman.

Though party caucuses and primaries are still a year off, the money race begins in earnest this month, as candidates try to generate big numbers for the first quarterly financial disclosure report due on March 31. Advisers to Mrs. Clinton and Republicans Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani have said their campaigns are shooting for about $30 million in that first report.

This strategy -- designed to minimize the number of challengers and to solidify front-runner status -- worked for the Bush campaign in 2000 when it was entering a crowded, wide-open primary field. One notable difference this year may be Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, whose appeal to voters may help him keep pace with Mrs. Clinton even if he isn't first in the March tallies.

On July 1, 1999, Mr. Bush reported raising a record $36 million in six months. Within days, two Republican hopefuls, former Ohio Rep. John Kasich and New Hampshire Sen. Bob Smith, dropped out of the race. By the end of the year, former Vice President Dan Quayle and Elizabeth Dole also quit after lagging in the money race.

"Early fund raising shows an ability to organize and capture the energy and excitement behind a candidate and their vision," said Jack Oliver, a senior Bush finance official in 2000 and 2004.

Still, the Clinton camp's million-dollar target dwarfs those used by President Bush in 2000 when he rewrote the campaign financing book by recruiting fund-raising "bundlers," volunteers who raised up to $100,000 by collecting checks of up to $1,000 -- then the legal maximum -- from friends and family. In 2004, Mr. Bush created a new layer of top fund-raisers who each generated $200,000 in campaign donations.

Dozens of people are expected to attend the Clinton fund-raising session on Capitol Hill. In addition to recruiting volunteers, the campaign plans to open fund-raising offices in major cities and name regional directors.

Jonathan Mantz, the campaign's finance director, recently declined to specify his fund-raising target: "It's a huge number. I've seen a lot of different figures, whether it's $80 or $100 [million], it's a huge number."

Mrs. Clinton's steps are increasing pressure on her leading rivals for the Democratic nomination, Mr. Obama and former vice presidential candidate John Edwards.

Mr. Obama is scheduled to attend a Los Angeles fund-raiser hosted by movie magnates David Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg later this month. He also is benefiting from a wave of new donors among African-American executives. The Obama camp has attracted some Democratic rainmakers, including Boston Provident Partners LP general partner Orin Kramer, former DNC finance chairman Bob Farmer, and Florida attorney Kirk Wagar.

Despite those gains, Mr. Obama's operation is behind Mrs. Clinton's in terms of organization. Campaign advisers are playing down expectations for Mr. Obama's March report, emphasizing instead the senator's long-term fund-raising potential. But he may have handicapped his campaign by opting not to accept donations from political action committees and banning federal lobbyists from bundling checks for the campaign.

The Edwards campaign probably won't match money for the entire campaign raised by Mrs. Clinton or Mr. Obama, said a campaign insider. Still, the former North Carolina senator is expected to raise enough to compete in next year's primaries. He attended a New York City event hosted by Robert Katz, a senior director at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., and maintains ties to the deep-pocketed trial lawyer bar. But most of the Edwards money-raising events are scattered across the country, generally attracting smaller crowds.

On the Republican side, Mr. Romney and Arizona Sen. John McCain have waged a fierce campaign to recruit Mr. Bush's former fund-raisers as volunteers.

Next month, Mr. McCain will attend a New York fund-raiser sponsored by NYSE Group Inc. Chief Executive Officer John Thain, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. Vice Chairman James B. Lee Jr., and New Jersey attorney Larry Bathgate, one of Mr. Bush's most successful fund-raisers. In all, the McCain campaign has recruited more than 40 of the president's former top fund-raisers.

In addition to building a traditional finance operation, the McCain campaign is ramping up its Internet presence, hoping to recapture the grass-roots energy that temporarily sustained the candidate in 2000 after his upset victory over Mr. Bush in the New Hampshire primary.

Mr. Romney has also incorporated Web techniques, including a system that allows his fund-raisers to easily monitor and track the donations they solicit. He opened his exploratory campaign with a fund-raising event that netted $6.5 million in pledges.

The former Massachusetts governor will follow his formal campaign launch Feb. 13 with a Boston fund-raiser two days later.

Former New York City Major Rudy Giuliani's relatively late entry into the race this week puts him somewhat behind. The finance team he announced this week includes veterans of the Bush campaigns, but Mr. Giuliani lacks the lengthy roster of star fund-raisers that Mr. McCain and Mr. Romney have captured.

Still, Mr. Giuliani's deep roots in New York are expected to keep him competitive and his campaign's fund-raising goals include raising more than $100 million by the end of the year.

Clinton Fundraising Goes Full Force (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is playing hostess to billionaire Hollywood moguls, millionaire lawyers and venture capitalists here this week as she pushes to raise a record sum for her presidential campaign.

Last night, the New York Democrat invited about 70 top fundraisers from around the country to a reception at her Washington home. The guest list included such major Democratic donors as Haim Saban, a Hollywood studio investor, Alan J. Patricof, a New York financier, and Kevin O'Keefe, a Chicago lawyer.

The high-dollar rainmakers committed to collect at least $250,000 each during the presidential campaign for Clinton, and many have pledged $1 million, participants said. In addition, each agreed to raise $50,000 by the end of this month to bolster the campaign's first-quarter report due at the end of March.

Today, the Clinton campaign plans to host a couple of hundred people at briefings by the senator and her staff at the District's Hyatt Regency hotel. The attendees -- called Hillraisers -- are expected to collect at least $25,000 each for the Clinton drive this year.

This year's money race, which is often referred to as the first presidential primary, has started earlier and with greater intensity than ever. Clinton insiders said the senator hopes to demonstrate her preeminence in the growing field of Democratic contenders by raising $10 million or more in the first quarter and at least $60 million this year.

Both of those numbers, if attained, would represent a record-breaking take for a presidential contest. The gathering last night was the first major step in collecting those totals.

Others competing for the Democratic nomination, including Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.), are also hoping to raise several million dollars in time for their first-quarter reports. They expect the money to help them demonstrate strong candidacies.

Fancy cars lined up last night in front of Clinton's Embassy Row house, and guests were greeted at the door by a man wearing a tuxedo.

The senator's aides began executing a plan to enlist the nation's most effective fundraisers within 24 hours of the announcement of Clinton's presidential bid last month. Her chief recruiters included Patricof, former Democratic Party finance chair Maureen White and literary agent Francis Greenberger.

Clinton adviser Terry McAuliffe was in Los Angeles in late January wooing donors at a dinner at Saban's Beverly Hills estate. His salesmanship appears to have worked: Several of those who attended the Beverly Hills dinner made the trip to Washington yesterday, including Clarence Avant, a former Motown Records executive who heads a music publishing company.

At the same time, many of the biggest Hollywood donors have so far hedged their bets. For instance, film director Steven Spielberg plans to help Clinton but is also preparing to host an event for Obama next week and was not in Washington last night. Barbra Streisand said in a statement yesterday that she would be sending the maximum allowable to Clinton, Obama and Edwards.

Among those invited to the event last night at Clinton's home were Chris Korge, a Miami lawyer who has been building a Florida network of donors for her, New York investment banker Steven Rattner, Stanley Chesley, a Cincinnati lawyer and major Democratic Party donor, Susie Tompkins Buell, co-founder of Esprit clothing company, and O'Keefe, who befriended the Clintons in college and later worked in the Clinton administration.

Among more than a dozen Washingtonians were Democratic activists Smith and Elizabeth Bagley, former Maryland congressman Tom McMillan, former Federal Communications Commissioner Susan Ness, and DLA Piper partners John Merrigan and Mac Bernstein.

Clinton Helped With $15M (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 7, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) collected at least $15 million for Democratic candidates by participating in more than 100 fundraising events during the 2006 election cycle, thereby cementing relationships with party leaders and colleagues in advance of her presidential campaign.

A rough tally of her campaign's fundraising records show that while her rival for the nomination, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) gave more money to candidates through his leadership PAC, Clinton appears to have surpassed his total by donating millions from her personal reelection account and attending scores of fundraisers.

Clinton raised the most at a single event for Sens. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) and Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), who faced difficult reelections. A Clinton adviser said the event for her fellow Senate women raised "several hundred thousand dollars."

Clinton raised money for the Democratic National Committee, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC). She also raised money for 20 candidates in the Senate and 30 in the House, according to a Clinton campaign spokesman.

The presidential candidate raised all this money for colleagues on top of the $51.3 million that she raised for her own reelection campaign in New York, more than any other federal candidate in 2006. Clinton's fundraising prowess is expected to prove crucial in the 2008 White House campaign, for which experts predict she could raise some $500 million.

Public records also show that she transferred $2.1 million from her Senate campaign to the DSCC and $250,000 to the DCCC. Clinton also transferred $350,000 to state and local candidates.

Candidates who benefited from Clinton attending fundraisers include newly elected Sens. Jim Webb (D-Va.), Jon Tester (D-Mont.), and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.). Losing House candidates who fattened their coffers because of Clinton include Tammy Duckworth, of Illinois, and Christine Jennings, of Florida.

Obama gave $770,000 from his leadership PAC, Hopefund, to Democratic candidates during the 2006 cycle, more than any Democratic presidential candidate and more than any Democrat in the Senate, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

He targeted contributions at states scheduled to hold elections early in the presidential primary: Iowa, Nevada, and New Hampshire.

Obama gave $2,500 to Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.) and $5,000 to Paul Hodes (D-N.H.) shortly before the election. He gave two $5,000 contributions to Rep. Leonard Boswell and $5,000 to freshman Rep. Bruce Braley, both Iowa Democrats. Tessa Hafen and Jill Derby, who lost House races in Nevada, also each received $5,000 from Hopefund.

Days before the election, Obama also cut $5,000 checks to the New Hampshire and Nevada state Democratic parties.

Clinton gave more than $200,000 less than Obama to Democratic candidates from her PAC, Hill PAC, which in the past has been the most generous Senate Democratic leadership committee. She stepped up her giving pace in March after contributing relatively little in 2005.

Clinton gave $10,000 to the Iowa Democratic Party, $10,000 to the Nevada Democratic Party and $10,000 to the New Hampshire state party. She gave two $2,500 checks to New Hampshire's Hodes and $2,500 to Shea-Porter, Iowa's Boswell, and Nevada's Hafen.

After Nov. 7, Obama continued to use his leadership PAC aggressively, spreading $5,000 contributions to 10 Senate colleagues up for reelection. Clinton, who has had four more years in the Senate than Obama to build relationships, had not given anything in the month after the election, according to her PAC's latest fundraising report.

But how much influence the largess will have in primary battlegrounds is an open question.

Shea-Porter vowed to stay neutral and to spend time with any visiting White House hopeful who requested it.

"I had support from a good number of presidential candidates," she said. "My role is officially neutral. I'm going to play the part of a good host."

Both Obama and Clinton overlooked newly elected Rep. David Loebsack (D-Iowa), whom few political handicappers expected to beat former Rep. Jim Leach (R), and did not receive any money from either lawmaker's PAC.

Loebsack laughed at the suggestion that he went without contributions because of his long-shot chances of winning and said that he has since gotten Clinton's and Obama's attention.

"I've talked to them about it, don't you worry," he said, declining to offer further comment on pre-primary maneuverings.

Obama's PAC giving ranks well ahead of every Senate Democrat and Democratic presidential contender with registered leadership committees.

Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), who ranks with Obama and Clinton as a presidential frontrunner, gave no money to federal candidates from his One America PAC last year despite raising $2.8 million in 2005 and 2006.

Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.), who hurt his White House prospects last week with controversial comments about Obama, gave $215,000 from his leadership PAC to candidates and political committees in the last election cycle.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), an underdog in the race, gave $373,000 to other candidates and political committees through his committee, CHRIS PAC.

Other 2008 hopefuls such as Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack do not have federal leadership PACs, according to the Center for Responsive Politics and PoliticalMoneyLine, two organizations that track fundraising.

White House Bid? Giuliani Is Still Undeclared (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Former Senator John Edwards stood in the Ninth Ward of New Orleans and declared, "I'm a candidate for the presidency of the United States." Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton proclaimed on her campaign Web site: "I'm in. And I'm in to win." Former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts plans to formally announce his White House run in Michigan on Feb. 13.

Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, took two steps closer to a presidential run on Monday, and yet stopped short, once again, of unequivocally throwing himself in the ring.

After filing a candidate statement with the Federal Election Commission, he appeared on Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes" for an interview, and Sean Hannity asked, "You are then officially running to be the next president of the United States?" Mr. Giuliani's response was cautious: "We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things. But this is about as close as you're going to get."

When asked if he believed he could defeat Mrs. Clinton — if they received their respective parties' nominations — Mr. Giuliani said, "Well, I'm in this to win," but he added, "I have no idea who is going to get the nomination."

A few skeptics have wondered whether Mr. Giuliani, who has been crisscrossing the country over the last few months and signaled his interest in the presidency again and again, may ultimately back out — as he did in 2000, when he contemplated a race for the Senate but withdrew.

Aides to Mr. Giuliani yesterday dismissed the notion that he was equivocating. "The response across the country has been extremely encouraging, and Rudy has made clear he is moving toward making an official announcement," said Katie Levinson, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani's not-yet-official campaign.

Mr. Giuliani established a federal presidential exploratory committee on Nov. 20 to "test the waters," meaning that he could raise and spend money on polls, focus groups and travel but not declare a candidacy or build a substantial war chest.

On Monday, Mr. Giuliani stopped testing the waters when he filed the statement of candidacy.

"From the F.E.C.'s perspective, he's running for president of the United States," said Karl J. Sandstrom, an election lawyer and a former Democratic member of the Federal Election Commission. Typically, he said, a statement of candidacy and a formal announcement of a run occur around the same time.

Bradley A. Smith, an election lawyer and a former Republican member of the commission, said that filing a candidate statement was not a definitive step. "People in the past have filed that form and then decided not to run," he said. "Filing the form may just mean that he's planning to raise some serious money that would put him outside of what the F.E.C. considers testing the waters."

Mr. Giuliani has recently moved to sell Giuliani Capital Advisors, an investment bank that is part of his consulting business, Giuliani Partners. But a candidacy would not necessarily complicate any sale of his assets.

Candidates for president are required to file personal financial disclosure statements with the federal Office of Government Ethics. Those who declare between Jan. 1 and May 15 must file by May 15. Those who declare their candidacies between May 15 and Dec. 31 must file the statement within 30 days of the declaration, according to Vincent J. Salamone, associate general counsel for the ethics office.

The statements require candidates to disclose financial interests, including sources of income, investment holdings and outstanding loans, going back a year from the filing date. Corporate directorships, partnerships and consulting contracts must be disclosed for the previous two years.

Fred Siegel, a historian at Cooper Union who has written admiringly about Mr. Giuliani, said he thought the former mayor was simply being deliberate. "He moves at his own pace," Mr. Siegel said. "He thinks these things through very carefully, and I think he's playing this out for tactical advantage."

Katon Dawson, chairman of the South Carolina Republican Party, said it was "a lot easier to get in the race than to get out of the race," and called Mr. Giuliani's actions so far "a natural progression of how you would enter a race for president."

Mr. Dawson, who spoke warmly of Mr. Giuliani but has not endorsed any candidate, speculated that the former mayor might simply be choosing the right time and place to make an announcement. "This is not unusual," he said. "Whether it will be at ground zero, or in California or New Hampshire or Iowa or South Carolina, he will announce on his own terms, and pick his own turf."

In his Fox interview, Mr. Giuliani affirmed his support for abortion rights but said he would "appoint judges that interpreted the Constitution rather than invented it." He said he approved of domestic partnership laws, but not same-sex marriage.

He said repeatedly, "We've got to get beyond Iraq," and called for more attention to Iran, Syria, Pakistan and Afghanistan. He called for tightening the country's borders and requiring prospective citizens to learn English, but also said that deporting illegal immigrants in large numbers was impractical.

Hillary And Rudy Could Wrap It Up This Year (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The nominees for the 2008 presidential race will be selected in 2007. The tempo of the new political process, driven by 24-hour cable news, Internet bloggers, conservative talk radio, and liberal NPR is so rapid that the nomination race cannot exist in stasis waiting for Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina to get around to holding their votes in early 2008. Well before they open their caucuses or polling places, this nomination, in each party, will have been decided by the national media coverage during 2007.

In 2004, we saw the precursor of this expedited process when Howard Dean upset Kerry's early lead in the fall of 2003, propelled ahead by his Internet fundraising and antiwar positioning. Then, in December 2003, the establishment media unloaded on the former Vermont governor — likely driven by disinformation passed around by other Democratic candidates — and he was gone by Christmas. Kerry's victory in Iowa a few weeks later was no more than a projection on the Iowa screen of the results settled at the national level the previous month.

A recent Gallup poll found that 35 percent of Americans — probably everyone who votes in a caucus or primary — watch cable news stations frequently. The intensity of viewer and voter interest and the ubiquity of the political coverage on these stations force the process to accelerate and to come to an early conclusion.

The role of Iowa, New Hampshire, etc.

What is the role for the early, small caucus/primary states in 2007? They will not have held their primaries or caucuses yet, but the state-by-state polls published regularly in 2007 become the equivalent of virtual primaries in each of these states. But to win these polls, it doesn't matter so much what happens within each small state but what is going on nationally. Hillary, for example, has moved from down in the pack to a lead in New Hampshire, and perhaps in Iowa, by announcing her candidacy nationally. Her perfunctory visits to each state likely had little to do with her surge compared to her national media efforts.

The old model — a Jimmy Carter labors in obscurity in the Iowa vineyards and then is discovered nationally after he wins there and sweeps all remaining primaries — is quaint but obsolete. Now you have to win the American Media Primary of 2007 and then your victory is ratified in the primaries and caucuses of 2008.

The importance of the front-runner

The key for the candidates is to become the early front-runner and hold the position for the first three quarters of 2007. Once that is accomplished, the nomination is probably in the bag. No clear front-runner, except for Rockefeller in 1964, has ever failed to win the nomination since the primary process became pivotal in party nominations in 1960.

Among Democrats, Kennedy in '60, Humphrey, once he entered the race, in '68, McGovern in '72, Carter in '76 and '80, Mondale in '84, Dukakis in '88, Clinton in '92, Gore in '00 and Kerry in '04 were front-runners who held their leads. Mondale, Clinton, Gore, and Kerry were front-runners who were briefly shaken by challengers (Hart, Tsongas, Bradley and Dean) but held on to win their nominations

Among Republicans, Nixon in '60 and '68, Ford in '76, Reagan in '80, Bush in '88, Dole in '96, and Bush in '00 were all front-runners going in and the nominee coming out. Only Goldwater can be said to have pulled off an upset in 1964 by toppling Rockefeller.

So once there is a clear front-runner, he or she is likely to go all the way. This is especially true since he or she will have won front-runner status by intensive national media exposure rather than just insider chatter. With the process giving him or her so much face-time so early, the front-runner is unlikely to fade once the real primaries start.

Rudy and Hillary: tentative leaders

Already the process seems to be congealing around Hillary and Rudy as tentative front-runners.

Hillary re-established the dominance she had back in the spring of 2006 by moving out to a 43 percent vote share among Democrats in the presidential primaries in the Fox News poll of January 30-31. Obama is second at 15 percent, Edwards at 12 percent and Gore at 11 percent. Hillary had been at 43 percent in a previous Fox News poll in March 2006, but slipped to 32 percent in August with most of her previous support going to either Gore or undecided. By December 5-6 of last year, she stayed at 32 percent with Obama at 12 percent, Gore at 11 percent and Edwards at 8 percent. But now, even with Obama and Gore in the trial heat, she has regained her robust 43 percent vote share again. Even though media coverage of her announcement and Iowa tour was mixed, the electorate is obviously thrilled at the prospect of a woman candidate and rallied to her banner last month.

There is still time for Obama to recapture the charisma he seemed to have going for him over Christmas through his book, his articulateness, his moderation and his novelty; or for Edwards's tough antiwar and healthcare positions to eat away at Hillary's base. But they had better get it untracked pretty soon.

Among Republicans, Rudy Giuliani is eclipsing John McCain for front-runner status. In the most recent Fox News poll among GOP voters, Rudy had a convincing 34-22 lead over McCain, with Gingrich in third place at 15 percent. McCain has been hovering in the low 20s all along. In March '06, he was at 22 percent, in August at 25 percent and in December at 23 percent. But Giuliani has shown steady progress from 27 percent of the vote in August to 30 percent in December to 34 percent at the end of January.

This poll finding — combined with McCain's dismal financial report for the fourth quarter of 2006 ($1.7 million raised and less than $500,000 on hand) — put him in a convincing second place after a year of sharing front-runner status with Giuliani. Do McCain's fundraisers think he is running for Congress or president?

In the battle among second-tier GOP candidates, Gingrich is moving up and Romney is fading badly. The Fox News poll has Newt moving up from 9 percent in December to 15 percent at the end of January while Romney has dropped from 8 percent in December to only 3 percent on Jan. 30-31. In the wake of George Allen's and Bill Frist's withdrawals, conservatives seem to be moving away from the former Massachusetts governor and toward the former Speaker.

Should the right seek a real alternative to Giuliani, Romney's flip-flops will likely disqualify him. Gingrich could develop momentum with his strength and intellect, but he will only become a factor if he declares and runs. If he waits on the sidelines, events will eclipse him.

Beyond Newt and Romney, GOP wannabes like Huckabee, Brownback, Hunter, Tancredo, Gilmore and Thompson deserve some attention. Huckabee, a former client, may be the most interesting of the bunch.

Right now, neither Rudy nor Hillary has a front-runner's lock, but they are clearly the man and woman to beat in their respective parties.

If they hold their leads through Labor Day, my bet is that it will be all over.

Catholics Slam Bloggers Hired By Edwards (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 7, 2007

Two bloggers hired recently by Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards were criticized Tuesday by a Catholic group for posts they had written elsewhere on the Internet.

Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, demanded that Edwards fire Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan.

"John Edwards is a decent man who has had his campaign tarnished by two anti-Catholic, vulgar, trash-talking bigots," Donohue wrote in a statement. "He has no choice but to fire them immediately."

The Edwards campaign declined to comment. McEwan and Marcotte did not respond to e-mails requesting a response.

Donohue cited posts that the women made on blogs in the past several months in which they criticized the pope and the church for its opposition to homosexuality, abortion and contraception, sometimes using profanity.

"The Catholic church is not about to let something like compassion for girls get in the way of using the state as an instrument to force women to bear more tithing Catholics," Marcotte wrote on the blog Pandagon on Dec. 26, in an excerpt cited by Donohue.

Among the McEwan posts that Donohue listed was one she posted on Feb. 21, 2006, on her site, Shakespeare's Sister. She questioned what religious conservatives don't understand about "keeping your noses out of our britches, our beds and our families?"

Edwards put both bloggers on his payroll last week as part of his outreach to liberal voters and activists on the Internet. Their decision to work for Edwards is part of a broader move among prominent bloggers to jobs with political campaigns and progressive organizations.

The Catholic League counts its membership at nearly 350,000.

Edwards's Bloggers Cross The Line, Critic Says (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — Two bloggers hired by John Edwards to reach out to liberals in the online world have landed his presidential campaign in hot water for doing what bloggers do — expressing their opinions in provocative and often crude language.

The Catholic League, a conservative religious group, is demanding that Mr. Edwards dismiss the two, Amanda Marcotte of the Pandagon blog site and Melissa McEwan, who writes on her blog, Shakespeare's Sister, for expressing anti-Catholic opinions.

Mr. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, is among the leading Democratic presidential candidates.

Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, said in a statement on Tuesday, "John Edwards is a decent man who has had his campaign tarnished by two anti-Catholic vulgar trash-talking bigots."

Mr. Edwards's spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri, said Tuesday night that the campaign was weighing the fate of the two bloggers.

The two women brought to the Edwards campaign long cyber trails in the incendiary language of the blogosphere. Other campaigns are likely to face similar controversies as they try to court voters using the latest techniques of online communication.

Ms. Marcotte wrote in December that the Roman Catholic Church's opposition to the use of contraception forced women "to bear more tithing Catholics." In another posting last year, she used vulgar language to describe the church doctrine of the Immaculate Conception.

She has also written sarcastically about the news media coverage of the three Duke lacrosse players accused of sexual assault, saying: “Can’t a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.”

Ms. Marcotte joined the Edwards campaign at the end of January in the new post of blogmaster. She has lived in Austin, Tex., for the past 11 years and wrote on her blog that she was planning to move to Chapel Hill, N.C., in February to work full-time on the campaign.

Ms. McEwan referred in her blog to President Bush’s “wingnut Christofascist base” and repeatedly used profanity in demanding that religious conservatives stop meddling with women’s reproductive and sexual rights. Multiple postings use explicit and inflammatory language on a variety of issues.

Ms. McEwan signed on with Mr. Edwards at the end of January with the title of Netroots coordinator, for campaign activities on the Web.

Romney To Announce Presidential Bid (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 7, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney will formally announce his candidacy for president next week in Michigan, his native state and an important early test for the GOP nomination, campaign aides said Tuesday.

The former one-term Massachusetts governor will make his announcement Feb. 13, and then will visit Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina — the first states to hold 2008 contests.

He will return to Boston two days later, where he will hold what his campaign is calling "a unity event" with supporters, aides said. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because the plans were not public.

The announcement had been expected.

Romney, 59, created an exploratory committee in January and then held a major fundraiser that netted $6.5 million in contributions and pledges to show he was a serious contender able to challenge Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, the other top-tier Republican candidates. Both have created exploratory committees but neither has formally announced a candidacy even though it's all but certain both will run.

For Romney, the initial steps were a formality. It has long been known that he aspired to the presidency. He has spent months building a national campaign organization, hiring top political talent, courting fundraisers and putting support networks in place in key states. His campaign recently opened its headquarters along Boston's waterfront.

In Dearborn, Mich., Romney will hold what amounts to a made-for-TV coming out event at the Henry Ford Museum in the state where he was born. He has a base of support in the battleground state and deep roots. His father, George Romney, was governor in the 1960s, and served as chief executive of the American Motors Corp. The elder Romney made an unsuccessful bid for the 1968 Republican presidential nomination.

The announcement comes midway through the first fundraising quarter of 2007. The timing could create a burst of momentum to increase donations as Romney seeks to ensure he posts big fundraising numbers on March 31, the end of the first financial reporting period.

Romney is seeking to convince the GOP's conservative flank, whose support is pivotal in GOP presidential nomination contests, that he shares their values and stands with them on social issues, including abortion and gay marriage.

But he's been forced to explain inconsistencies in his record from when he ran as a moderate in his two previous campaigns — a successful bid for Massachusetts governor in 2002 and an unsuccessful challenge to U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a liberal icon, in 1994.

Romney supported abortion rights until two years ago, when he says he had a change of heart during a legislative debate on stem cell research. He has also taken positions sympathetic to gay rights in the past, although he opposes gay marriage.

A Mormon, Romney's faith also could pose another challenge. No one from his religion has been elected president.

His campaign hopes that his record of accomplishment in both the private and public sectors overrides primary voters' concerns.

Romney made his reputation in the Boston business community, where he helped found a multibillion-dollar venture capital firm after earning degrees from Harvard Business and Law schools. He rose to national prominence when he successfully resurrected the 2002 Olympic Winter Games, which were mired in a bribery scandal.

Mike Huckabee: Can He Fell The Big Guys In '08? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129143

WASHINGTON

Mike Huckabee, until recently the governor of Arkansas, may be most famous for losing 100 pounds and crusading against obesity in America.

Now he's going after the big guys in a different way. He wants to take out John McCain, Rudolph Giuliani, and Mitt Romney – the top three Republican challengers for their party's presidential nomination in 2008, polls show. He knows it's a long shot, especially when money and celebrity are the early drivers in the campaign. But in a race that Mr. Huckabee likens to a marathon, he sees kitchen-table issues – at the heart of any governor's tenure – growing in importance.

"If it's going to be only about money raised, then I suggest that we just put the whole thing on eBay, put it out for bid, and come November, whoever is still at the high bid when the clock ticks off, they win," Huckabee told reporters at a Monitor breakfast Tuesday. "I don't think ... people are going to allow that to happen."

Four of the last five US presidents were governors first. They balance budgets and solve problems, in healthcare, transportation, education, he says. But what about the war? Huckabee refers to himself as having been commander in chief of a state where 80 percent of its National Guard have been deployed overseas.

"When Ronald Reagan was elected, ... the rub was that he had been an actor and a governor, so what possible skills could he bring to the task?" Huckabee says.

Still, Huckabee knows he must rise in the pack by summer's end. "If by ... September I'm still considered second or third tier, after the Iowa straw poll, then ... I've got a problem," says the former Baptist minister, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week. He seeks to be the second president from Hope, Ark., after Bill Clinton.

An evangelical Christian, Huckabee hopes his religiosity will win GOP voters who may have qualms about Senator McCain, who is not overtly religious; former Mayor Giuliani, who is liberal on social issues; and Mr. Romney, whose Mormon faith makes some Republicans uneasy.

In Campaign 2008, Candidates Starting Earlier, Spending More (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Starting as early as last June, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) was hiring staffers and consultants in New Hampshire and Iowa and building the foundation for his 2008 presidential bid at a time when those in early battleground states typically get a breather from national politics.

Campaign filings released last week show that he spent more than $375,000 on staffing and consulting, getting an early jump in those states. One campaign cycle earlier, a single candidate -- Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) -- had started hiring in-state advisers at that point, and by the end of 2002 he had spent only $4,200 paying those aides.

The financial reports begin to document the underpinnings of a drive for dollars that is expected to make 2008 the nation's first billion-dollar presidential campaign. Top-tier candidates are hard at work courting wealthy political enthusiasts who can deliver scores of thousand-dollar donors. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) held a gathering for 70 of those "bundlers," as they are known, last night at her Washington home. [Story, A8.]

To understand the impulses behind this fundraising race, look no further than activity in a cluster of early caucus and primary states. Democrats competing for their party's nomination will face a rapid-fire succession of contests in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina in January. Republicans will compete in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan. A number of states -- including behemoths such as California and Florida -- are seeking to move up their primaries to early February.

"Everything is so compact," said Tom Rath, a New Hampshire political consultant who is working for former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R). "You've got to be competing everywhere across the board, right from the start."

To compete in those states, candidates are already confronting a daunting array of new expenses and demands that is creating a presidential sticker shock.

This year, candidates will need to hire more employees to wage battles in the growing number of early primaries. They will make unprecedented investments in computer technology to unlock clues to voter behavior.

They enter a 2008 field flush with political megastars who have set stratospheric fundraising goals. And the cost of such staples as television commercials will soar as candidates forgo public financing and the accompanying spending quotas.

That has meant candidates have started spending in those states earlier than ever. A full picture of that early activity will emerge more clearly in April, after most candidates have filed their first campaign reports.

But the 2006 expense reports released last week provide a glimpse at how aspirants have started spending their money. By the end of last year, budding contenders in the Democratic field had already written more than $660,000 in checks from their federal accounts to fund activities in key states -- more than twice what their counterparts spent in 2002 in the run-up to the 2004 presidential contest.

Steve Elmendorf, a deputy campaign manager in Kerry's 2004 bid, said campaigns are facing a series of escalating costs, including the "enormous expense" of building robust teams of political workers in four states at once.

"You need a big infrastructure in each one of these states," he said. "You need a press infrastructure, a political infrastructure, a fundraising infrastructure. And that takes people."

Add to that the rising price of travel, Elmendorf said. When McCain first ran for president in 2000, he defrayed some travel costs by flying on corporate jets. Under Federal Election Commission rules at the time, candidates could bill their campaign accounts the cost of a first-class ticket for a corporate flight.

But now, his campaign has said, McCain is abiding by a pledge to stay off corporate jets. In the past year, that has meant spending more than $1.1 million on charter flights, according to filings by his leadership committee.

Candidates will also be trying to reach voters through the Internet and through their mailboxes, and that will mean unprecedented investment in technology, much of which was in its infancy four years ago. This year, nearly all candidates are posting videotaped speeches on their Web sites to speak directly to voters.

When then-Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) began preparing for his first presidential bid, he made an early investment of nearly $100,000 to build an Internet operation. As he began constructing his 2008 effort, he found the cost to put his stamp on the Web had more than quadrupled, with close to half a million dollars already spent on consultants and technical-support teams.

Just as Edwards saw Web site production grow more costly, others are finding new ways to modernize campaign techniques that once relied on index cards and shoe leather.

Ken Strasma, a consultant whose firm developed a microtargeting program that uses vast supplies of marketing data to identify and persuade a candidate's likely supporters, said the powerful targeting programs will be more widely used this cycle.

In small states, such as Iowa, a candidate can spend $100,000 to $200,000 to identify every caucus voter within their reach and figure out how best to persuade them. In larger states, those costs will multiply.

Already, Edwards and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) have each paid $50,000 to the Iowa Democratic Party for copies of its voter files, and Dodd forked over $50,000 to the New Hampshire Democratic State Committee for its membership list.

Then there's television, which is always one of the largest expenses facing a presidential campaign.

Rath said he expects candidates to be up on television far sooner this time around. If candidates forgo public funding, as many expect, they will no longer be subject to strict spending limits on the amount candidates could invest in each state. Under FEC rules, candidates taking public money would face a spending cap that in 2004 amounted to just $729,000 in New Hampshire, though most candidates found legal ways to circumvent that limit.

Four years ago, only President Bush, Kerry and former Vermont governor Howard Dean opted out of the public system, which meant they could ignore the state-by-state limits altogether.

Steve Murphy, who managed the campaign of then-Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) in the 2004 cycle and is now working with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), said that four years ago spending limits might have left most candidates with no more than a couple of million dollars to spend on television in the early states. Now that number could increase tenfold.

Candidates who may have once bought ads only on local New Hampshire stations will now consider buying time in the far more costly Boston television market, Murphy said.

"I think it will take $40 million to mount a strong campaign on the air and on the ground in the early states, and some candidates will spend far more than that," Murphy said.

Beyond the nuts and bolts of running a campaign, many candidates will feel pressured to keep pace with the quasi-celebrities such as McCain, Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). All three are expected to set a blistering pace of fundraising.

To some, that notion has been too much to stomach. One was Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), who dropped from the field of 2008 presidential contenders last month.

"It's a fundraiser for breakfast, then call time. A fundraiser for lunch, then call time. Then a fundraising reception. And then you can still call the West Coast," Bayh said.

Not everyone in the field is certain that the path to victory will involve raising a quarter-million dollars a day. A spokeswoman for Edwards said that although some costs may nudge up, the former senator does not see much need to match big-number goals being bandied about for the year ahead.

"We need to raise enough so we can compete in all four early primaries," said the spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri. After that, she said, "if you're winning, the money will follow."

That said, Edwards has scheduled 22 fundraisers in 15 states this month.

Research database editor Derek Willis and washingtonpost.com staff writer Chris Cillizza contributed to this report.

Who's Hitting The Right Notes? (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

"Why are we here?" John Edwards asked the members of the Democratic National Committee last Friday -- meaning: What animates us? What is the banner we ask Americans to take up? And, by morning's end, the Democrats had heard three different answers from their party's presidential front-runners.

Edwards and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama had distinct perspectives on Iraq, but their other differences were, if anything, more revealing. Edwards depicted, in a rising crescendo of emotion, the human cost of manmade disasters: the hotel housekeeper picketing for health coverage; the 8-year-old going to bed hungry; the mother of a soldier in Iraq answering her door to news of her son's death; the orphaned 5-year-old in the Sudanese desert. One of America's best trial lawyers was pleading for the victims of cruel and idiotic policies, offering policies of his own to save the innocents.

Where Edwards personified problems, Obama abstracted them. In the forthcoming election, he said, "our rivals won't be the other party. Our enemy is cynicism." More particularly, he went on, the enemy was the debasing of the public square.

"It's time to free ourselves from the constraints of politics," he said. Some might want to focus on specifics or plans but, "We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope." Accordingly, though Obama made clear his opposition to the Iraq war, he omitted any mention of his plan to withdraw U.S. forces by March 2008.

Clinton was less all-embracing in her indictments and her remedies -- nothing flowery, all matter-of-fact. Among the Democratic front-runners, she's the reality principle. "In the Senate," she reminded listeners, "we still have to create coalitions to get things accomplished." She also spoke about the erosion of the American social contract, though not with the kind of heartbreaking illustrations Edwards summoned. But Clinton also stated, more clearly than Edwards had, that our economic woes affected the vast middle class. With wages stagnating and health care growing more costly, Clinton said, we've lost the bargain that "if you worked hard and did your part, the country would stand with you. This bargain created the American middle class, our greatest social achievement."

All of which is to say that, because of the absurdly early start of the 2008 presidential campaign, we have already reached that point where the strengths and weaknesses of the candidates' messages are becoming apparent. Beyond question, Edwards is the best positioned to ride the populist wave that is finally and rightly hitting our shores. By his willingness to repeal tax cuts for the rich to pay for universal health care, he is wagering that Americans will favor fairness and functionality over the anti-tax ideology of recent decades.

But Edwards risks sounding like the tribune for a smaller, more marginal group of Americans than he may intend to. Defending unions, he said it was time for Democrats to stand with workers who spent their "whole lives in factories, who worked in the mills." True enough, but Democrats also have to stand with workers who spend their whole lives at their keyboards. The father of Democratic populism, William Jennings Bryan, never made it to the White House, in part because he could never add the backing of industrial workers to his support among farmers. Edwards will do well among industrial workers; it's the post-industrial workers he needs to win over.

For her part, Clinton stressed that engineers as well as mill hands face outsourcing. She articulates the scope of globalization's problems more broadly than Edwards does, even if Edwards is more likely to confront those problems with more aggressively fair-trade proposals. Clinton's grasp of the breadth of our dilemmas is offset by the incrementalism of her solutions -- a disjuncture that may disturb Democrats who feel the time is ripe for bigger things.

And Obama? His broad indictment of contemporary politics has great appeal, I suspect, to young voters in particular. But the cynicism about government that he rightly condemns didn't waft in from nowhere. It's been a tool that the right has used to undermine the bargain Clinton spelled out, creating the desperate Americans Edwards talked about, to the end of distributing more wealth to the rich. The hope Obama personifies can be a powerful force -- but not when he counterposes it to specifics or to political struggle.

Early midcourse recalibrations, anyone?

Ready For Obama Already (NYT)

By Martin Plissner

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

Washington

WITH Barack Obama expected to announce on Saturday that he's running for president, if you enter "America," "ready" and "black president" in a Google search, you'll get around 125,000 hits. When pollsters bring up those words with random samples of voters — and they've done it a lot recently — they get "yes" answers from 62 percent (CNN), 56 percent (Newsweek), 58 percent (Gallup) and 55 percent (CBS).

Most of these surveys, however, ask people only if the rest of America is ready for it to happen, not about being ready themselves to make it happen. When one poll asked Republicans and Democrats if they would vote for a "qualified" black of their own party, barely 5 percent said no — hardly surprising, as doing so would be a frank acknowledgment of prejudice.

A much better poll would consist of giving an actual set of candidates' names at the end of a real campaign. Fortunately, 10 years ago such a test was actually done.

On Nov. 5, 1996, Voter News Service — the organization hired by the TV networks to do exit polling — asked people at the polls, who had just given Bill Clinton 49 percent of the vote, Bob Dole 41 percent and Ross Perot 8 percent, how they would have voted if the Republican candidate had been Gen. Colin L. Powell. In an exit poll sample of 3,697 (three times the size of a standard high-grade public opinion survey), the result was this:

Powell: 50 percent.

Clinton: 38 percent.

Perot: 9 percent.

This finding, however, was not part of the pooled report shared by all the networks; it was commissioned by CBS News, of which I was then political director. As often happens, however, when there's a lot of big news, this bit of data got buried in an end-of-night roundup and was quickly forgotten. But it does suggest there was a day when Americans, had they been given a choice of major party candidates, one of whom was black, would very likely have chosen the black one.

Most significantly, General Powell would have won the race because of the support of white voters — Bill Clinton outpolled him 2 to 1 among the blacks surveyed. Among white voters, whom Senator Dole had carried very narrowly (too narrowly for him to win), General Powell clobbered the incumbent, 53 percent to 33 percent.

Any poll analysis has to be hedged with qualifications, and this one more than most. Bill Clinton and Bob Dole had just been through bruising year-long campaigns and exposed to more than $100 million of take-no-prisoners advertising. Colin Powell had not. He was still being acclaimed for his role as the country's top soldier in its only clear victory since World War II.

Still, even with these qualifiers, there is a pretty good, if not quite conclusive, case that America has for some time been ready to elect a black president. The question for Barack Obama is whether this time around it will be ready for this one.

Right Candidates, Wrong Question (NYT)

By Gloria Steinem

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

EVEN before Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton threw their exploratory committees into the ring, every reporter seemed to be asking which candidate are Americans more ready for, a white woman or a black man?

With all due respect to the journalistic dilemma of reporting two "firsts" at the same time — two viable presidential candidates who aren't the usual white faces over collars and ties — I think this is a dumb and destructive question.

It's dumb because most Americans are smart enough to figure out that a member of a group may or may not represent its interests. After all, many African-Americans opposed the appointment of Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court in 1991 because they were aware of his record — and the views of his conservative supporters.

Similarly, most women weren't excited about Elizabeth Dole as a presidential candidate for the 2000 election because she seemed more attached to those in power than those in need of it. Indeed, Elizabeth Dole even got support from people who opposed women making their own reproductive decisions. (If Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice decides to run for president, I imagine that she would face the same fate.)

The question is also destructive because it's divisive. In fact, women of all races and men of color — who together form an underrepresented majority of this country — have often found themselves in coalition. Both opposed the wars in Vietnam and Iraq more and earlier than their white male counterparts. White women have also been more likely than white men to support pro-equality candidates of color, and people of color have been more likely to support pro-equality white women.

It's way too early to know which candidate will earn trust or survive Swift-boating, but forcing a choice between race and sex only conceals what's really going on.

So far, for example, polls show that about 60 percent of African-American Democrats support Hillary Clinton, while only about 20 percent support Barack Obama. These surprising numbers probably have less to do with Senator Obama himself than with whether people feel he's been around long enough to trust, whether the name "Clinton," with its associations of racial inclusiveness, is a better bet, and whether a member of one's own group — a group that has endured a history of discrimination — could win anyway.

This disease of doubt plays a big role: 81 percent of black voters tell pollsters that a white man will get the Democratic nomination, while only 58 percent of white voters do. Such doubt also helps to explain why women are more likely than men to support Hillary Clinton, but also more likely to say she can't win.

Still, the larger question is: Why compare allies and ignore the opposition? Both Senators Clinton and Obama are civil rights advocates, feminists, environmentalists and critics of the war in Iraq, though she voted early and wrong, and he spoke out early and right. Both have resisted pandering to the right, something that sets them apart from any Republican candidate, including John McCain. Both have Washington and foreign policy experience; George W. Bush did not when he first ran for president.

But the greatest reason for progressives to refuse to be drawn into an irrelevant debate about Senators Clinton and Obama is that it is destructive. We can accomplish much more if we act as a coalition. Think, for instance, of the powerful 19th-century coalition for universal adult suffrage. The parallels between being a chattel slave by race and chattel as a wife, daughter or indentured worker turned abolitionists into suffragists, and vice versa. This coalition against a caste system based on race and sex turned the country on its head — until it was divided by giving the vote to its smallest part, Negro men.

Sojourner Truth famously warned that this division would cripple the movement for decades to come — and it did. Only a half-century later did white and black women get the vote, by then tarnished by the racist rhetoric of some white women and diminished by racist restrictions and violence at polls. And only decades after that, in the 1960s, did the civil rights movement start a new wave of equality that spread into feminism, the Native American movement, the gay and lesbian movement, and much more.

But those activists were reinventing the wheel. They were rediscovering Gunnar Myrdal's verdict of the 1940s that "the parallel between women and Negroes is the deepest truth of American life, for together they form the unpaid or underpaid labor on which America runs."

This time, we could learn from history. We could double our chances by working for one of these candidates, not against the other. For now, I've figured out how to answer reporters when they ask if I'm supporting Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama.

I just say yes.

This One's For You, Joe (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON

It's not double jeopardy exactly, but still, I'd prefer not to kill the same man twice.

And I wanted to follow William Safire's advice on writing about gaffes and graft: Only kick people when they're up, not when they're down.

So I decided to do something completely radical and not pile on.

Having played a role in derailing Joe Biden's '88 presidential bid with stories on his overreliance on the speeches of Neil Kinnock and Bobby Kennedy, I feel compelled, now that the guy has slipped on another presidential banana peel 20 years later, to lend him a hand.

I wanted to give him a chance to wipe the slate clean and articulate his positions — without dredging up any painful memories of the words "clean" and "articulate."

The senator called me between New York fund-raisers last night. After his rough week, he sounded a bit chastened, not at all in the mood for a columnist's probing questions. He needn't have feared.

"So," I asked him sweetly, "why has everyone been so mean to you?"

"Well," he demurred, "they haven't been mean. The truth is, a lot of people in the African-American community were hurt by what I said. I really feel lousy about it. I got involved in politics because of civil rights." (He said a lot more, but hey, it's a 750-word column.) I had another penetrating question ready: "Is Delaware big enough to launch a president?" "I think it is," he replied.

I had a tough follow-up: "Will your first act as president be to get rid of those tollbooths on I-95?" He laughed. "I get asked that a lot by people. I can't help 'em — they're on their own."

That's the straight talk I like to see. No pandering, like Hillary's telling Iowans she likes ethanol, and John McCain's telling Christian conservatives he likes Christian conservatives.

"People don't seem to appreciate your verbal generosity," I said. "Are you studying Bogie and Steve McQueen movies to become less wordy, or do you just hope people will come to see it as part of your charm?" "We're in a political culture where everything is reduced to bumper stickers and sound bites, and it's a lot more complicated than that," he said. "I'm fairly candid, and sometimes I'll cause controversy and sometimes I won't. It's who I am. I'm not going to change who I am."

That's my man. He stares controversy in the eye and chats with it.

"In one sentence, with no more than two dependent clauses," I instruct, "tell me why you would make a great president."

"I really believe the American people get the fact that with the next president, there's no margin for error. He's going to inherit a world and a nation where this guy is going to leave him in a real deep hole. The next president has to get us out of Iraq without ruining the Middle East, so Americans should be looking for the person with the most experience."

O.K., that's three sentences, but who's counting?

"You've been a truth-teller on Iraq for years, so tell the truth," I said. "Are we cooked?" Citing the soft-partition plan he co-wrote, he noted: "Any country that comes into being as a consequence of the pen of a diplomat has never been able to be stable except by (a) an imperial power dominating it, (b) a dictator or strongman, or (c) a federal system."

Aren't Americans going to be angry at a Senate that's bending itself into a procedural pretzel, rather than seriously tackling the future of Iraq?

"They are going to be angry," he agreed. "Republicans are trying to avoid embarrassing the president. If you took a secret ballot, I'd be dumfounded if 20 senators thought sending 21,500 troops made any sense." He said John McCain wouldn't think it made sense either "because he has called for sending many more."

Do you agree that Dick Cheney is barking mad?

"Cheney is a very smart guy who's kicking the can down the road here," he replied. "He's concluded that this administration's policy can't succeed in Iraq and he's handing it off to the next guy."

Things were getting way too serious. "What's your ideal day?"

"It would be corny," he said. "Just taking off to the beach with Jill."

Trying to boost his dented confidence, I said I was sure he looked better in the Delaware waves than Barack Obama in the Hawaiian surf. The 64-year-old laughed, saying, "Like the Paul McCartney song, 'When I'm 64.' I don't look as good as I once did, but Jill does."

"Who would make the best president?" I coaxed.

"Me," he crowed.

I think his confidence is coming back. Excellent.

Texas Governor Has Funding Idea: Sell The Lottery (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Gov. Rick Perry (R) proposed Tuesday that Texas sell its state lottery for at least $14 billion, with the money dedicated to an endowment for residents without health insurance and a trust fund for cancer research.

No state has sold or leased its lottery, although several are considering it. Last month, Indiana Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. (R) proposed leasing the state lottery for 30 years to pay for scholarships aimed at keeping Indiana's top college graduates in-state.

In Texas, the lottery reported more than $3.77 billion in sales in the 2006 fiscal year, the highest amount in its 14-year history. The lottery contributes $1 billion a year to public schools.

"This moment in time is a unique opportunity to address great challenges and build the foundation for a future of unparalleled prosperity," Perry said in his State of the State address.

Several legislative leaders questioned the idea, with some skeptical the lottery would fetch $14 billion and others wondering what it would mean for gambling overall.

"Basically, by privatizing the lottery you legalize private-run gambling operations in Texas," said Republican Sen. Steve Ogden, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Under Perry's plan, money from the sale would be used to establish three trusts: $8.3 billion to replace most of the public-education revenue lost with the sale of the lottery, $3 billion for cancer research, and $2.7 billion to expand health insurance coverage for the working poor.

The interest proceeds from those trusts would fund the programs -- producing annual revenue of $1.26 billion, the governor projects.

On A Wintry Night, The Press And The Politicians Get Cozy (WP)

By Jose Antonio Vargas

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

Another year, another black-tie dinner commingling the press and the pols, another way to stay warm on an utterly chilly night. For this one night, we could forget about the forgetful Scooter Libby, domestic budget cuts, the streets of Baghdad.

We could even forget that it's an "American Idol" night.

On this Tuesday night, there was a party to be had and a journalistic legend -- the indefatigable Helen Thomas -- to be honored. And not even the threat of snow could stop the 63rd annual congressional dinner of the Washington Press Club Foundation.

Bob Schieffer, the venerable CBS newsman, played host in a jovial, playful tone. Together with ringers Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), he faced the toughest task of all: Make a roomful of journalists and politicians laugh.

In introducing Kennedy and Boehner, Schieffer said: "I've known these men for many years. And they are the cleanest . . ."

Boehner commented on Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi's new no-smoking rule: "We can still smoke out on the balcony. But, Nancy, it was 20 degrees out there. I think I want a seat on your global warming committee."

And Kennedy said of Boehner, "We don't always believe in the same issues, but I believe in his right to make his mistakes."

It was a tough crowd at the Ritz-Carlton. But it worked. Sort of.

And anyway, it was all for a good cause. At $175 a plate and with 850 guests in attendance, last night's fete served as a benefit for the foundation, which provides scholarships for women and minorities. A good and necessary cause, indeed, especially considering the lack of people of color in the crowd.

The foundation's dinner is the kickoff to the annual string of press-plus-pols parties (the Gridiron, Radio-TV, White House correspondents) of the year. Seeing the elected officials and the reporters who cover them getting all chummy is a curious thing. If you're an outsider to all of this, making your way from the VIP room to the ballroom, a glass of merlot in hand, you ponder the separation of newsmaker and journalist. A lyric runs through your head: "The press and the pols, sitting in a tree, K-I-S-S-I-N-G."

Judy Holland, a congressional reporter for Hearst Newspapers and the president of the foundation explained: "On the Hill, all bets are off, the notebooks out. But on a night like this, we're a community, and we're celebrating a coming of age. First woman speaker of the House. A woman as a presidential front-runner. Helen Thomas. I yanked my 13-year-old daughter from her homework so she could be here and see what it all means."

Daryl Hannah was there, seated at the same table as Lauren Nelson, the newly crowned Miss America. And, yes, the actress is Amazonian, all legs. She's not the political schmoozer type, she says, but she was here to talk about global warming ("We're at a crossroads right now") and show her support for the new Democratic Congress.

"Who's your congressman?" you asked her.

A beat later, she replied, "I live in a couple of places simultaneously."

Arianna Huffington waited in the coat line, at one point dropping $1 and $5 bills from her purse as she greeted Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) with a kiss on the left cheek. "I was in Davos," she told him. "One of those capitalist gatherings." They laughed.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) whisked on by, followed by "Hardball" host Chris Matthews, then Democratic strategist Donna Brazile, an endless parade of the who's-who of the K Street-Capitol Hill-Washington-press-corps set.

The foundation dates back to 1919, when a handful of journalists formed the Women's National Press Club. They weren't welcome to the all-male National Press and Gridiron clubs. The foundation's annual dinner began in 1944, a kind of a welcoming party to the sociopolitical circuit for freshmen members of Congress.

As always, honors were handed out last night. The David Lynch Memorial Reporting Award went to David Lightman of the Hartford Courant and John E. Mulligan of the Providence Journal. A new scholarship, funded by the New York Times and the foundation, was announced, named after slain Timesman David Rosenbaum.

But no honor meant more than the lifetime achievement award bestowed on veteran White House correspondent Thomas.

"On behalf of the House of Representatives, we salute Helen Thomas," said Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi. "You could have gotten [this award] over and over again, Helen."

"One of the greatest reporters in the history of the republic," Kennedy called her.

Thomas is definitely a perfectionist. Two hours before her speech, she was hunched over on the stage of the VIP room, a red pen in hand, rereading her remarks. ("To the members of Congress, I say, do the right thing. Pass laws that are fair to everyone. . . . To the media, I say, let's follow the truth wherever it leads us, and let the chips fall where they may . . .")

She's been attending these dinners since the late '40s. She was president of the Women's National Press Club in 1959.

"I've picked the greatest profession in the world," Thomas said. "There is nothing more indispensable to a democracy than a free press."

Spoken like an old pro, still idealistic after all these years.

Subprime Politics (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0129150

Mortgage delinquencies are rising, subprime lenders are going belly-up -- another company filed for bankruptcy Monday -- and the Senate Banking Committee is holding hearings today on "predatory lending." All of this can only mean one thing: Congress is looking for someone to blame now that the housing boom is over.

The noted banking expert Jesse Jackson is scheduled to be a featured witness at today's hearing, along with a couple of unfortunate consumers who were sold mortgages they couldn't afford to repay. Senator Chris Dodd, Chairman of the Banking Committee, is in high dudgeon, threatening legislation and talking about the American dream becoming a nightmare for those who can't make their mortgage payments. It's time for a reality check.

No one likes to see anyone lose his home to foreclosure -- and that includes the banks. Banks make money by lending to people who can repay their loans with interest. Lending people money they can't pay back is a lousy business, as the many recent headlines about subprime lenders going bankrupt demonstrate. If rapacious banks really had a goal of lending people more than they could afford to pay back, they wouldn't be swimming in red ink.

Related to this is the contention, made by the same populists on the current "predatory lending" rampage, that banks make money by charging them "excessive" interest. But, if anything, the recent spate of bankruptcy among subprime lenders suggests that they were charging too little interest to compensate for the credit risk they were taking by lending to people with bad credit histories.

This is not to say that there were no mistakes made during the recent housing boom. There always are excesses during asset bubbles. Quickly rising prices made a lot of people giddy on both sides, and it's now clear that loans were offered and taken that should not have been. Both the asset-price increases and the lending risks were also facilitated by a prolonged period of easy money, courtesy of the Alan Greenspan-Ben Bernanke Federal Reserve.

The combination of exceptionally low interest rates over an extended period contributed to booming prices that encouraged lenders and borrowers to overextend themselves. Borrowers figured that if rates rose or things got sticky, they could always sell for a profit. Lenders likewise became accustomed to lending with little or no money down from the buyer, confident that rising prices would soon provide the buyer with an equity cushion. Meanwhile, regulators at the Fed and Comptroller of the Currency waited a long time to question some of the riskier lending practices.

However, Members of Congress know it's a pain to wrestle with Mr. Bernanke over monetary policy, and the Comptroller's rules for mortgage lending don't make for sexy newspaper copy. It's so much more fun to knock around a couple of prosperous-looking bankers. So in searching for a scapegoat, the politicians are returning to that old chestnut, "predatory lending."

They may want to think twice before stringing up the bankers, though. Whether their borrowing history is good, bad or indifferent, Americans enjoy some of the best access to credit of anyone in the world. Those no-money-down loans are risky for both sides. But for many people, the alternative is no chance to buy that house at all. The politicians arguing for tighter credit standards are some of the same folks who deplore banks for "red-lining" by refusing to lend in poor urban neighborhoods. And the result may be less credit, or no credit at all, for the working poor or newly employed.

Last week the percentage of subprime mortgages that were more than 90 days past due was placed at just over 10% in November, the latest period for which figures are available. That's the highest it's been in years. But, remember, this also means that close to 90% of loans are still being paid off more or less on time. Tightening standards means not only "protecting" the 10% who got caught short but also hurting the 90% who stretched for a mortgage and are still making their payments.

Lenders know that some percentage of marginal loans will go bad. But they can't know in advance which loans will sour -- or presumably they wouldn't make those bets in the first place. The only way to ensure close to 100% loan performance is to restrict lenders to making only the safest loans. This in turn means shutting out of the market a whole lot of people who may be "risky," but still manage to send in their checks every month.

For such borrowers, a lender who makes a risky loan is not a predator, but a gatekeeper to homeownership and the economic opportunity that goes with it. We suspect that the vast majority of those who stretch to afford a home and sacrifice to make their payments don't need the kind of protection Mr. Dodd is offering.

Choice Advances (WSJ)

Proving that the best reforms often pass by the slimmest of margins, Utah's house voted 38-37 late last week to create a state-wide voucher program that will allow students to escape failing public schools.

Union opponents can be expected to mount a furious assault in the state senate, and then head to court. But the senate is likely to pass the reform supported by GOP Governor Jon Huntsman Jr., so Utah may soon become the first state with a universal school choice plan. It would offer students who attend private K-12 schools from $500 to $3,000 in tuition reimbursement based on family income.

Meanwhile, South Carolina could be next. Legislation is now being drafted to allow nearly 200,000 poor students to opt out of failing public schools by giving them up to $4,500 a year to spend on private school tuition. Middle class parents would be eligible for a $1,000 tax credit.

Governor Mark Sanford, a Republican, also wants to create more choice within the public system by consolidating school districts so students who can't afford to live in a certain zip code aren't forced into the worst public schools -- a system that now consigns thousands of African-American students to failing schools. In his State of the State Address last month, Mr. Sanford branded the current districts a "throwback to the era of segregation." The comment drew hardly a flutter in the legislature, he told us, because "everyone knows it's true."

Despite a 137% increase in education spending over the past two decades and annual per pupil spending that exceeds $10,000, South Carolina schools trail the nation in performance. The state ranks 50th in SAT scores, only half of its students graduate from high school in four years and only 25% of eighth graders read at grade level. The Governor's budget puts it this way: "The more we expose students to public education, the worse they do."

In last year's elections three legislators paid for their opposition to school choice with their seats. One freshman reformer is Representative Curtis Brantley, an African-American Democrat from rural Jasper County who defeated a white incumbent in a June primary. He told us he supports school choice because something must be done to shake up the status quo.

Those counting votes say this might be the year that choice legislation passes. Advocates are planning a rally at the state Capitol in Columbia on Tuesday, February 13. Mr. Brantley says he's helping bus people in from his district, and Governor Sanford will address the event. The voucher movement has been declared dead many times, but as Utah and South Carolina show, its promise of better education is keeping hope alive.

Budget Sets High Foreign Policy Targets (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Ambitious foreign policy goals set out in the Bush administration's federal budget for 2008 include the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons programme and the start of comprehensive multilateral negotiations with Iran.

Other targets listed in the foreign assistance component of the budget seem more like Soviet-era quotas, for example a projected 10 per cent increase over the 2006 figure of 769 interviews given by US officials to Arab and other media outlets in the Middle East.

In 2006, 81.7 per cent of participants in exchange programmes with the US, including opinion leaders and media commentators, "agree with democratically oriented principles in politics, work, and societal issues". The 2008 target is 84 per cent.

An official involved in drawing up the budget said the targets represented "what we intend to achieve with the resources we ask for". He added: "They are in many cases intangible goals."

This month Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, is due to mediate in the first Israeli-Palestinian talks for six years that will attempt to deal with long-term "final status" issues, even as the Palestinian territories slide into deeper interfactional violence. Yet the 176-page FY 2008 Performance Summary, issued by the State Department on Monday, foresees a "permanent status agreement and the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict" and the "development of full normal relations between Arab states and Israel".

On North Korea, where stalled-six party talks are due to resume this week after making almost no progress for nearly 18 months, the State Department projects an agreement within the next eight months and implementation in 2008.

Similarly, Iran is projected to "maintain" a full suspension of its nuclear activities, even though it has yet to begin one. On suspension, "multilateral negotiations commence with Iran toward a long-term settlement of outstanding international concerns".

In contrast to the National Intelligence Estimate released last week, which painted a grim future for Iraq, the State Department performance goal sees 2008 as the year for "consolidating democracy", where "civil liberties provisions remain intact and receive strong support from legal and executive institutions".

Karen Hughes, who heads public diplomacy for the Bush administration, is credited with setting up the "rapid response unit" to generate swift ripostes to "misinformation, negative and misleading reporting".

"On fast-breaking stories on Iraq, for example, we have been able to mobilise Washington officials to appear on the media in the morning rather than at the end of the day, which gets our message out to key Arab TV outlets early enough to make the main evening news," the document says.

Apart from Iraq, which receives the bulk of its funding in a separate supplemental budget, Israel continues to receive the most US assistance, officials said, followed by Egypt.

Winning the "global war on terror" remains an important theme in the foreign assistance budget. This means "winning the war of ideas", which involves $668m for foreign broadcasting, $486m for education and cultural exchanges and $359m for public diplomacy.

But foreign military assistance remains the largest component of the overseas budget, projected to rise slightly to $4.54bn, an official said.

Tom Lantos, the Democratic chairman of the House committee on foreign affairs, accused the administration of "short-changing the United Nations".

"This is absurd," he said in a statement. "The administration is budgeting for massive new arrears to the UN at a time when we need the organisation to help us in Iraq, Darfur, Lebanon, Haiti and a host of other global hot spots."

InterAction, an alliance of development and humanitarian non-government organisations, expressed concern that presidential initiatives on HIV/Aids, malaria and the Millennium Challenge Account were not accompanied by similar increases for traditional foreign assistance programmes.

Results, an advocacy organisation that seeks to create the political will to end hunger and poverty, criticised the 2008 request for "slashing" funding for the Global Fund to Fight Aids, Tuberculosis and Malaria after the House of Representatives voted last week to increase the amount.

Lebanon Leader Puts Onus On U.S. (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 7, 2007

BEIRUT — Badgered by Hezbollah and jeered as a puppet of the U.S. government, Lebanon's prime minister on Tuesday blamed American support of Israel for an increasingly violent political crisis that has shredded this country's stability.

His voice rising in frustration during an interview with the Los Angeles Times, Fouad Siniora said the troubles in his nation would subside if U.S. officials were to press Israel to withdraw its soldiers from Shabaa Farms, a small patch of disputed turf that the United Nations has said was part of Syria.

With Shiite Muslim Hezbollah and its allies mounting a hard push for a bigger share of power in Lebanon, many people here believe that the international community should force Hezbollah's hand by depriving the party of any excuse for keeping an armed militia. The lingering occupation of the land has long been cited by Hezbollah as a justification for its armed guerrilla fighters on Israel's border.

But the U.S. has ignored his pleas, Siniora said.

"They're not doing it," he said.

"That's what we're telling them. That's what we disagree with them about."

In Washington, National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe, told of Siniora's comments, said: "We understand the enormous pressure Prime Minister Siniora is under from Hezbollah and Syria and others that want to undermine democracy in Lebanon. We will stand by him to make sure democracy in Lebanon is successful, and we will continue to work for greater peace within the Middle East."

Divided by old sectarian and class tensions and battered by regional instability, Lebanon has reverted to being a battleground for regional and international conflicts. The United States, Iran, Syria, France, Saudi Arabia and other Arab states have pursued geopolitical agendas through local allies and proxies.

By all accounts, Siniora, a Sunni Muslim technocrat and former finance minister of humble birth, is Washington's favorite amid the stable of former warlords and clan patriarchs who jockey for power here. Officials in the Bush administration go out of their way to praise and bolster his government. And during months of angry anti-government protests, he has been cursed in the streets as a stooge of U.S. policy.

When he griped about the United States on Tuesday, it was a striking reminder of how American policy toward Lebanon can in some cases appear to undercut even Siniora, whom the Bush administration has scrambled to shore up in the face of fierce opposition.

Lebanese leaders complain that the United States failed to help Siniora when it mattered most, during last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah. Israeli bombs pounded this country for weeks. An increasingly desperate Siniora wept on television and implored the Americans to intervene to stop the Israeli onslaught. But Washington refused to ask for a cease-fire.

In the final 36 hours of the war, Israel stepped up its shelling of southern Lebanon and unleashed a torrent of cluster bombs. More than a million bomblets and 380,000 land mines remain on Lebanese land, Siniora said Tuesday.

Israel has also continued to breach the cease-fire agreement with steady violations of Lebanese airspace, he said. According to the United Nations, Israel has engaged in about five or six flyovers each week.

DOJ_NMG_0129153

"In the Arab world there were always a lot of complaints and grievances against the United States…. They've pushed the Arab world toward extremism," Siniora said. The Arabs are "being humiliated every day. [The Americans] can see with their own eyes the Israelis are subjugating the Palestinians."

As for Hezbollah, it has seemed determined to keep its guns — no matter what happens to Shabaa Farms. Hezbollah lawmaker Nawar Sahili said the militia wouldn't even consider disarming until it believed the Lebanese army had been proved capable of defending the country.

"This is a red line for us," Sahili said of disarmament. "When the Lebanese army is strong enough, maybe."

In the nearly six months since a cease-fire stopped the fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, Siniora has come under harsh attack from the Islamic militant group and its allies, who cursed his government as an American puppet and demanded more power. Mass demonstrations outside his office have dragged on for months, sparking street fighting and dredging up dark memories of Lebanon's 15-year civil war, a conflict that finally faded out in the early 1990s.

On Tuesday, Siniora traced Lebanon's perpetual instability back to Israeli occupation, both of southern Lebanon and of the Palestinian territories. It was the repeated Israeli invasions and occupation of southern Lebanon, he said, that created Hezbollah and allowed it to spread.

Pointedly describing Shabaa Farms as Lebanese territory, Siniora insisted that if Israel were forced to relinquish the land, his government and Hezbollah could come to an understanding.

"The Arab-Israeli conflict is the mother of most problems in the Arab world," he said.

For now, Lebanon remains deeply locked in crisis. Gunfights erupted around the country last month between rival Christian factions and between Sunnis and Shiites.

The bloodshed rattled the political leaders, and both sides toned down their rhetoric and struggled to rein in the rage among their followers.

But talks between the government and the opposition remain frozen. Even during the bloodiest days of the civil war, the various sides kept talking, a Western diplomat here pointed out this week. But now, he said, there is no negotiation.

Each side blames the other for the break in talks.

Meanwhile, Iran and Saudi Arabia have begun to negotiate a settlement to Lebanon's impasse. Predominantly Shiite Iran has close ties to Hezbollah, while largely Sunni Saudi Arabia is a staunch supporter of the Siniora government.

As he complained about the Americans, Siniora praised Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah as a "man who believes in his cause and who sacrificed even his son for that cause."

He also said that the Bush administration should engage Syria to pacify the region.

"Syria is a state. You cannot eliminate that state from the map. You've got to engage with Syria … to make it part of the solution, not part of the problem."

Rice Sees Summits With Israeli, Palestinian Leaders (AFP)

AFP, February 7, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans a series of three-way meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders in a major shift of US efforts to broker a peace deal and establish a Palestinian state, a senior US official said.

Following six years of a virtual hands-off policy toward the Arab-Israeli dispute under President George W. Bush, Rice will bring Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas together for their first three-way meeting on February 19, US and Israeli officials announced.

"Our expectations are that this is an initial opportunity for these two leaders to start a discussion about those issues that would concern the framework of a possible Palestinian state," said Rice's spokesman, Sean McCormack.

"It is their first opportunity to discuss these in more than six years," he said, referring to a breakdown in peace negotiations since a Palestinian uprising against the Israeli occupation erupted in late 2000.

Rice had already announced her intention to host the Abbas-Olmert meeting in the middle of this month.

But McCormack said she intended to pursue the three-way format in a significant departure from Bush's past practice of remaining aloof from the intricacies of Israeli-Palestinian deal-making while he focused on the conflict in Iraq and the broader "war on terrorism".

"I would expect you would see more of the tripartite format as opposed to just the Israelis and Palestinians" meeting, McCormack said.

"We would hope that the Israelis and Palestinians would take advantage of this particular forum" to reach agreements on everything from the "most mundane" issues of security, economics and trade to the "most politically sensitive" questions of forming a Palestinian state, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0129154

The Bush administration has been under growing pressure from Arab and European allies to invest more effort in breaking the Israeli-Palestinian deadlock, seen as fueling a global rise in Islamic radicalism.

Rice has held many fruitless separate meetings with Israelis and Palestinians over the past two years focused primarily on ending attacks on Israel by Islamic radicals.

Last month during her latest tour of the region, she announced a new approach that would deal in parallel with security matters and so-called "final status" issues involving the borders and powers of a future Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

The US plan was endorsed Friday by the top diplomats from Russia, the European Union and United Nations, who together with the United States make up a group known as the "Quartet" of Middle East mediators.

But the initiative faces serious obstacles, with Abbas locked in a violent power struggle with the Islamic movement Hamas and Olmert severely weakened by his perceived mismanagement of Israel's war against Lebanon's Hezbollah militia last year.

Hamas won control of the Palestinian government in elections a year ago, sparking a diplomatic and aid embargo by Quartet nations.

Abbas has tried to negotiate a power-sharing deal that would create a unity government between Hamas and his secular Fatah party, but Hamas has refused to meet Quartet requirements, notably by recognizing Israel's right to exist.

Tensions between the two sides erupted into deadly violence in December which has left 100 dead, including 50 killed over four days last week.

Abbas and Hamas leaders were meeting in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, this week in another bid to reach an accommodation.

McCormack reaffirmed Tuesday that any agreement between the two sides should include recognition of the Quartet principles.

The Quartet is due to meet again in Berlin after the Rice-Abbas-Olmert summit.

Palestinian Aid Policies 'backfiring' (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Concern is mounting in the international aid community that policies aimed at isolating the Palestinian Authority's ruling Hamas movement have backfired by further impoverishing the people of Gaza and the West Bank without seriously undermining the Islamists.

The British charity Oxfam joins the debate on Wednesday with an appeal for Europe to scrap an emergency aid programme that bypasses Hamas and revert to direct funding of the PA government that it controls.

"The way that European aid is currently being delivered is undermining Palestinian basic services and damaging a highly fragile economy," said Barbara Stocking, Oxfam's director.

Her statement followed a report last week by the UK parliament's international development committee that claimed the policies of Israel and international donors towards Hamas were playing into the hands of its Iranian ally.

"The withholding of revenues by Israel and the boycott of the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority by existing donors has led the Hamas government increasingly to look elsewhere for financial support," the report said.

"As a result, Hamas now has closer links to governments like that of Iran than it had two years ago. We doubt whether this is a development that the international community would have intended."

Israel has released only $100m (€77m, £51m) of an estimated $600m in tax revenues collected on behalf of the PA since Hamas came to power 12 months ago. The PA collects locally about $25m a month in tax.

The controversy erupted as Hamas officials met in Mecca last night with Mahmoud Abbas, PA president and leader of the rival Fatah movement, to try to reach a national unity agreement that could lead to the lifting of what Palestinians describe as an international "siege".

Despite the so-called boycott, tens of millions of dollars are still flooding into the territories. There has been emergency aid from Europe and elsewhere, support from Arab governments – about $260m last year – and an indeterminate amount of cash smuggled by Hamas and others into the Gaza Strip.

One senior western aid official, asked to quantify the total reaching the territories, conceded: "Frankly, we don't have any idea."

Members of the international Quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – who with other donors had provided about $1bn a year to the Palestinians, suspended direct aid to the PA after Hamas came to power in January last year.

The Quartet said the boycott of Hamas would remain in force until it recognised Israel, committed itself to non-violence and accepted existing agreements with Israel, a position the four reaffirmed at a meeting in Washington last week.

Officials said the original thinking behind the boycott was to show Palestinians the consequences of electing a Hamas government. With Hamas unable to finance services and public sector salaries, it was assumed its popularity would suffer. Recent polls, however, showed it just a few percentage points behind Fatah.

In June, in an effort to stave off hardship among Palestinians, the Quartet supported the establishment of a European-run Temporary International Mechanism (TIM) to funnel funds to Palestinians through the office of Mr Abbas.

By the turn of the year, the European Commission had contributed €107.5m ($140m, £70m) through the TIM to pay for health services, fuel supplies and allowances to the poor and to public employees who had gone for months without pay.

Oxfam's statement described the mechanism as an "aid fiasco" and lambasted a system under which HSBC bank had received almost €4m in commissions to administer the transfer of allowances to Palestinian recipients.

European officials defended the TIM and played down the significance of commissions of less than 4 per cent, describing them as below normal for such large and complex transactions.

Mario Mariani, who heads TIM's operations from Jerusalem, told the FT: "The idea has been to show we were not prepared to starve people in order to get rid of a government we did not agree with."

Although officials liaise with Mr Abbas's office, TIM payments go directly to beneficiaries such as Israeli fuel suppliers or to the bank accounts of Palestinian employees. Payments to individuals are made on the basis of a database held by HSBC in London to ensure no funds are diverted to terrorism. "No money goes directly to [the] president's office," said Mr Mariani. "There is no blank cheque."

So far, 144,000 heads of poor households and state employees have received financial aid through the TIM, directly benefiting 900,000 people. The allowances have averaged 40 per cent of former salaries. No payments have been made to the 80,000-strong security forces.

Some aid officials and Palestinian officials close to Mr Abbas are concerned Hamas has attempted to claim credit for the fact the economy has not totally collapsed under its watch, while the president has failed to win kudos for acting as a conduit for continued foreign aid.

Mr Mariani acknowledged the problem but said: "People know what they are getting, and they are not getting it from Hamas.

"At the beginning there was some confusion and the government tried to exploit it. Now it is very clear that people can see Hamas has not delivered."

Fatah And Hamas Leaders Meet Saudi King For Peace Talks (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

MECCA, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 6 — Leaders of the two main Palestinian parties, Hamas and Fatah, on Tuesday began a two-day Saudi-brokered effort to agree on a unity government that could end a wave of violence in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and resume relations with donor countries.

The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and two Hamas leaders — Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian prime minister, and Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based militant leader — met separately with King Abdullah, Saudi officials said.

All of the leaders are expected to perform the pilgrimage at the Grand Mosque in Mecca and meet with other Saudi officials and mediators before deliberations begin in earnest here on Wednesday.

The meeting is intended to yield a government that would include members of both parties and be acceptable to Western governments so that they resume relations with and aid to the Palestinians and restart peace negotiations with the Israelis, which have been stalled since 2003.

The United States and the European Union consider Hamas, which has carried out numerous attacks against Israeli civilians and opposes Israel's existence, to be a terrorist organization. They cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority last spring after Hamas took power as a result of defeating Fatah in elections held in January of last year.

Previous efforts to stem the current bloodshed between the Palestinian factions and find common ground have yielded only temporary cease-fires. But many hope that the high-profile meeting in Islam's holiest city, and the weight and personal prestige invested in it by King Abdullah, will prod the Palestinians to leave here with an agreement in hand.

"Hopefully, in the holy environment in the house of God, this will come clearly as a message to them and they will take their obligations as seriously as they can," the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, said Tuesday in an interview.

Hamas and Fatah have wrangled over a unity government since last summer, when it became clear that with Western aid withheld, Hamas could not govern alone.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel told visiting American Jewish leaders Tuesday that he would meet on Feb. 19 with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Mr. Abbas. Mr. Olmert did not say where the meeting would take place.

The issues separating Hamas and Fatah in the Saudi-sponsored talks are how to divide ministerial portfolios and how the new government will meet the Western criteria of renouncing violence, recognizing Israel and accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

American and Israeli officials said Tuesday that the so-called quartet — the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — would not compromise on those demands.

If there is a deal in Mecca, Prince Saud said, "you move to the peace process — then you will be able to, with assurance, have the talks between the two sides."

The Saudis, who have traditionally preferred to work quietly behind the scenes, have grown increasingly alarmed at the chaos engulfing the Middle East.

Palestinians Try To Stave Off Civil War (AP)

By Donna Abu-Nasr

AP, February 7, 2007

Palestinian factions on the brink of civil war gathered Tuesday in Mecca, Islam's holiest city, in a last-ditch effort to end their bloody conflict. The Saudi-led push is key to any future peace talks with Israel — and to Arab efforts to blunt Iran's growing power.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Khaled Mashaal, leader of the militant Hamas movement, flew to the Saudi city of Jiddah before heading to Mecca to meet their host, King Abdullah, ahead of the start of talks Wednesday.

The talks are open-ended, a reflection of Saudi Arabia's determination to keep them going until the Palestinians reach a deal for power-sharing in a new coalition government.

The king's mediation and the holding of the talks in Mecca underline the Saudi pressure on the sides to overcome their differences. The Saudis are pointedly convening the talks in a Mecca guest palace overlooking the Kaaba, the cube-shaped shrine toward which all Muslims turn when they pray.

Four days of gunbattles between Fatah and Hamas fighters killed more than 30 people and wounded over 200 others until a cease-fire took hold Sunday.

Even as Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas left the Gaza Strip Tuesday for the talks, Hamas and Fatah security officials fired at each other for 10 minutes at the Gaza-Egypt crossing terminal. No injuries were reported.

"Nobody wants the battling to continue," Haniyeh told reporters. "The only beneficiary is Israel."

In an interview with the Lebanese paper Al-Akhbar, Abbas warned that failure in Mecca "would mean the deterioration of the internal situation and igniting civil war."

Beyond ending the intra-Palestinian bloodshed, a deal on power-sharing is vital for any resumption of the peace process. Israel has refused any talks since Hamas formed a government following January 2006 elections, and the West imposed a financial blockade on the Palestinian government because of Hamas's refusal to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately, is hoping for an agreement on a coalition government in which Hamas will give some degree of recognition to previous peace agreements with Israel to allow a resumption of talks and an end to the embargo.

The Mecca gathering is also a test of U.S. ally Saudi Arabia.

The kingdom, which normally prefers behind-the-scenes diplomacy, has taken an assertive new role in trying to resolve the Palestinian conflict, as well as two other Mideast conflicts that threaten to erupt into full-fledged civil wars: Iraq and Lebanon.

It has done so in part because it fears that Shiite-Sunni tensions fueled by the turmoil in Iraq and Lebanon could explode, destabilizing the region — and threatening the kingdom itself, which is mainly Sunni but has a significant Shiite minority.

Saudi Arabia also aims to stem the influence of mainly Shiite, Persian Iran, its longtime rival, which has a hand in all three crises. Iran has funneled millions of dollars to Hamas, giving it an unprecedented influence in the Israeli-Arab conflict. As a sign of its concern, Saudi Arabia has even opened contacts with Iran to cooperate in easing tensions in Iraq and Lebanon.

At the same time, Saudi Arabia sees reviving the Israeli-Arab peace process as vital to calming the crises across the Mideast.

King Abdullah underlined the need for a deal as he met with Abbas and Mashaal separately in Mecca.

"What's going on in the land of Palestine serves only the enemies of the Islamic nation," he told Abbas, according to the Saudi News Agency. "If it continues, it will rob the Palestinians of the fruits of their long struggle."

Speaking to Mashaal and Haniyeh, Abdullah warned: "If the dispute between Palestinian brothers goes on, it will bleed away their energy and end all that they have struggled to achieve."

Abdullah also received a message from President Bush ahead of the talks, delivered by Homeland Security and Counterterrorism adviser Frances Townsend, the news agency reported, without giving details.

State-guided Saudi newspapers urged the Palestinians to reconcile and observe the truce that took hold Sunday. "If the Palestinians cannot reach radical solutions at the Mecca meeting, then I believe we have to wait 50 more years for them to, perhaps, get over the (power) complex," commentator Hani Wafa wrote in a column titled "The Last Chance" in Al-Riyadh newspaper.

The Palestinians have been struggling for months over a power-sharing deal, and street battles between gunmen of the two parties have erupted with increasing frequency in Gaza. The differences focused on the program of the proposed coalition and who would control the security forces. In recent months, Egypt, Syria and Qatar have all tried and failed to end the power struggle.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy of Hamas leader Mashaal, was cautious as he and Mashaal left Damascus for the talks. "The disagreements ... have become narrower," Marzouk told The Associated Press, "but we don't know whether an agreement will be reached or not."

Ostensibly, the gaps are small — in the case of the program only a single word. Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately in 2005, has insisted Hamas promise to "commit" to previous agreements, including interim peace deals with Israel. Hamas is only willing to say it "respects" such agreements.

Saudis Offer Counterweight To Resurgent Iran (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

By inviting the leaders of Fatah and Hamas, the two warring Palestinian factions, to reconciliation talks in Mecca, Saudi Arabia has invested its prestige in efforts to ward off a civil war in the occupied territories.

The Saudi-sponsored talks, which opened on Tuesday, come as the conservative kingdom increasingly finds itself at centre stage in diplomatic efforts to prevent the crisis-ridden Arab world sliding into further conflict.

Palestinian infighting is impeding the efforts of pro-US states, such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan, to press Washington to revive a meaningful Arab-Israeli peace process leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state – a strategic goal for these countries. But Saudi concerns have gained urgency as Riyadh tries to counter Iranian influence in the region.

Arab officials are alarmed by what they see as Tehran's expanding regional role through its links with the newly resurgent Shia majority in Iraq and through its backing for radical forces such as the Palestinian Hamas government and Hizbollah, the Lebanese Shia group. They also see Iran profiting from the turmoil in Arab trouble spots by appealing directly to Arab public opinion frustrated by the inability of regional governments to stand up to Israel and the US.

Tehran has been cementing its ties with Hamas, Arab officials complain, to the detriment of Egyptian efforts to forge a Palestinian national unity government that could negotiate with Israel.

"The Palestinian issue should be resolved by the Arabs and no one else," said King Abdullah of Saudi -Arabia in remarks published last week.

He also warned Iran that it was "endangering" the Gulf region because of the problems in its international relations – an apparent reference to Tehran's stand-off with the US over its alleged nuclear ambitions.

Analysts say Saudi Arabia is engaged in a difficult balancing act. It wants Tehran's influence checked, but without confrontation. Riyadh, they argue, is trying to use pressure and diplomacy to counter Tehran but is anxious to avoid a US military strike against Iran's nuclear facilities.

Saud al-Feisal, the Saudi foreign minister, announced last week that his country was working with Iran to avert strife between the Sunni and Shia in Iraq and Lebanon. At the same time, however, Riyadh appears to be backing the new US strategy in Iraq, which includes raising the pressure on Tehran.

"The Iranians have a clear understanding of where we stand," said a Saudi analyst close to the government. "We want them to prove that they are a player for ending disputes, not for stirring them up."

Tehran denies it is stirring up trouble and argues it wants stability just as much as the Saudis.

However, even as Saudi and Iranian envoys criss-crossed the region in recent days with the declared aim of avoiding sectarian bloodshed in Lebanon and Iraq, a wave of anti-Iranian and anti-Shia rhetoric has been sweeping the Arab press, threatening to inflame rather than damp down -sectarian tensions.

Newspapers have accused Iran of seeking to win converts to Shia Islam in Sunni Arab countries as far afield as Algeria and of trying to revive its old Safavid empire. Some Saudi clerics have issued statements accusing the Shia of being heretics.

"We are going back to the discourse of the 1980s immediately after Iran's Islamic revolution," said Abdulaziz al-Qassim, a Saudi lawyer. "Even moderates have assumed a virulent anti-Shia tone. There is a sense of threat because of the sectarian massacres in Iraq and a fear that the balance of force in the region will be altered if [Iran acquires] nuclear weapons."

In a country where there is a sizeable Shia minority, estimated at about 2m, the sectarian talk is producing alarm. “The consequences of this incitement . . . will be dangerous,” warned Sheikh Hassan al Nimr, a Shia cleric in Saudi Arabia.

However, so far there have been no moves on the part of the Saudi authorities or any other Arab government to curb the sectarian rhetoric.

“In some respects it may be Machiavellian,” said -Gregory Gause, a specialist in Gulf politics. “Most people in the Arab world like Iran’s support for the Palestinians and they see a nuclear Iran as strengthening the Islamic world. So if you inject a sectarian element you can mobilise opinion against Iran.”

Saudi Arabia's Diplomacy (WP)

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

ONE CONSEQUENCE of the Bush administration's recent decision to divide the Middle East between "extremists" and "moderates" was to marginalize U.S. diplomacy in the region. The administration refuses to talk to the "extremists" -- Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas -- but those governments and groups are at the center of every major conflict from Iraq to the Gaza Strip. Now one of the administration's "moderate" allies, Saudi Arabia, has stepped into the vacuum. The result has been a revealing demonstration of how talks with adversaries can sometimes be useful -- and a hint of what may be lost by Mr. Bush's inflexible policy.

In Riyadh yesterday, Saudi King Abdullah was hosting potentially groundbreaking negotiations between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and senior leaders of Hamas. While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been preparing to have her own talks next week with Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the intra-Palestinian discussions are considerably more important: They could determine whether a Palestinian administration emerges that is both willing and able to settle with Israel, or whether recent Palestinian factional fighting escalates. Significantly, the Hamas representatives in Riyadh include Khaled Meshal, a militant leader based in Damascus who has blocked previous moves toward a Palestinian accord. Saudi relations with Mr. Meshal's sponsor, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, may be warming; Mr. Assad will soon be in Riyadh for a Saudi-hosted summit of the Arab League.

Saudi diplomats, including former ambassador to Washington Prince Bandar bin Sultan, are also deeply engaged in talks with Iran. The contacts began with a visit to Saudi Arabia by Ali Larijani, the head of Iran's national security council. Prince Bandar subsequently visited Tehran and, according to a report in the New York Times, King Abdullah received leaders of Hezbollah. Sunni-ruled Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran back opposite sides in the escalating sectarian conflicts in Iraq and Lebanon, but the talks show that both governments are interested in tamping them down. Though there have been no breakthroughs, the diplomacy seems to have succeeded, at least, in cooling the situation in Lebanon, where a Hezbollah campaign against the Saudi-supported, pro-Western government led to several days of violence last month.

The Bush administration seems to be encouraging the Saudi diplomacy: The State Department praised the king's hosting of the Palestinian talks. In fact the Saudi initiatives, even with so-far-uncertain results, refute the premises of the administration's own policy of sharply dividing enemies from friends. U.S. strategy assumes that nothing can be gained by talks with Iranians such as Mr. Larijani and that nothing can cause militants such as Mr. Meshal to compromise. It's good that Saudi Arabia is testing a contrary theory in practice; even better would be some American diplomatic risk-taking.

U.S. To Create A Single Command For Military Operations In Africa (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — The Pentagon will establish a new military command to oversee its operations in Africa, President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced Tuesday.

Creation of the United States Africa Command, which had been expected, will “strengthen our security cooperation with Africa and create new opportunities to bolster the capabilities of our partners in Africa,” Mr. Bush said.

The president said he had directed Mr. Gates to establish the command by Sept. 30, 2008. The location of the command will be determined after discussions with Congress and officials of countries on the continent, Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Gates, testifying Tuesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee, said creation of the command would eliminate an “outdated arrangement left over from the cold war.”

Three commands now divide responsibility for operations in Africa: the European Command, which oversees most countries on the continent, except those in the Horn of Africa; the Central Command, which has responsibility for Egypt, Sudan, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Somalia and Kenya; and the Pacific Command, which has responsibility for Madagascar, the Seychelles and the Indian Ocean.

DOJ_NMG_0129159

The man who is about to become the head of the Central Command, Adm. William J. Fallon, told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Jan. 30 that he favored establishment of an Africa Command, in light of the humanitarian crises and instability across much of the continent and its strategic importance.

"The Horn of Africa sits astride one of the most critical sea lines of communication in the world," Admiral Fallon said. On Tuesday, the committee endorsed him to succeed Gen. John P. Abizaid to lead the Central Command and sent the nomination to the full Senate for confirmation.

US Signals Scope For Ties With N Korea (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Washington would be prepared to start normalising relations with Pyongyang before it completed nuclear disarmament if it helped persuade North Korea to move forward on a previous agreement to denuclearise the Korean peninsula.

A senior Bush administration official said Washington would consider starting the process to remove Pyong-yang from the list of state sponsors of terrorism, and to ease restrictions on American companies dealing with the state, if North Korea moved forward on its commitment to dismantle its nuclear programmes.

US officials will meet their North Korean counterparts tomorrow when the six-party talks, which include China, Japan, South Korea and Russia, resume in Beijing.

In September 2005 North Korea pledged to abandon its nuclear weapons programmes and rejoin the nuclear non-proliferation treaty in return for energy aid and security guarantees. But Pyongyang refused to return to the negotiating table for more than a year after Washington imposed financial sanctions that hurt the regime of Kim Jong-il.

The Bush administration has come under greater pressure to deal with North Korea after it tested a nuc-lear weapon for the first time last year.

But the White House believes Mr Kim is also under pressure to reach an agreement because of the financial sanctions, and also because of increased pressure from China. But David Albright, a US nuclear expert who met government officials in Pyong-yang last week, said North Korea did not appear under pressure.

"North Korea feels the US is making a mistake by putting all their eggs in the Chinese basket," said Mr Albright.

The US official said South Korea would take the lead in providing energy assistance and food aid, which North Korea badly needs following a bad grain harvest in 2006. In return, Pyongyang would agree to freeze its plutonium reactor as the first stage of a process that, from the US perspective, would have to lead to complete disarmament, including the removal of North Korea's stockpile of plutonium.

U.S. Expects Intense N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP)

By Carl Freire

AP, February 7, 2007

The U.S. expects "hard bargaining" at upcoming talks aimed at getting North Korea to abandon its nuclear program, Washington's chief negotiator in the talks said Wednesday.

Christopher Hill, speaking to reporters in Tokyo on his way to Beijing where the six-nation talks resume Thursday, said North Korea's willingness to take steps forward was key.

"The big question is whether the North Koreans are really ready to make some progress," Hill said. "We did have some good signs in Berlin, but I think we also know that there is going to be some rather hard bargaining, so we'll see how we do."

North Korea returned to the six-party talks — which also include Japan, China, Russia and South Korea — in December after conducting its first nuclear test in October, but the talks stalled over the North's objections to U.S. financial sanctions.

The North agreed in January to resume the nuclear negotiations after the United States offered unspecified concessions during rare bilateral talks in Berlin.

North Korea is proposing to freeze its main nuclear reactor and allow U.N. monitoring in return for massive energy shipments and normal relations with the United States, according to an American nuclear expert who visited Pyongyang last week.

David Albright, a former U.N. nuclear inspector, said in an interview Tuesday that North Korean officials told him they also wanted the lifting of U.S. financial restrictions imposed for alleged North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. currency and money laundering that have led to about $24 million in North Korean funds being frozen at a Macau bank.

Chief North Korean disarmament negotiator Kim Kye Gwan and other officials told Albright and Joel Wit, a former State Department official, that nothing would happen until the U.S. agreed to the construction of light-water reactors that Washington promised North Korea under a 1994 deal to freeze Pyongyang's nuclear program.

That deal, which also included an annual supply of half a million tons of heavy fuel oil until the reactors were built, was scrapped in 2002 when North Korea admitted it had restarted its atomic program.

Albright, the head of the Institute for Science and International Security, said the North emphasized that it now wanted either electricity shipments or more heavy fuel oil than was promised in the 1994 deal.

Hill said Tuesday that negotiators from Pyongyang had not raised the issue of heavy fuel oil in return for shutting down its reactor. However, he said there was room to discuss the matter under a September 2005 pledge in which North Korea agreed to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

Northern Exposure (WSJ)

By Gordon G. Chang

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

Tomorrow, China-sponsored six-party talks to disarm North Korea are scheduled to resume in Beijing. This time, there are great expectations that an agreement will be reached. But if there is a deal, it will not be because Chinese diplomats worked behind the scenes. It will be because the Bush administration has made concessions it previously refused to consider -- in particular, releasing frozen North Korean funds, providing aid, and accepting only an interim freeze of the North's production of plutonium. American policy makers apparently think that if the U.S. makes the first moves, China will persuade North Korea in the future to completely give up its nuclear arsenal.

China supplies approximately 90% of the North's oil, 80% of its consumer goods and 45% of its food. It accounts for more than half of Pyongyang's foreign trade, and is the only nation that pledges to defend Kim Jong Il's state with military force. Some North Korean officials are thought to be more loyal to the Chinese leadership than to Kim Jong Il. The little autocrat could "neither bark nor bite" without China's assistance. Beijing can disarm him but has chosen not to exercise its influence.

China's failure to act leads analysts to believe that Beijing keeps the Kimist regime afloat to preserve regional peace, avoid a tide of refugees, maintain a buffer against American forces in South Korea, destabilize Japan and obtain leverage over Washington. Beijing seeks these advantages, but they barely explain recent Chinese policy. Kim Jong Il is the destabilizing force in North Asia, and Korean refugees would move south in a crisis and not north. A unified Korea in Beijing's orbit would serve as a superior buffer, and it is Kim Jong Il who is pushing Japan to rearm and build missile defenses. And Korean issues are beginning to cloud China's relations with America. On balance, North Korea is a growing liability for Beijing as it tars its international standing.

There are two primary reasons why the Chinese haven't solved the Korean crisis. First, China is in the middle of a once-in-a-lifetime transition. Mao Zedong was once the world's arch-proliferator of nuclear weapons technologies. Many in Beijing now realize that the further nuclearization of the region will only result in the reduction of China's relative power. It is not just the potential armament of Japan, South Korea and Taiwan that concerns the Chinese. The nuclear agreement between India and the U.S. -- the world's largest democracy and its most powerful one -- foreshadows a setback of immense proportions for China.

Despite Beijing's recognition that proliferation no longer benefits China in the long term, there is now no accepted strategic vision in the Chinese capital, just competing views and interests that result in directionless policy -- what many mistake as "nuanced" diplomacy. There may be academics and Foreign Ministry officials who want to take constructive steps, but there are also generals who enjoy bedeviling Americans and who maintain close ties with their North Korean counterparts.

The most recent evidence of Beijing's indecisiveness is its flip on the inspection of goods moving in and out of North Korea. On Oct. 14 of last year, Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, voted in favor of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718, which calls on nations to inspect such goods. Immediately after the vote, he declared that the inspection provision was unacceptable to China. Then, two days later he said that China would inspect North Korean cargoes after all, but would not intercept or interdict them. This erratic performance is a sign of a government that does not know what to think or do, even on matters of importance.

More generally, Chinese foreign policy has not evolved to the point where Beijing is disposed, by itself, to openly interfere in the affairs of a neighbor in a drastic manner. China's officials still speak of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence -- all of which boil down to noninterference in others' internal affairs -- as the bedrock of their foreign policy. China must complete the process of both shedding the self-image of an outsider and ending its traditional role as an adversary of the existing global order. Such a change inevitably occurs when a rising power matures, but it only happens after internal perceptions have shifted over time. The fundamental problem is that China is just not quite ready to act like a great power.

Second, China has priorities that it perceives to be more important -- or at least more immediate. North Korea was pushed to the top of Beijing's agenda only by an unexpected event: Pyongyang's October 2002 admission to an American envoy that it had been pursuing a uranium-weapons program in violation of its existing agreements. Up until then, Chinese leaders were preoccupied by domestic matters. To the extent they were concerned by international ones, they were focused on China's western and southern borders. Today, other matters -- such as securing energy -- are deemed far more urgent than Korea.

China will not disarm North Korea on its own. Beijing has been able to protect Pyongyang because Seoul is doing the same. Stripping Seoul from Beijing should be Washington's most immediate tactical goal. If Washington can help South Korea reverse course -- certainly possible in light of the conservative trend in that nation -- the Chinese will be alone in their support of Pyongyang and will therefore have to take a clear stand. They will have to choose between their future, cooperation with the U.S., and their past, the alliance with North Korea. America can help the Chinese break the deadlock inside their capital and complete their nation's historic transition.

Bush Approves Plan To Pressure Sudan (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

President Bush has approved a plan for the Treasury Department to aggressively block U.S. commercial bank transactions connected to the government of Sudan, including those involving oil revenues, if Khartoum continues to balk at efforts to bring peace to Sudan's troubled Darfur region, government officials said yesterday.

The Treasury plan is part of a secret three-tiered package of coercive steps -- labeled "Plan B" -- that the administration has repeatedly threatened to unleash if Sudan continues to sponsor a campaign of terror that has left as many as 450,000 dead and 2.5 million homeless. But the administration has held back on any announcement of Plan B, even after setting a Jan. 1 deadline, in hopes of still winning Khartoum's cooperation.

The delays have increased skepticism that the administration is willing to risk potential diplomatic and commercial fallout from targeting Khartoum.

The U.S. plan would put pressure on Darfur rebel leaders who have refused to participate in peace talks or who have targeted humanitarian groups operating in the region, officials said. The information on Plan B was provided by officials in four government agencies on the condition of anonymity because the administration had not planned on releasing details yet.

Some aspects of Plan B have already been stealthily launched, such as stationing four U.S. Army colonels last month as observers on the Sudan-Chad border in full view of Sudanese intelligence. The unannounced move was intended as a signal to Khartoum, which the administration accuses of launching a "quiet war" against Chad's government to widen the Darfur conflict.

"I find this all very dubious. They have talked about Plan B, but they have never explained what Plan B is," said J. Stephen Morrison, director of the Africa program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "The deadlines have come and gone, and the Sudanese have thumbed their noses."

Andrew Natsios, Bush's special envoy to Sudan, tomorrow will testify before the House Foreign Affairs Committee that the administration has set three triggers that would result in the enhanced sanctions: one, renewed attacks on displacement camps or driving nongovernmental organizations from Darfur; two, stonewalling peace negotiations with rebel forces; and three, refusing to implement a plan pushed by then-U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan to expand a poorly equipped 7,000-person African Union force into a hybrid A.U.-U.N. force of 17,000 troops and 3,000 police.

"Treasury's plan to block commercial bank transactions connected to the Khartoum regime, even those involving oil revenues, will be only a minor, short-term inconvenience," said Eric Reeves, a Sudan expert at Smith College, who noted that Khartoum has already violated the three triggers since the start of the year. "This element of Plan B only reveals more fully its vacuous nature."

The Darfur conflict broke out in 2003, when African rebel groups attacked police stations and military outposts. The United Nations and human rights groups accuse Sudan's government of supporting a militia known as the Janjaweed in an effort to crush the rebellion. About 2,000 villages have been destroyed across Darfur, and the administration more than two years ago accused the government of engaging in genocide. But the United States has made little progress in ending the conflict or the humanitarian crisis.

Buoyed by booming oil wealth and a close relationship with China, Sudan has shrugged off repeated threats of action. Bush, increasingly frustrated by the impasse, approved key aspects of the plan last month, directing Treasury to come up with a menu of options that would directly affect the government in Khartoum, officials said. Sudan's Arab leadership has fought multiple civil wars with regional groups over the country's oil and other resources, and U.S. officials believe Sudan's leaders are fearful of any moves that might threaten their grip on power.

Sudan's economy is largely dollar-based, meaning many commercial transactions flow through the United States and making it especially vulnerable to Treasury actions. Indeed, U.S. intelligence, which has stepped up reporting on Sudan in recent months to prepare for a confrontation, believes Khartoum set up a government committee to explore ways of obtaining oil revenues that did not involve dollars, such as barter deals, one official said. Sudan's government has also unsuccessfully sought new oil contracts that would provide for large upfront payments.

The core of the Treasury plan rests on an executive order issued by President Bill Clinton in 1997 that blocked all Sudanese government assets, including companies connected to it, and curtailed financial dealings with Sudanese entities. Bush last year issued a second executive order that blocked the property of people connected to the conflict in Darfur. The existing orders already result in regular freezes or rejections of some Sudanese transactions, but U.S. officials believe they also give the Treasury the authority for an aggressive crackdown on a much larger group of companies connected to Sudan.

Officials hope a ripple effect of Treasury's actions would extend to other countries and companies doing business with Sudan, forcing them to reconsider whether they want to be tainted or, more troubling, subjected to Treasury's scrutiny. "Anything that is controlled by the government we can go after," a senior administration official said. "But the effectiveness will be driven by the participation of our partners," meaning other countries.

Sudan produces about 500,000 barrels of oil a year, which at current market rates is worth about $10 billion. As much as 200,000 barrels are kept for internal consumption, Morrison said, with about 75 percent of the rest sold to China. Partly because some aspects of the plan are still classified, administration officials yesterday were vague about how the plan would cripple Sudan's oil revenues. One official said Treasury will "have the ability to touch things that touch oil revenues."

The regional government of South Sudan, created through a peace deal two years ago, is supposed to get 50 percent of oil revenues. Officials said they think they had designed the plan so it would harm Khartoum but without impacting the government in the south.

Suicide Bomber Dies At Airport In Pakistan (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Feb. 6 — A suicide bomber armed with pistols and grenades killed himself and at least one other person after a shootout with security guards at Islamabad's international airport on Tuesday night, in what the police described as a thwarted but brazen terrorist attack.

It was the second suicide bombing in Islamabad in less than a week and appeared intended to inflict major casualties at the airport, which was teeming with passengers and was sealed off by the police for hours. At least five people were wounded, including three security personnel, and were rushed to nearby Rawalpindi General Hospital.

Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao, the interior minister, said in an interview that the bomber and an accomplice fled a taxicab at an airport checkpoint near the parking lot. He said the bomber zigzagged, fired at security guards and detonated a grenade as he was hit by an officer's bullet. Another intelligence official said the accomplice was wounded and arrested.

The identities and motives of the pair were unclear. But Tariq Azeem Khan, the state minister for information, said the attack was evidently a response to President Pervez Musharraf's effort to suppress groups that support Al Qaeda, the Taliban and other Islamic militant extremists, particularly in Pakistan's northwest frontier near the border with Afghanistan.

"It is a backlash against Pakistan's support in the war against terror," Mr. Khan said. '"Pakistan is itself a victim of terror and is being targeted."

The attack followed a Jan. 26 suicide bombing at the Marriott Hotel in an upscale neighborhood of Islamabad and was the sixth militant attack in the past two weeks, most of them near the Afghanistan-Pakistan frontier.

Russia Tycoon May Talk To Police On Poisoning (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 — Boris A. Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon and bitter opponent of the Kremlin, said Monday that he was prepared to be interviewed by the Russian police investigating the poisoning in London last November of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a dissident former K.G.B. agent he had advised and financed.

However, in what he called his first newspaper interview since the British police handed a dossier on the case to the Crown Prosecution Service last week, Mr. Berezovsky said that he would talk to Russian investigators only if they met conditions, including being searched for weapons and poisons.

Mr. Berezovsky spoke in a wide-ranging, 50-minute interview in his offices in Mayfair, a wealthy district of central London, offering some new insights into a tantalizing case that has raised many questions but answered few of them since Mr. Litvinenko, 43, died of radiation poisoning caused by a rare isotope, polonium 210, on Nov. 23.

Mr. Berezovsky said he believed that Mr. Litvinenko had been the target of two attempts on his life, the first in mid-October. That attempt failed, he said, because too little poison was used. Mr. Berezovsky also disclosed that the prime suspect identified in British news reports had visited him the day before Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned in November and had left a powerful trace of radiation in Mr. Berezovsky's office.

After the British police started investigating the case, Russian officials announced their own inquiry and said Moscow police officers were awaiting clearance from Britain to come here.

In a softly lighted and sumptuous suite, Mr. Berezovsky, a former mathematician who amassed huge wealth in business during the Russian presidency of Boris N. Yeltsin in the 1990s, said he was prepared to meet Russian investigators if that would help the British police inquiry, which is widely perceived to have stalled over Russia's resistance to extraditing suspects.

But Mr. Berezovsky said he would not meet the investigators in the Russian Embassy and would insist that they be searched beforehand.

"The people from Russia should be investigated for arms and poison," he said, insisting, too, that he would not sign a confidentiality agreement about the discussion. "I don't trust them at all."

Mr. Berezovsky said he blamed President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia for the killing, a charge the Kremlin has labeled absurd. He said the killers had apparently believed that the cause of death would never be known because British investigators would not be able to identify polonium 210 as the poison. Polonium had been discovered in Mr. Litvinenko's body only three hours before he died, Mr. Berezovsky said.

The British inquiry has focused on three Russian men who met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at an expensive hotel where the poison is thought to have been slipped into his tea. One of them is Andrei K. Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. agent who Mr. Berezovsky said worked for him after he acquired control of a major television station in Moscow in the 1990s.

Mr. Berezovsky, 61, fled Russia in 2000 and, after a series of court battles, won political asylum in Britain in 2003. Mr. Litvinenko also left Russia in 2000, and Mr. Berezovsky said he set the former agent up with a house in north London, a salary and school fees for his son.

Before the killing, however, Mr. Berezovsky said, the two men had agreed to go their separate ways and Mr. Litvinenko had started investigating a range of business deals involving prominent Russians. "Alexander touched something very sensitive," Mr. Berezovsky said, without elaborating.

When Mr. Litvinenko initially became ill in early November, Mr. Berezovsky said, he told hospital visitors that he believed Mr. Lugovoi was "involved" in the poisoning. Mr. Lugovoi has consistently denied any involvement. Until then, Mr. Berezovsky said, he had no reason to mistrust his former bodyguard and had asked him to arrange security for a daughter visiting Russia last year.

Last October, when Mr. Lugovoi called him to say he was visiting London for a soccer game, Mr. Berezovsky said, he invited him to his office. "I wanted to tell him thanks a lot for my daughter," Mr. Berezovsky said. "He came to my office."

But, after Mr. Litvinenko died and the office was scanned for radiation, Mr. Berezovsky said, a chair used by Mr. Lugovoi was found to have high levels of radiation. Mr. Litvinenko also visited Mr. Berezovsky's office, on the day he was poisoned.

The timing of Mr. Berezovsky's interview apparently reflected a desire by Mr. Litvinenko's family and supporters to keep the case firmly in the public eye when they seemed worried it could fizzle if British authorities did not prosecute. "The basic target is not to allow anybody to stop this case," Mr. Berezovsky said.

This week, Mr. Litvinenko's widow, Marina, released an open letter to Mr. Putin urging him to bring her husband's killers to justice.

Russian Justice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

The wheels of justice in Vladimir Putin's Russia move strangely, but this week all too transparently. Prosecutors brought fresh charges against Mikhail Khodorkovsky that likely ensure that the former Yukos oil magnate and Putin political opponent won't leave his Siberian prison camp before next year's presidential election.

Nothing from his first trial suggests the outcome will be any better for Mr. Khodorkovsky once a Russian court in distant Chita, near the Mongolian border, takes up the new money laundering and embezzlement case. They could add 15 years to his prison term. Mr. Khodorkovsky's initial conviction and eight-year sentence for tax evasion enabled the backroom nationalization of Yukos's plumb assets. He would have been up for parole next year. No more.

Would that Russian investigators were as determined in pursuing the killer of Anna Politkovskaya, who was shot in her apartment building last October. Her case is unsolved. Since the murder of TV personality Vladislav Listyev in 1995, no one has been successfully prosecuted for a high-profile assassination inside Russia. Now the Kremlin is busy making it harder for United Kingdom authorities to bring to justice the murderers of Alexander Litvinenko, who was poisoned with polonium 210 in London last November.

DOJ_NMG_0129164

British investigators found traces of the radioactive substance at the hotels, on the plane, even on the football stadium seat that Moscow businessman Andrei Lugovoi used during his trip there. This former KGB agent and another colleague had drinks with Litvinenko the day he was poisoned. Polonium 210 was also discovered at the bar and in a tea pot at the London hotel where they met. Such forensic evidence apparently isn't up to Russian standards. No charges have been filed in Britain, but Russia's chief prosecutor has already preemptively ruled out the extradition of Mr. Lugovoi to the U.K. The Russians also refused to let British police question him directly in Moscow.

You don't have to be a conspiracy theorist to surmise that the Kremlin wants Mr. Khodorkovsky to stay in Siberia and the Politkovskaya and Litvinenko cases to remain unsolved. And so they are.

Blair Wins Cash-for-honours Reprieve (FT)

By Jimmy Burns, James Blitz And Nicholas Timmins

Financial Times, February 7, 2007

Downing Street on Tuesday won a temporary reprieve in the cash-for-honours affair when the Crown Prosecution Service announced that the first person to be arrested by the police last year would not be charged.

Amid signs that Labour pressure on Tony Blair to resign immediately had momentarily eased, the CPS said there was "insufficient evidence" to press charges against Des Smith, a headteacher.

Mr Smith was arrested last April after allegedly suggesting to a Sunday newspaper that sponsors of the government's flagship city academies would receive honours.

However, giving its first formal decision on the cash-for-honours affair, the CPS said: "Although it is clear that Mr Smith made some indiscreet comments to an undercover journalist, his conversations did not provide evidence that he was trying to obtain funding for city academies in exchange for honours."

The CPS's decision to drop the investigation into Mr Smith probably has no implications for the outcome of the rest of the inquiry. However, the CPS's decision on Mr Smith is the first crack in the Metropolitan police's investigation into claims that Labour offered peerages in return for secret loans.

Even so, one senior officer not directly involved with the investigation said there was widespread sympathy with John Yates, the head of the investigation team, and his apparent refusal not be derailed by political pressure.

The officer said: "I think what you are seeing is a Blue Revolution – a reminder that everyone is equal before the law, and the police are not bending to pressure from the establishment."

For the past 11 months police have investigated whether Downing Street offered peerages to a group of business leaders in return for loans and donations to the Labour party. Two close allies of Mr Blair have been arrested in relation to police investigations into a possible Downing Street cover-up. All deny the charges.

Mr Blair's immediate position was on Tuesday shored up by two other developments. First, Sir Gus O'Donnell, the cabinet secretary, denied media reports that there was a secret e-mail system inside Number 10 that the police had not been told about. Mr Blair's aides have repeatedly denied the allegation since it emerged in news reports some days ago.

But a denial by Sir Gus, the head of the civil service, carries particular weight.

Second, a new opinion poll showed that the public is less interested than the media and political worlds in the cash-for-honours affair. A Populus survey for The Times, conducted over last weekend, showed support for Labour has firmed to 33 per cent, up one point since early last month, while the Tories are three points down at 36 per cent.

In an appearance before the Commons public administration committee, Sir Gus signalled growing frustration in Whitehall with the way the allegations over cash for honours have been presented by broadcasters and the press. "I find it deeply worrying just how much media coverage there is," he said. "That's all I can say."

Appearing on Tuesday before the Commons liaison committee – made up of all Commons committee chairs – Mr Blair said he would be willing to appear before the group once more before he leaves office. This implies he still plans to be in office in June.

But a decision to charge one of Mr Blair's close aides might trigger a spasm of uncertainty within the Labour party over whether the prime minister should stay in office until June.

The CPS said that there would be no further charging decisions relating to any other persons arrested or interviewed by the police until Scotland Yard had completed its investigation and submitted its final dossier.

Neither the police nor the CPS would comment on Tuesday night on when the probe would end, although Scotland Yard said the "wider police investigation is ongoing".

British Prosecutors Clear Blair Ally In 'Cash-for-Honors' Probe (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

DOJ_NMG_0129165

The Washington Post, February 7, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 6 -- Prosecutors cleared a political ally of Prime Minister Tony Blair on Tuesday in an investigation into whether Blair's Labor Party awarded government honors in exchange for cash.

The Crown Prosecution Service said it had found "insufficient evidence" to bring charges against Des Smith, who was arrested last year in the inquiry, which has caused extensive political damage to Blair's government.

Smith, a former government adviser who helped recruit wealthy sponsors for a key Blair education initiative, told reporters he was relieved that the inquiry regarding him was over and called it "nonsense from the beginning."

Smith was the first of four people arrested in what people here call the "cash-for-honors" investigation, centering on whether potential political donors have been enticed with promises of appointments to the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament.

The others arrested were Blair's top fundraiser, Michael Levy; a key adviser, Ruth Turner; and Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major Labor Party donor. Police said all four were questioned on suspicion of breaking laws banning the exchange of honors for money. Levy and Turner were also questioned on suspicion of "perverting the course of justice," which has led political opponents to allege a coverup.

No one has been charged with a crime.

Blair has been questioned twice by police, the first time that a sitting British prime minister has been interviewed by police in a criminal probe. Police have said Blair was treated as a potential witness, not as a suspect.

Smith was a key backer of Blair's flagship education program to create public schools with special independence. Smith last year allegedly told an undercover newspaper reporter that major donors to those academies could be recommended for government honors, including seats in the House of Lords.

Smith has denied doing anything improper, including what he said in his conversation with the reporter, who was posing as an assistant to a potential donor. The prosecution service, in a statement, called Smith's comments to the reporter "indiscreet" but said they did not amount to evidence of wrongdoing.

As Inflation Soars, Zimbabwe Economy Plunges (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, February 7, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Feb. 6 — For close to seven years, Zimbabwe's economy and quality of life have been in slow, uninterrupted decline. They are still declining this year, people there say, with one notable difference: the pace is no longer so slow.

Indeed, Zimbabwe's economic descent has picked up so much speed that President Robert G. Mugabe, the nation's leader for 27 years, is starting to lose support from parts of his own party.

In recent weeks, the national power authority has warned of a collapse of electrical service. A breakdown in water treatment has set off a new outbreak of cholera in the capital, Harare. All public services were cut off in Marondera, a regional capital of 50,000 in eastern Zimbabwe, after the city ran out of money to fix broken equipment. In Chitungwiza, just south of Harare, electricity is supplied only four days a week.

The government awarded all civil servants a 300 percent raise two weeks ago. But the increase is only a fraction of the inflation rate, so the nation's 110,000 teachers are staging a work slowdown for more money. Measured by the black-market value of Zimbabwe's ragtag currency, even their new salaries total less than 60 American dollars a month.

Doctors and nurses have been on strike for five weeks, seeking a pay increase of nearly 9,000 percent, and health care is all but nonexistent. Harare's police chief warned in a recently leaked memo that if rank-and-file officers did not get a substantial raise, they might riot.

In the past eight months, "there's been a huge collapse in living standards," Iden Wetherell, the editor of the weekly newspaper Zimbabwe Independent said in a telephone interview, "and also a deterioration in the infrastructure — in standards of health care, in education. There's a sort of sense that things are plunging."

Mr. Mugabe's fortunes appear to have dimmed as well. In December, the ruling party that has traditionally bowed to his will, the Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front, balked at supporting a constitutional amendment that would have extended his term of office by two years, to 2010. The rebuff exposed a fissure in the party, known as ZANU-PF, between Mr. Mugabe's hard-line backers and others who fear he has brought their nation to the brink of collapse.

The trigger of this crisis — hyperinflation — reached an annual rate of 1,281 percent this month, and has been near or over 1,000 percent since last April. Hyperinflation has bankrupted the government, left 8 in 10 citizens destitute and decimated the country's factories and farms.

Pay increases have so utterly failed to keep pace with price increases that some Harare workers now complain that bus fare to and from work consumes their entire salaries.

Citing a leaked central bank document, [a news agency] reported Tuesday that prices of basic items like meat, cooking oil and clothes had risen 223 percent in the past week alone.

Soaring costs have made it impossible for both national and local governments to meet budgets and for businesses to afford raw materials, while subsidies for basic commodities have drained the government treasury and promoted corruption.

Seeking to revive farm production, for example, the government sells gasoline to farmers at a bargain rate of 330 Zimbabwe dollars per liter — and farmers promptly resell it on the black market for 10 times that, leaving their fields idle.

Mr. Mugabe, who blames a Western plot against him for Zimbabwe's problems, has rejected all calls for economic reform. The government refuses to devalue Zimbabwe's dollar, which fetches only 5 to 10 percent of its official value on the thriving black market. As a result, foreign exchange to buy crucial imported goods like spare parts and fertilizer has effectively dried up.

Despite acceptable rains, one international aid official said, Zimbabwe's corn crop is currently lagging behind last year's — and that harvest was among the worst in history. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the assessment had not been made public.

The central bank's latest response to these problems, announced this week, was to declare inflation illegal. From March 1 to June 30, anyone who raises prices or wages will be arrested and punished. Only a "firm social contract" to end corruption and restructure the economy will bring an end to the crisis, said the reserve bank governor, Gideon Gono.

The speech by Mr. Gono, a favorite of Mr. Mugabe, was broadcast nationally. In downtown Harare, the last half was blacked out by a power failure.

Eighty-two years old, wily and physically robust, Mr. Mugabe has survived both international condemnation and domestic upheaval before.

Efforts to suppress dissent are rising: in recent weeks, trade union officials were seriously injured in police beatings, arsonists burned the home of a leading pro-democracy activist and church leaders were arrested while meeting to discuss the economic crisis. Foreign journalists remain barred from the country under threat of imprisonment, and harassment of Zimbabwean journalists has sharply increased.

But hyperinflation is eroding the government's control over every aspect of public life and, by extension, over its own future.

"It's out of control now, and they have to bring it back in control," said John Robertson, a Harare-based economist and a frequent critic of government policies. "We're reaching the steepest slopes of the process. They say they can fix prices, but the things that cause price increases come from so many different directions that the government can't control them all."

That growing loss of control is apparent. The black market, which already flourishes beyond the reach of tax collectors and regulators, is likely to grab an even larger share of the economy when the government freezes prices in March, because stores will be unable to make a profit selling products at government-fixed prices.

Problems with water and power supplies have become acute because of a lack of foreign exchange and salaries for workers; a wave of blackouts hit the nation early last month when 100 electrical workers walked out to protest low pay.

Zimbabwe's political opposition has failed for years to mount an effective work stoppage to protest living conditions. But public workers, the bedrock of government support, this year have begun to walk off the job because there is no longer enough money to pay them a living wage.

The average teacher, for example, earns barely one-fourth of the salary needed to keep a family of six out of poverty. The military, unhappy with January's 300 percent pay hike, is seeking 1,000 percent.

The growing number of strikes also has emboldened the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, a center of opposition to Mr. Mugabe, to make its own plans for a general work stoppage.

"People in Zimbabwe tend to be resilient," said Jamal Jafari, an analyst for the Washington-based International Crisis Group, which monitors political risks worldwide. "But that having been said, what has to be the scariest statistic for the government is the fact that large sectors of the civil service and the military are far below the poverty line. They simply can't raise salaries fast enough."

Mr. Jafari and some political and economic analysts in southern Africa say they now believe that Zimbabwe faces a political showdown within months, as the governing bodies of ZANU-PF wrangle over whether to grant Mr. Mugabe an extended term or to put less radical members of the ruling party in power.

Few expect a democratic revolution; the one rival party, the Movement for Democratic Change, is riven by splits, systematically suppressed by the government and without an effective leader. Regardless, these experts say, by failing to arrest this accelerating decline, Zimbabwe is edging toward a day of political reckoning that years of diplomatic jawboning and political jockeying have failed to produce.

For the government, “the big problem about Zimbabwe is that the one thing you can’t rig is the economy,” said one Harare political analyst, who refused to be identified for fear of being persecuted. “When it fails, it fails. And that can have unpredictable effects.”

From Bird To Person (WSJ)

By Peter D. Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2007

LONDON -- The "deadly" H5N1 avian flu is back on the front pages of newspapers and TV news shows. The British environment minister has pledged quick action to "eradicate" the disease from the U.K., and over 150,000 turkeys on one farm have been culled. "This is," someone said on the BBC's "Breakfast" show Monday, "a disease of birds, not humans." And so it is.

The H5N1 virus has still not made the critical interspecies leap which would make it easy for an infected person to give the disease to another person. That may happen, or it may not; and nobody can predict the outcome or its timing with any degree of confidence. Meanwhile, as of the World Health Organization's compilation on Feb. 3, there had been a total of 271 laboratory-confirmed cases of the virus in humans, and of that number a staggering 165, or 61%, died, making it one of the most lethal pathogens in history, even if not one of the most infectious.

Still, just 18 months ago many experts were predicting a global pandemic in a matter of months, perhaps one that would kill millions. There is historical precedent: The 1918-1919 "Spanish Flu" swept around the world in a matter of weeks, and before the disease burned out, more than 50 million people had died. Today H5N1 is reminiscent only of the Asian "Swine flu," which threatened the U.S. in 1976 but never turned into a serious threat to human life (although the media hype surrounding it helped undermine Gerald Ford's presidency). In 2004, worried people rapidly bought up much of the world's supply of Tamiflu and Relenza, the only two drugs that seemed to have a chance of beating H5N1. Now most of us have forgotten the names of these drugs.

Influenza viruses have eight genes and these mutate rapidly. Two sites on the viral genome, called H and N, are well catalogued, and each of those genes can come in many forms. Those are the markers that trigger the human immune system. If your body has seen a whiff of a particular virus, it will produce large numbers of antibodies if you later become infected with a strain having the same markers. If you have never been exposed to a particular strain, there are no antibodies in your bloodstream, and your body will fight an uphill battle for survival. The more virulent the virus, the less chance you have.

So far as is known, no H5N1 virus has ever circulated on the planet. That means nobody has any natural immunity. Our good fortune last flu season was that the bird flu virus had not yet learned the trick of passing easily from human to human. The few confirmed victims were almost all people who'd worked very closely with infected fowl in extremely unsanitary conditions. One can suppose that they were massively exposed, allowing this "disease of birds, not humans" to develop in their bodies.

Almost all influenza viruses originate in migrating water fowl in South-East Asia, and by and large the birds don't get sick. However, those birds can pass their viruses to domesticated birds. In the great viral mixing pot of China, where people live in close contact with both their birds and their pigs, influenza viruses can readily pass from one species to another, and sometimes to an animal or person already infected with another flu bug.

In this environment, mutations are guaranteed to occur, and from time to time a new pathogen with the ability to pass between people develops. If it carries the same marker combination as one or another previous flu virus, much of the world's population will have a basic immunity. If it does not have familiar markers, much of humanity is at risk once that virus learns to jump from person to person. Each year a panel of experts tries to guess which strains of flu will pose the highest risk in the coming influenza season, and orders up vaccines to give the vulnerable some protection. H5N1 has not been selected, because it still hasn't become contagious in our species. But it could make the jump at any time.

The last year has brought the world a major advantage, should H5N1 become a "disease of humans." The pharmaceutical industry has learned the difficult trick of making and producing a vaccine against a hitherto unknown disease. GlaxoSmithKline recently claimed that it had succeeded in developing a "second generation" bird flu vaccine that could be given in advance, even before knowing the detailed gene structure that would allow this bird flu to infect people. The vaccine could be given before the bug even learns that deadly trick. Other companies have also developed vaccines which appear to produce broad-spectrum antibodies against many strains of the virus, and many governments have ordered large stocks from various producers.

It is probably worth stockpiling many millions of doses before H5N1 escapes into the human population. Because none of us has any useful immunity, the virus could migrate around the world with the speed of commercial air travel, not the steamships that powered the Spanish Flu. If H5N1 escapes, and if it becomes as virulent as the Spanish Flu (which killed 1% of those who developed the disease), the pessimistic predictions of millions of people dead within months could come true. Only if vaccine bottles were already on the shelf, ready for instant use, could the virus be contained.

However, deadly as it could be, and as harmless as it has so far been, the H5N1 avian flu will not be the last new influenza virus to develop. The process that produced H5N1 is at work every year, and the more intense the agribusiness of raising chickens in China becomes, the more rapidly new viruses can spread and mutate. Even if we may have dodged the H5N1 bullet, another pandemic like the Spanish Flu is inevitable and could break out into the human population so quickly that vaccines cannot be produced in time.

New types of influenza virus must be detected and combated while they are still diseases of birds, not humans. Detection of new viruses will happen where they originate. A global pathogen surveillance system -- as Sen. Joseph Biden suggested almost five years ago -- is necessary because the global first line of defense against influenza is not the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, but the public health agencies of China, Vietnam and other nations in that region. Those agencies need multilateral support and encouragement, and the United States must take the lead. And countries where flu viruses originate need the courage to recognize that reporting a new disease does not reveal weakness, but rather demonstrates the strength of their health systems.

Mr. Zimmerman is professor of science and security at King's College London. He was chief scientist of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff and science adviser for arms control at the U.S. State Department.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Touts Argentina's Efforts To Seek Justice In 1994 Jewish Center Bombing. The AP (2/7, Cormier) reports from Buenos Aires, Argentina, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Wednesday toured a Jewish cultural center bombed in 1994 and said the United States supports Argentina's efforts to seek justice for its worst terrorist attack." The AP continues, "Eight Iranians are wanted in Argentina in connection with the bombing, including the president, foreign minister and intelligence chief at the time. … 'Civilized nations cannot easily forget the pain that we share when terrorist attacks occur,' Gonzales said after laying flowers and meeting with Jewish leaders and relatives of victims of the attack. 'Whether 1994 in Argentina, 2001 in the United States or 2004 in Spain, these moments bind us together in our grief.'" The AP adds, "Eight-five people were killed and 200 wounded when a van packed with explosives blew up outside the seven-story center on July 18, 1994. The center, known as the AMIA, has since been rebuilt. … Gonzales did not take questions from journalists on Wednesday. … He also did not say where the United States stands on Argentina's request for help from Interpol, which must decide in the coming weeks whether to issue global alerts for the arrests." The AP notes, "Iran has denied any involvement and has said it does not recognize the validity of the warrants. It said it would oppose any attempt to detain former President Hashemi Rafsanjani or other Iranian citizens. … Gonzales called the attack a 'vicious act of hate.' … 'We will never give up the fight for justice ... just as we are bound together in our memories of the terrorist attacks, so too, we must be bound together in our resolve,' he said. 'Argentina has steadfastly pursued the perpetrators of the AMIA attacks ... the memory of what happened here, like our September 11th, is a touchstone for us.'"

Verizon Backs DOJ Request To Stop Contempt Hearing By Maine PUC. The AP (2/8, Quinn) reports, "Verizon is backing the U.S. government's attempt to stop a contempt hearing for the telecommunications giant that's scheduled for Friday by the Maine Public Utilities Commission." The AP continues, "Federal officials say the hearing could compromise national security. … 'The MPUC seeks, under threat of sanction, to compel Verizon to provide information in state proceedings concerning its alleged cooperation with an alleged national security program despite the fact that the United States has specifically instructed Verizon that providing such a response would violate federal law,' lawyers for Verizon wrote in a legal brief." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge John Woodcock is expected to hear arguments in Bangor on Thursday. … A multi-customer complaint filed with the PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. The complaint followed reports about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency. … The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date." The AP notes, "On Tuesday, the Justice Department asked Woodcock to bar the PUC from going ahead with a contempt hearing at this time. … The Justice Department also asked the judge to block Verizon from responding to PUC demands for an affirmation of previous statements 'because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities.' … Verizon supports the federal government's request for a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction."

"Third Generation Terrorists" Organizing Without Al Qaeda Help. McClatchy (2/8, Schofield) reports, "While U.S. and British intelligence officials think that al-Qaida has regrouped in the mountains of Pakistan and is again capable of and intent on launching mass attacks around the globe, investigators in Britain, Germany and France are convinced that there's a broader terrorist threat against Europe. … Unlike the Sept. 11 plotters, the new wave of terrorists -- the so-called third generation terrorists -- are dreaming up, planning, funding and attempting attacks on their own, without international support." McClatchy notes that "the third generation has learned its hatred from television and its tactics from the Web, according to the experts. Its only connections to al-Qaida are Web sites and a shared anti-West philosophy. Its practitioners go online to find inspiration as well as practical advice, such as how to build a bomb."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Indiana Inmate Sentenced To 27 Years For Anthrax Hoax. The AP (2/3) reported, "A federal inmate has been sentenced to more than 27 years in prison for mailing what a letter claimed was anthrax to an assistant U.S. attorney who had prosecuted him. Charles E. Fuller, 39, pleaded guilty to one count of mailing a threatening communication and one count of threatening the use of a weapon of mass destruction before he was sentenced, prosecutors said Friday." The AP noted, "Fuller already is serving a 77-month sentence for attacking an inmate at the federal prison in Pekin, Ill., with an ice pick, prosecutors said. He was convicted in 2004 on a charge of threatening the president's life."

Bush Issues Orders For Medical Response To Terrorist Attack. The AP (2/7, Lumpkin) reported, "President Bush issued orders Wednesday for how federal medical personnel should respond to a nuclear, radiological, biological or chemical attack, saying authorities should focus on threats that can be dealt with medically." … 'We are moving heaven and earth to prevent' an attack, Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said. He called the directive a playbook for how the federal government will respond and coordinate in providing medical treatment in case prevention fails." Meanwhile, a DHS IG report criticized the agency's BioWatch program, saying that "the department had not properly enforced or monitored the Environmental Protection Agency and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which are also involved in the program. But it noted that Homeland Security had taken action to resolve the issues, and 'we consider the recommendations resolved and closed.'"

USA Today (2/8, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) reports the IG report said BioWatch "was bungled by the Homeland Security Department and has since undergone a revamping." Jeff Stiefel, the program's manager, "says the problems cropped up because the program was created quickly in 2003 in response to concerns that terrorists could spread deadly biological agents in densely populated areas. Homeland Security officials say they have 'taken action to resolve the issues,' the report says. Stiefel says that 'without question, those issues (raised by the report) are resolved.'"

DHS Releases Report On Border Patrol Shooting. The AP (2/7, Caldwell, Gamboa) reported a Department of Homeland Security report "on the shooting of a suspected drug smuggler by Border Patrol agents concurs with prosecutors that the men committed obstruction of justice by failing to report the shooting, destroying evidence and lying to investigators." The report was, made public Wednesday, "offered few, if any, new details on the case." Lawyers for the convicted agents, Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, "did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment. A spokeswoman for US Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said the report only bolsters the congressman's support of the agents. 'The OIG report has just emboldened our position because there is nothing in there that indicates these agents were not justified in shooting this individual,' said Tara Setmayer."

The Washington Times (2/8, Seper, 88K) reports the DHS document "said the agents covered up the incident and tried to assault the alien, but the report fails to substantiate earlier accusations that they wanted to 'shoot a Mexican.' The long-awaited and heavily redacted report by the department's Office of Inspector General was billed as a substantiation of the government's conviction." However, "it falls short of statements by the Inspector General's Office in September to a House subcommittee. The office had told lawmakers that the officers confessed to knowingly shooting at an unarmed suspect and that they did not think he was a threat, they wanted to shoot a Mexican and they lied to investigators."

Lawmakers Angry Over DHS Official's Statements In Growing Border Agent Controversy. The Houston Chronicle (2/8, Mittelstadt) reports, "Republican congressmen's outrage over the imprisonment of two Border Patrol agents from Texas intensified Wednesday as the top Homeland Security investigative official apologized for his aides' misleading statements to lawmakers about the case." The Chronicle continues, "The agents, sent to federal prison for wounding a fleeing Mexican drug trafficker and hiding evidence, never told investigators that they went on patrol intending to 'shoot a Mexican,' admitted Richard Skinner, the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general, under questioning during a House Homeland Security Committee hearing. … The misstatements occurred when aides briefed four Texas congressmen in September about the 2005 shooting near Fabens, southeast of El Paso. … 'It was an unfortunate mischaracterization,' Skinner told Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, whose district stretches to Harris County. 'I apologize on behalf of our staff, and I just want to make perfectly clear this was not intentional.' … But McCaul and several other House members from the Houston area who are involved in the Border Patrol agents' case said the misstatements never would have come to light had they not forced Skinner's office to release an investigative report on the shooting." The Chronicle adds, "The report, released Wednesday with some sections deleted, does not substantiate what McCaul said were some of the more inflammatory claims made by the inspector general's office last fall. The claims included the alleged 'shoot a Mexican' comment and an assertion that agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos had no fear for their lives when they fired 15 rounds at the trafficker as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a van with 743 pounds of marijuana. … 'Those representations became misrepresentations if not downright false statements to members of Congress,' McCaul said, later suggesting that Skinner should consider disciplining or firing the staffers." The Chronicle notes, "Other Republicans on Capitol Hill went further than McCaul in what has mushroomed into a growing political liability for President Bush and his administration — a vulnerability all the greater because some of the president's staunchest conservative allies have turned against him on this issue. … Reps. John Culberson of Houston and Sam Johnson of Plano said Skinner and his top aides should be forced to resign. … Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., demanded that the Bureau of Prisons chief, Harley Lappin, be fired after Saturday's beating of Ramos by six inmates at a Mississippi prison. … Bush faces increasing demands from House Republicans and others that he pardon Ramos and Compean, who were sentenced in October to 11 and 12 years, respectively, after being convicted of violating the trafficker's civil rights and tampering with evidence for picking up their shell casings and not reporting the shooting. "

FBI Outreach To Muslim-Americans "Steep Uphill Climb." Under the headline "Distrust Hinders FBI In Outreach To Muslims," the Washington Post (2/8, DeYoung, 690K) reports in a front-page, 2200-word story that without the help of Muslim-Americans, "the FBI, sheriffs and police chiefs believe they will never penetrate the world of homegrown Islamic extremists and potential terrorists the officials are convinced is out there. … Yet for both sides, the effort remains a steep uphill climb with frequent detours into resentment, suspicion and misunderstanding. Virtually all 56 FBI field offices and many local police departments have invited Muslim leaders to join multicultural advisory boards and to teach classes in the basics of Islam to agents and police. At community meetings, the FBI listens to Muslim complaints and asks for assistance in finding potential terrorists in their own communities." However, "Muslims are 'in denial' over the threat in their midst, one senior officer said, adding: 'All they say is "There is no problem. Stop picking on us."'"

US Wants To Expand Armed Pilot Program Internationally. USA Today (2/8, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports in a front page article, "The Homeland Security Department, working with the State Department, is trying to expand a 4-year-old program that allows thousands of pilots to carry guns on domestic flights." Conan Bruce, a spokesman for the Federal Air Marshals Service, which runs the armed-pilots program, said they are working toward having armed pilots "'be able to perform their duties on international flights.' Some countries may block US efforts because they don't want guns on airplanes, even if they're carried by trained pilots who have been sworn as law officers." Sweden, for instance, "would rather not see any weapons aboard airplanes," according to Michael Mohr, homeland security liaison at the Swedish Embassy in Washington. "The effort to expand the armed-pilots program comes amid criticism that it is falling short of its potential. A Homeland Security report released last month said the program needs improvement, and some policies 'may have dissuaded pilots from participating.'"

TSA Screeners To Get AMBER Alerts. USA Today (2/8, 3A, Frank, 2.27M) reports the TSA announced Wednesday that its "43,000 airport security screeners will get notices and photos of abducted children as part of the AMBER Alert network's quest to find missing people. … 'The goal is to get that (alert) to TSA officers within minutes,' said Gale Rossides, a TSA associate administrator. Screeners 'meet so many children every day, they may actually notice something that's out of character with a child.'" Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, said the effort "is the first time AMBER Alerts will go directly to airports."

House Democrats Insist On Physical Screening Of All Air Cargo. The New York Times (2/8, Lipton, 1.16M) reports the handling of cargo stored on commercial aircraft "has set off an intense debate in Congress," where "House Democrats are pushing for a requirement that, within three years, all air cargo be inspected at a level equal to that of checked baggage, at an estimated cost to the federal government of $600 million per year." However, "officials at the Transportation Security Administration said the security measures already in place for air cargo — while very different from the passenger-baggage inspection system — were sufficient to prevent a bomb from getting aboard." TSA Administrator Kip Hawley said the Democrats' proposal "could actually reduce safety…because the high cost would require other security measures to be curtailed. … 'If you put all of your resources into making something invulnerable, you end up ironically with less security,'" Hawley said.

Groups Reach Out To Wireless Firms To Craft Emergency Communications Systems. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, B1, Sharma, Schatz, 2.04M) reports "convinced that the federal government alone can't answer their concerns, public-safety groups are turning to commercial wireless companies for help" with communications systems for emergency workers. "The new Congress is taking a hard look" at a proposal that would license a section of the radio spectrum "to an entity called a Public Safety Broadband Trust. A private bidder would be selected to manage the creation of a broadband network shared by consumer cellphone users and public-safety workers such as firemen and policemen; in an emergency, public-safety users would take precedence." However, "getting any legislation through a divided Congress this year will be difficult, especially given the controversy the plan is generating in the wireless industry. Critics say it amounts to a corporate giveaway to Cyren Call," which has lobbied "feverishly" for the Public Safety Broadband Trust.

WAR NEWS:

Seven Senate GOP Centrists Threaten To Tie Up Business Over Warner Resolution. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Levey, 850K) reports seven Republican senators "threatened Wednesday to tie up Senate business until a resolution opposing President Bush's planned troop buildup gets a vote, saying they will try to attach the measure to future legislation." Sens. Norm Coleman, Susan Collins, Chuck Hagel, Gordon Smith, Olympia Snowe, John Warner, and George Voinovich "sent a letter to Senate leaders of both parties Wednesday evening." Voinovich "had not previously expressed support for the Warner measure." The Times says the "procedural gambit does not guarantee the Senate will vote any time soon on Bush's plan to send more troops into Baghdad to control sectarian violence there. But it may further complicate Senate debate on the war, just as Senate Democratic leaders seemed prepared to let the Democratic majority in the House take up the legislative challenge to the White House." McClatchy (2/8, Talev) says the letter declared, "The current stalemate is unacceptable to us and to the people of this country. We will explore all of our options."

The Washington Post (2/8, Murray, 690K), in a front-page report, says the group, "who earlier this week helped block deliberations" on the resolution, "changed course yesterday and vowed to use every tactic at their disposal to ensure a full and open debate." The letter "was not more specific about the Republican senators' strategy for reviving the war debate. But under the chamber's rules, senators have wide latitude in slowing the progress of legislation and in offering amendments, regardless of whether they have anything to do with the bill."

Roll Call (2/8, Stanton) says an "exasperated" Warner "put his colleagues on notice Wednesday that he would look to attach his resolution" to "any measure moving across the Senate floor." Warner's announcement "followed a day of angry and increasingly partisan recriminations between Senate Democrats and Republicans over who was to blame for the collapse of a planned debate on Iraq."

Novak Says McConnell Made GOP "Look Obstructionist." In his Washington Post (2/8, A21, 690K) column, Robert Novak writes, "Listening to Minority Leader Mitch McConnell boast last weekend that he had the votes to prevent closing off Senate debate on Iraq, Republicans opposing President Bush's troop surge feared the worst. The new Republican leader sounded as though he wanted to prevent passage of an anti-surge resolution at the cost of making his party look obstructionist. That's exactly what happened. The result of McConnell's tactics is that no resolution will be passed by the Senate anytime soon. The White House was overjoyed. But Tuesday's headlines indicated a public relations fiasco for Republicans."

Specter Drafting Rules Change On Amendments. Roll Call (2/8, Pierce) reports Sen. Arlen Specter, "frustrated" with Majority Leader Harry Reid's "efforts to control floor debates," said he is "drafting a rules change that would guarantee the minority the right to offer amendments to legislation on the Senate floor. Specter acknowledged that his proposal stands virtually no chance of achieving the two-thirds majority required to change Senate rules. But he said he wanted to bring attention to what he described as a growing problem with the way Reid is running the floor."

Webb Says GOP Leaders "Know They're Going To Lose." Sen. Jim Webb said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/7, Matthews), "I think the proposals that the Majority Leader put forward are good proposals and honestly, I think right now the Republican leadership just does not want a vote because they know they're going to lose."

Lieberman Moving Further Away From Democrats On Iraq. The New York Times (2/8, Zernike, 1.16M) reports that it "came as little surprise that when Senate Republicans blocked debate Monday on a resolution that would have opposed President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, erstwhile Democrat, sided with them." But Lieberman also "went further, accusing Democrats of giving strength to the enemy and abandoning the troops, and arguing that an alternative resolution that he and many Republicans backed was 'a statement of support to our troops.'" Defeated last year "in the Democratic senatorial primary in Connecticut but then elected as an independent to a fourth term, Mr. Lieberman has kept a promise to caucus with the Democrats, giving them a majority of only 51 to 49 and earning for him a designation as 'the most influential man in the Senate.'" But on Iraq, "the issue that made the last year the most difficult of his political life, he has moved farther and farther from the party, winding up to the right of many Republicans who now embrace what six months ago was almost solely a Democratic position on the war."

Yesterday, on CNN's The Situation Room (2/7, Blitzer), Lieberman said, "How we end Iraq is going to be very important to our security and our progress in the war against the Islamist terrorists who attacked us on 9/11. So, I'm supporting this latest plan, the new plan with a new general, a new secretary of defense, because I really do think it has some significant hope of working. And I'm not planning for failure. Gen. Petraeus told us when he was before the Armed Services Committee that he thought by this summer we'd have the beginning of an idea about whether this was working or not. I'm going to do everything I can to support it and I hope it does work and that we won't have to think about what's next."

House Democrats Move Toward "Stripped-Down" Resolution. Meanwhile in the House, the AP (2/7, Flaherty) reports Democratic leaders "coalesced Wednesday around a stripped-down measure that disapproves of President Bush's decision to send more forces to Iraq and declares support for the troops, according to party aides who said a vote was likely next week." Democratic officials "said they hoped for bipartisan support for the measure, and one Republican leader conceded some members of the GOP rank-and-file would likely break ranks." House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam said, "I don't think it'll be a pure party-line vote." USA Today (2/8, 7A, Kiely, 2.27M) adds that Putnam said, "It will be virtually impossible for us to defeat it." But the "question is how broad a bipartisan majority the resolution will attract. 'It totally depends on what the language is,' said Putnam."

The New York Times (2/8, Zeleny, 1.16M) says Democratic leaders in the House sought to "reconcile deep differences within the party" over the war. Seventy-one House Democrats "signed a statement urging Congress to take a stronger stance against the war, including setting a six-month timetable for withdrawing American forces from Iraq," but Democratic leaders "have said that they favor a nonbinding resolution simply requiring lawmakers to support or reject the president's policy." The Hill (2/8, Kaplan) reports Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said they "intend to pass a clean and simple resolution opposing President Bush's troop surge while supporting the soldiers in Iraq."

Gates Says US Will Know If Surge Is Working Within Months. The AP (2/8) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "told a House panel Wednesday that the US should know in a few months if the Iraqi government is making progress toward peace and whether the United States 'is going to have to look at other alternatives and consequences.'" In "stark contrast to predecessor" Donald Rumsfeld, Gates also "said there was no doubt the Army and Marine Corps needed to be larger if they are to deal with future wars and give troops enough rest between combat tours." The Washington Times (2/8, Dinan, 88K) reports Gates also "said Congress doesn't endanger troop morale by voting on nonbinding resolutions opposing President Bush's Iraq reinforcement plan." The comments "are in stark contrast to arguments made by Republicans, including the president's spokesman, Tony Snow, that a debate on resolutions could have an effect on the troops."

VoteVets.org Seizes Key Role In Surge Debate. The Washington Post (2/8, A4, Layton, Weisman, 690K) writes that the "small band of veterans" that makes up anti-Iraq war group VoteVets.org "are saying things many Democrats would like to express but can't. And as the politics heat up over the Iraq war, Democratic leaders increasingly are being drawn" to the group's chairman, Iraq veteran Jon Soltz, and his "angry soldiers. VoteVets.org appears to be the most active group trying to influence the debate about the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq."

WSJournal Chides Clinton For Move To Left On Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, 2.04M) editorializes, "One pleasant surprise of Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as New York Senator has been her tough-minded approach on national security. She responded to 9/11 by supporting President Bush's strategy of taking on not just terrorists but the states that harbor them. She also voted for the war in Iraq and has refused to follow much of her party in alleging that Mr. Bush 'lied' about weapons of mass destruction. But as Mrs. Clinton bids to win the Democratic Presidential nomination, she is taking a marked turn to the left. Pressured by other candidates and by her party's left wing, she is walking back her hawkish statements and is now all but part of the antiwar camp." The Journal runs a "summary of the arc of Mrs. Clinton's public thinking on Iraq," and concludes that "now that the war has proven to be difficult, and her fellow Democrats are outflanking her on the antiwar left, she is steadily, even rapidly, moving in their direction."

Public Debate Over Iraq Policy Seen As Deficient. In his New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) column, David Brooks says, "This week, in private, everyone acknowledges how complex the choices are. Everyone senses that the policy being promoted possibly won't work and could have ruinous consequences. This week, the mood — in private — is sober and anxious." But the "politicians have completely failed to institutionalize that sense of sobriety in the public sphere. Instead of having a serious debate, the Senate disgraced itself with mind-bendingly petty partisanship. Meanwhile, the Democratic presidential candidates engaged in an unholy bidding war to get out of Iraq soonest, which had nothing to do with realities in Iraq and everything to do with applause lines in Iowa."

Effort To Secure Baghdad, Anbar Province Now Underway. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Londoño, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The U.S. military's chief spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that US and Iraqi forces had begun a joint effort to secure Baghdad and troubled Anbar province. 'The plan is being fully implemented as we speak,' Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters after being asked when the plan would start. 'Not all aspects are in place at this point.'" The plan "is being led by Iraqi officials and is designed to stop violence in the capital's volatile neighborhoods, Caldwell said. Officials have established nine new security districts in Baghdad and are creating dozens of security stations that Iraqi police and military officers will share with U.S. military personnel."

As the new operation gets underway in Iraq, two broadcast networks ran pessimistic reports on the situation on the ground in Iraq, and suggested US troops are less optimistic than in the past. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US military announced the official start of the new security operation in Baghdad" as the AP "reports its grim new count of American casualties in Iraq: 334 American troops…were killed in combat in Iraq between the beginning of October and the end of the month of January. That number is higher than in any other four-month stretch since the war started." On ABC World News (2/7, story 2, 2:10, 8.78M), anchor Charlie Gibson asked correspondent Martha Raddatz, "I know this is trip No. 12 for you over four years. What has particularly struck you as different this time?" Raddatz replied, "I think, perhaps, the pessimism of some soldiers. I haven't really seen that in the past. Now, one officer explained it as pessimistic optimism. But I think they're very, very worried about the outcome here in Iraq. I was struck by the sense of personal safety, Charlie. I think a lot of soldiers don't think about it often. A lot of journalists who have been here don't think about it off. But this time, the soldiers were talking about it a lot."

Car Bomb Kills Ten In Baghdad. NPR (2/8) broadcast in a report, "Iraqi police say a car bomb exploded in a vegetable market in a mainly Shiite town south of Baghdad today, killing at least ten people. Police say more than 20 others were also wounded in the attack." CBS Radio (2/8) aired a similar report.

Henninger Says Troops Should Be Equipped Like US Police. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A14, 2.04M) Daniel Henninger, Pulitzer Prize winning Wall Street Journal editorial writer and editor, writes that if US troops in Iraq were equipped as well as police in our nation, then insurgents would be easier to identify, follow, and arrest. Formerly, without even fingerprint identification resources, troops wrote "down suspects' names and addresses" while some had "created their own spreadsheets and PowerPoint programs, or" used "digital cameras to input the details of suspected insurgents," because at the time "no Iraq-wide software architecture" existed. Henninger optimistically points out that, thanks to a few technically-savvy Marines and a few changes in military procurement priorities, the military has now tested and developed fingerprint and biometric identification systems soldiers can use in the ongoing fight against insurgents.

Two More US Helicopters Downed In Iraq. The New York Times (2/8, Oppel, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "With two more helicopter crashes near Baghdad, including a Marine transport crash on Wednesday that killed seven people, the number of helicopters that have gone down in Iraq over the past three weeks rose to six." US "officials say the streak strongly suggests that insurgents have adapted their tactics and are now putting more effort into shooting down the aircraft. The number also includes a previously unreported downing of a helicopter operated by a private security firm on Jan. 31." The Times adds, "Some aspects of the recent crashes indicate that insurgents have become smarter about anticipating American flight patterns and finding ways to use old weapons to down helicopters."

ABC World News (2/7, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) noted that "in the last 2 1/2 weeks, 5 US helicopters have gone down in Iraq, killing 28 Americans. Seven Marines were lost in the chopper crash today."

The CBS Evening News (2/7, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "As if it weren't already dangerous enough for US Forces in Iraq, insurgents are apparently getting much better at shooting down American aircraft." CBS (Logan) added that "CBS News has learned that" the "transport helicopter was shot down during what the military called routine operations. But before the US could announce the cause of the crash, a jihadi Website linked to Al Qaeda was already declaring victory."

NBC Nightly News (2/7, lead story, 3:10, Yang, 9.87M) said, "Military officials tell us there is so much concern about this trend that Defense Secretary Robert Gates and General Peter Pace, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff are personally reviewing the details of these crashes to see if any procedures need to be changed." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Susman, 850K), USA Today (2/8, 6A, Dorell, 2.27M) and Washington Times/AP (2/8, Reid), among other newspapers, run similar reports this morning.

Citing Breach of Contract, Army To Withhold Funds From Halliburton. The New York Times (2/8, Shenon, 1.16M) reports, "The Army announced during a House oversight committee hearing on Wednesday that it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Company after recently discovering that the contractor had hired the company Blackwater USA to provide armed security guards in Iraq, a potential breach of its government contract." The Army "has said that its contracts with Halliburton, which has a five-year, $16 billion deal to support American military operations in Iraq, generally barred the company and its subcontractors from using private armed guards. But in a statement, Halliburton disagreed with the Army's interpretation and suggested that there was nothing to prohibit Halliburton's subcontractors from hiring such guards." The announcement "came during a hearing of the House Government Oversight Committee that included emotional testimony about the killing of four Blackwater employees in Falluja." The Financial Times (2/8, Kirchgaessner) runs a similar report.

Reserve Officers, US Civilians Charged In Iraq Bid-Rigging Scheme. ABC World News (2/7, story 3, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Three former Army Reserve officers and two US civilians have been charged with taking part in a brazen bid-rigging scheme in Iraq. The reservists, while assigned to the Coalition Provisional Authority, allegedly helped to steer $8.6 million in Iraq reconstruction projects to one contractor. And in return, the contractor allegedly paid more than $1 million in bribes."

The Washington Post (2/8, A17, Merle, 690K) notes "three of the central characters in the scheme have pleaded guilty. Robert J. Stein, a former Coalition Provisional Authority employee, was sentenced last month to nine years in prison and ordered to forfeit millions of dollars for his role in steering contracts to businessman Philip H. Bloom. Lt. Bruce D. Hopfengardner also admitted to steering contracts to Bloom for money and a Harley-Davidson motorcycle." Bloom "pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bribery and money-laundering charges last year." The "alleged fraud scheme is the largest to emerge out of the Iraq reconstruction effort."

NYTimes Celebrates Congressional Oversight. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) editorializes, "The details are graphic: billions of dollars of Iraqi oil revenues -- 363 tons of cash -- bundled up and urgently flown to Baghdad on 484 pallets from the Federal Reserve Bank to jump-start a new Iraqi government. Four years later, the unanswered questions are just as graphic: Who was responsible for the money? What became of it? ... The details emerging provide a lesson in how easily cash can evaporate into the fog of an unmonitored war. … Republican lawmakers at the hearing again tried to gloss over the administration's mismanagement of the war, complaining that the mystery billions were 'old news.' The real news is that -- at long last -- the truth about the Iraq fiasco is being pursued in public by Congressional investigators."

Families Of US Contractors Killed In Iraq Appear Before House Panel. ABC World News (2/7, story 4, 3:05, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "Incompetence, cutting corners, overbilling and cover-up were the themes today, as the families of the four contractors killed in Fallujah finally got someone's attention in Washington. Now, three years after those gruesome killings, the families of dead men say the company they worked for, Blackwater USA, has tried to cover up what led to the tragedy." ABC added that during a hearing before the House Government Oversight Committee, it came out that "the men, all former military, got lost as they escorted a convoy of trucks carrying kitchen equipment. The families told Congress they have discovered their men were sent out by Blackwater in unarmored cars, without automatic weapons, no maps and no tail gunners as promised."

NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 7, 2:30, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "The committee produced this e-mail from the day before the attack. An urgent appeal from Blackwater's Iraq manager for more ammo, more powerful guns, body armor: 'I've requested hard or armored cars from the beginning.' Today, a Blackwater official said the company cares about the safety of employees. And that these men, had adequate equipment."

Mistrial Declared In Watada Court-Martial. ABC World News (2/7, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "At Fort Lewis, the judge overseeing the court-martial of an Army Lieutenant who refused to deploy to Iraq declared a mistrial today." Lieutenant Aaron Watada "signed a document admitting some of the charges. The judge ruled he didn't understand what he was signing and a retrial is expected in March."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Verhovek, 850K) reports the decision "left military prosecutors visibly stunned." The ruling by the judge, Lt. Col. John Head "turned on the contentious issue of whether factual stipulations agreed to earlier by the prosecutors and the defense team amounted to a confession of guilt." Prosecutors "argued, in effect, that Watada did confess to refusing direct orders to fly to Iraq with his unit last summer, and that his reasons were irrelevant." Watada "said he had admitted to the fact that he deliberately missed his flight, but that he did so because he considered the war illegal -- and wanted to explain his reasoning at the trial." The New York Times (2/8, Oppel, Glanz, 1.16M) runs a similar report.

El Paso Corp. Agrees To $7.7 Million Oil-For-Food Probe Settlement. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Neumeister) reports, "The nation's largest natural gas pipeline company agreed to pay the federal government $7.7 million to settle corruption allegations related to the U.N. oil-for-food scandal over aid to Iraq, according to a settlement announced Wednesday. El Paso Corp. will forfeit $5.48 million to the United States, which will seek to transfer the money to the Development Fund of Iraq to be paid as restitution for the benefit of the people of Iraq, according to the agreement announced by federal prosecutors and the FBI. In a separate deal with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Houston-based company will pay an additional $2.25 million." The AP notes that "El Paso will not be prosecuted for any crimes except possibly criminal tax violations as long as it continues to continue cooperating fully with the federal government in its investigation into the scandal-ridden U.N. oil-for-food program."

US Trying To Prevent Quick Hanging For Former Saddam VP. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A4, Bravin, 2.04M) reports, "US officials are working to spare Saddam Hussein's former vice president from a rapid trip to the Iraqi gallows, fearful that his execution, following the flawed hangings of Mr. Hussein and a co-defendant, could further damage the credibility of the American-backed government." The former vice president, Taha Yassin Ramadan, "was among seven officials -- including Mr. Hussein -- convicted in November by the Iraqi High Tribunal, an Iraqi-run court established by the U.S. to try members of the ousted regime."

US Marine To Face Trial In Italian Court. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports in a trial that "is straining relations" between the US and Italy, "an American Marine was ordered to stand trial in Italy in connection with the shooting death of a top Italian intelligence agent in Iraq in 2005. But the trial, set for April 17 in Rome, is likely to occur without the defendant. United States officials cleared the Marine, Specialist Mario Lozano, of any wrongdoing in the death of the agent, Nicola Calipari" who, at the time of his death, "had just secured the release of an Italian journalist, Giuliana Sgrena, who was kidnapped in Baghdad."

$7M To Be Paid By El Paso in Oil-For-Food Settlement. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports that "the El Paso Corporation, the largest American natural gas pipeline operator, agreed Wednesday to pay the federal government $7.73 million to settle allegations of involvement in illegal payments under the oil-for-food program run by the United Nations in Iraq." El Paso "will forfeit $5.48 million under a settlement with federal prosecutors in New York" which is the "amount…of secret surcharges paid to Saddam Hussein's government by third parties from whom El Paso purchased oil." The Securities and Exchange Commission has also sought "a civil penalty of $2.25 million" because they allege El Paso "had bought about 21.4 million barrels of Iraqi crude oil from third parties participating in the program;" a program "that more than 4,500 companies had taken part and that more than half had paid kickbacks," according to former Federal Reserve chairman Paul A. Volcker.

Gates Holds NATO To Its Promise To Boost Help In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports that Defense Secretary Robert Gates will join NATO defense ministers in Seville on Thursday "to discuss ways to confront an expected Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, amid growing American pressure for the allies to commit more troops and resources" to the growing unrest and terrorist activity in the region. During the "two days of informal talks," members "will also discuss developments in Kosovo, where tensions are quietly simmering over its future status." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "and NATO's new military chief, Gen. Bantz J. Craddock…face a baptism of fire with their first official meeting" where Gates plans "to prod his partners to supply the promised troops and military equipment for the 35,000-strong NATO-led International Security Assistance Force." According to one anonymous senior American defense official, General Craddock has "drawn up a new set of requirements for the Afghan mission that would be discussed at the meeting in Seville."

DOJ:

Emanuel Wants Dismissed US Attorney Named Special Counsel In Cunningham Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Paltrow) reports, "Democrats have signaled they aren't dropping the controversy over what they describe as the Bush administration's 'firing' of federal prosecutors." House Democratic Caucus Chair Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-IL) "yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, demanding that he appoint the recently fired U.S. Attorney in San Diego as a special counsel so that she can continue overseeing a congressional corruption probe." The Journal adds, "Carol Lam, appointed in 2002 as San Diego U.S. Attorney, was among at least seven U.S. attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department. Ms. Lam supervised the investigation and prosecution of Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, now in federal prison for soliciting bribes. That case led to related investigations, including inquiries into a businessman who also had dealings with Rep. Jerry Lewis, the California Republican who until recently was chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, and into Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo, the former third-ranking official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Both individuals deny any wrongdoing." The Journal notes, "In his letter, Mr. Emanuel said, 'As you are aware, there are many questions surrounding the recent dismissal of seven U.S. Attorneys, including whether or not your office has the authority to dismiss these individuals, and if their firings were politically motivated.' … The Justice Department has said most of the prosecutors in question were asked to leave because of poor performance. It has strongly denied any intent to derail investigations. A spokeswoman said the Justice Department wouldn't comment specifically on Mr. Emanuel's letter because it hadn't received it. 'As a general matter,' she said, 'U.S. attorneys leave office for all sorts of reasons, and complex and important cases carry on with no interruption by the career prosecutors who manage them. There is no reason to suggest that any ongoing cases in San Diego would be any different.'"

The Hill (2/8, Crabtree) reports, "Lam was one of seven U.S. attorneys the Justice Department asked to resign late last year, using a little-known provision in the USA Patriot Act that allows Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors on an indefinite basis. At the time of her dismissal, Lam was investigating whether the Cunningham case involved other members of Congress and lobbyists." The Hill adds, "Beyond Cunningham, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego sent a flurry of subpoenas for records to three congressional committees in late December. According to a Democratic leadership aide, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has been working with the House General Counsel's office and was 'close to a deal' last week with the assistant U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego on whether to comply with those subpoenas — and, if the papers were handed over, which documents to include." The Hill notes, "In a letter sent to Gonzales yesterday, Emanuel argued that keeping Lam on as an outside counsel would allow the Bush administration to dispel questions about whether Lam's firing was politically motivated. … Emanuel highlighted Lam's record on crime and immigration prosecutions to counter explanations that she was asked to leave because she was not prosecuting enough of these cases."

Former Washington US Attorney Says He Was Ordered To Resign. The AP (2/8, Johnson) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney John McKay told The Associated Press on Wednesday that his resignation last month was ordered by the Bush administration, which gave him no explanation for the firing. … 'I was ordered to resign as U.S. attorney on Dec. 7 by the Justice Department,' McKay, who had led the department's Western Washington office, said in a telephone interview from Washington, D.C. 'I was given no explanation. I certainly was told of no performance issues.'" The AP continues, "McKay previously had said only that he was resigning because it was time for him to move on. His comments came one day after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty acknowledged to the Senate Judiciary Committee that the Justice Department has fired seven U.S. attorneys in the West in the past year, most of them for 'performance-related' reasons he would not divulge." The AP adds, "The dismissals have been heavily criticized by Democratic lawmakers. … 'John McKay has worked diligently for our region and it is deeply disconcerting that he could have been let go for political reasons,' said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash. 'Congress and the American people have no tolerance for the politicization of the U.S. attorney's office.'" The AP notes, "Robert Lasnik, the chief U.S. District Court judge for the Western District of Washington, said he and his fellow judges could not understand the firing and were dismayed that the Justice Department implied there was anything wrong with McKay's performance. … 'This is unanimous among the judges: John McKay was a superb U.S. attorney,' Lasnik said. 'For the Justice Department to suggest otherwise is just not fair.' … 'By every measure, the performance of his office improved during his tenure,' Lasnik added. 'If you talk to local prosecutors, or local sheriffs, or the FBI or the ATF, they never had the kind of service from the U.S. attorney's office in terms of service, cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under John McKay's leadership. We're busier than ever before because they're bringing more cases.'"

McKay Got Positive Review Seven Months Before Ouster. The Seattle Times (2/8, Bowermaster) reports, "Seven months before he was forced to resign as U.S. attorney for the western district of Washington, John McKay received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators. … 'McKay is an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the [U.S. attorney's office] and the District's law enforcement community,' the team of 27 Justice Department officials concluded, according to a copy of their final report obtained by The Seattle Times." The Times continues, "Yet on Dec. 7, Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, called McKay and asked him to step down. … 'I was told to resign by the end of January,' McKay confirmed Wednesday. 'I asked what the reason was, and they told me there was none. … Ultimately, I serve at the pleasure of the president,' McKay said. 'I accept that now and I accepted that then, and that's why I resigned.'" The Times adds, "McKay's revelation came one day after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate judiciary committee that six U.S. attorneys had been asked to resign in December for 'performance-related' issues. … Democrats convened the hearing to express concerns that the White House was purging U.S. attorneys, either to replace them with political loyalists or to penalize them for cases they prosecuted. … McNulty denied both assertions at the hearing. … Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., was not satisfied. … 'I would like the Justice Department to inform me exactly what it means by "performance-related" reasons and reassure me that Mr. McKay was not dismissed solely on the basis of partisan politics,' Murray wrote in a letter to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who chairs the judiciary committee. Tasia Scolinos, director of public affairs for the Department of Justice, said the department would not confirm whether McKay was asked to step down, or why. … 'The department appreciates John's commitment to the job and the important work done during his tenure as U.S. attorney,' Scolinos said."

Senators Mull Changing Patriot Act Provision On US Attorneys. Congress Daily (2/8, Talbott) reports, "Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter, R-Pa., Tuesday said he would support a bid to reverse a provision in the USA PATRIOT Act that helped facilitate what Democrats charge was the improper dismissal of seven U.S. attorneys." Congress Daily continues, "Denying an accusation by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that the provision was 'slipped into the PATRIOT Act in the dead of night' on his watch, Specter said he discovered it recently and agreed 'We ought to change it back to what it was.' … The provision authorizes the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods." Congress Daily adds, "A bill by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. to change the appointment procedure is scheduled to be voted on in the committee Wednesday."

Friends Praise New Arkansas US Attorney. The Arkansas Democrat & Gazette (2/8, Barton) reports, "Ask friends of new U. S. Attorney Tim Griffin to describe the 38-year-old prosecutor, and they gush adjectives. They call him 'driven,' 'conscientious, ' 'highly intelligent' and fiercely loyal to his home state of Arkansas." The D&G continues, "Rep. John Boozman, the lone Republican in the Arkansas delegation, is typical: 'He's a very smart guy and very hard worker. He's done great no matter where he has been.' … But outside the circle of Griffin's friends and many of the state's prominent conservatives, Griffin remains something of a mystery. … 'I don't know many people who know anything about him,' veteran Little Rock attorney Scott Trotter said. When Griffin, a Magnolia native, was appointed to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas in December, 'we just sort of scratched our heads.'" The D&G adds, "Said Arkansas' senior senator, Democrat Blanche Lincoln, 'I really didn't know much about him, aside from what I read about him in the newspaper and what I found on Google.' … Griffin's political resume — key player in both of President Bush's campaigns, deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove — is better known than his legal resume. Many saw his appointment as forcing out the popular Bud Cummins in order to reward a campaign operative. … Cummins was not among them. … He, too, was a loyal Republican and Bush backer when he was appointed in 2001. To replace him with Griffin, Cummins has said, was 'entirely within the prerogative of the White House.'"

More Commentary. The Denver Post (2/8) editorializes, "The dismissals of at least seven U.S. attorneys in the West is a vivid reminder of just how far the Bush administration will go to circumvent Congress." The Post continues, "The firings will have a chilling effect on all federal prosecutors, as McNulty well knows. U.S. attorneys should be empowered to pursue justice wherever the road takes them. They certainly shouldn't fear for their jobs because the administration wants to reward the well-connected, or because their exercise of judgment could be seen as unwelcome independence. … Congress should act quickly to reinstate time limits on interim U.S. attorney appointments, a move supported by Specter and many other lawmakers. Scrutiny of these appointments will protect the country from nominees whose fidelity is to the White House instead of the Constitution."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/8) editorializes, "The Justice Department had a chance to defend its dismissal of H.E. Cummins III, the United States attorney for Eastern Arkansas, along with six other U.S. attorneys across the country. Apparently the move was indefensible. … Offered a chance to explain the move at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing this week, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty said he knew of no complaints about Cummins' service. … This after Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said: 'I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation.' … Could the credibility of the administration get worse?" The Appeal adds, "The losers here go beyond Cummins and the Senate, which didn't get a chance to vet Cummins' replacement because of a little-known provision of last year's reauthorization of the Patriot Act that allows the White House to circumvent the Senate approval process with open-ended interim appointments. The people of Eastern Arkansas have lost a capable federal prosecutor with a formidable record of public service. … Griffin could turn out to be capable as well. But he enters office under a cloud of doubt, created by an administration that has manipulated the Patriot Act to consolidate presidential power to an unprecedented degree."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Attorneys Claim Impasse Over Nacchio Evidence. The Denver Post (2/8, Vuong) reports, "The Department of Justice said in a new court filing that it is at an impasse with attorneys for former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio over how the parties will handle the introduction of certain classified information during the course of his criminal insider trading trial." The Post continues, "Nacchio's attorneys have said they plan to use classified information to defend him against 42 counts of illegal insider trading." The Post adds, "Prosecutors said in the filing that an unnamed government agency believes its identity will be disclosed under the defense's proposed handling of certain top-secret information. … 'The agency believes that the defendant's proposals, if adopted, will reveal the agency's identity,' Justice Department attorneys wrote in the filing. … The government asked U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham to rule on its proposed handling of the information. … A hearing is scheduled for Thursday."

The AP (2/8, Shore) reports, "Prosecutors say they are at an impasse with former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio's attorneys over the best way to describe some of the classified material to be used at his trial on insider trading charges." The AP continues, "The evidence includes government documents that must be withheld from the public under federal law. Attorneys for both sides have been working on substitute explanations for the documents that can be made public without violating the law." The AP adds, "Representatives of a federal agency have said they believe a description proposed by defense attorneys will reveal the agency's identity, prosecutor Leo Wise said. … 'After discussions between the parties, it now appears that the parties are at an impasse on this issue,' Wise wrote in a brief filed late Tuesday." The AP notes, "The brief was filed the same day Nacchio's attorneys sought a 60-day postponement in the trial, contending prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that Nacchio's rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts as scheduled. … At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed. … Defense attorney Herbert Stern told Nottingham that he needs the additional time to evaluate material that prosecutors have turned over in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of documents that Stern said he was made aware of Monday. … Prosecutors have countered that evidence exchange has been hampered because of the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets strict guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts."

Judge Seen Unlikely To Dismiss Brocade Fraud Charges. The California Recorder (2/8, Scheck) reports, "The initial casualties of the government's massive stock option backdating probe had their first chance to try to get their cases thrown out of court on Wednesday. … But after an hour of arguments, it seemed unlikely that U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer would dismiss some of the fraud counts against former Brocade Communications CEO Gregory Reyes and ex-HR manager Stephanie Jensen." The Recorder continues, "The motion to dismiss seven criminal counts is part of a two-pronged effort -- made possible by Breyer's insistence that criminal and civil government cases proceed together -- to gut criminal and civil SEC charges accusing the defendants of backdating employee stock options to recruit and retain top talent during the dot-com boom. … The other prong, a motion for summary judgment on the civil side, was filed late Monday." The Recorder adds, "At Wednesday's hearing, a lawyer for Reyes -- Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom partner Christopher Gunther -- argued that an August decision by the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals should invalidate seven counts in the indictment. Reyes is indicted on 12 counts and Jensen on eight. Gunther's energetic presentation included a chalkboard drawing and a stroll across the courtroom to display how far 'out on a limb' prosecutors were going with their case. … The opinion he cited, U.S. v. Brown, 2006 WL 2130525, found that a person cannot be convicted on charges of denial of honest services if he or she was acting in the best interests of the company. … And, Gunther said, the government's indictment says that Reyes and Jensen manipulated options grants not for their own gain, but to benefit the company." The Recorder notes, "Breyer seemed interested in the Brown arguments and asked the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal, whether the Department of Justice had decided how to deal with the case's fallout. … 'Right now, the only policy I'm aware of, your honor, is that Brown was wrongly decided,' Steskal said. He also told the judge that it's possible that later in the case, when the government produces its evidence, it could offer support for behavior that would involve self-dealing. … In the end, Breyer seemed inclined to not dismiss the indictments -- at least not right away -- since the honest services issues could be revisited later in the case."

Delaware Ruling In Maxim Case Opens Door To Shareholder Options Suits. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A7, Jones, Maremont) reports, "An influential Delaware judge issued a strongly worded opinion that could open the doors to more shareholder derivative lawsuits against companies alleged to have backdated stock options."

The Journal continues, "William Chandler, chancellor of the Delaware Court of Chancery, ruled Tuesday that certain claims brought by a shareholder of Maxim Integrated Products, Inc., a Sunnyvale, Calif., chip maker, against several current and former board members could go forward despite defendants' objections. … Separately, Maxim last week said an internal probe overseen by a special committee of its board found backdating of options to its employees and directors, though options for top officers were 'properly granted.' The company said it expects to restate results back to at least 2000." The Journal adds, "The suit, brought by Walter E. Ryan, is called a derivative suit, in which a shareholder technically sues on behalf of the corporation itself. To file a successful derivative suit, a plaintiff generally must first ask the board to remedy the alleged problem. But that requirement may not apply if a plaintiff can raise a reason to doubt that board members were complicit in the alleged behavior. … Defendants moved to dismiss the case on a variety of grounds, among them that Mr. Ryan had failed to take the backdating issue to the board. Chancellor Chandler denied the motion on that point, ruling that because 'one half of the current board members approved each challenged transaction,' the requirement to ask for board approval wasn't necessary."

Former Siemens Official Reportedly Cooperating With German Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A11, Esterl, Crawford) reports, "A former Siemens AG executive alleged to have negotiated a $50 million payment to cover up bribes in Saudi Arabia is cooperating with German authorities, according to people familiar with the matter. … The executive's assistance could lend momentum to a widening international investigation into alleged corruption at the German conglomerate." The Journal continues, "Police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several suspects. Prosecutors suspect senior Siemens employees set up sham consulting contracts to bribe potential customers. … Siemens is cooperating with prosecutors. The company said in December it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions spanning seven years." The Journal adds, "The prosecutor's office in Munich yesterday said it released a former Siemens employee who had turned himself in for questioning last week. … It would only identify the witness as 'J.-C.S.,' adding that the person had traveled to Germany from Argentina and made extensive statements to authorities. … People familiar with the situation said the witness -- who is also a suspect -- is Juan-Carlos Stotz, 43 years old, a former telecommunications-equipment executive suspended late last year by Siemens. … Mr. Stotz allegedly helped broker a $50 million settlement in 2004 with a Saudi consulting firm that had threatened to forward documents to U.S. authorities detailing bribes paid on the German company's behalf, according to another key suspect cooperating with German authorities."

Banks Suffer From Misjudging Mortgage Risks. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Mollenkamp) reports, "When the U.S. housing market was booming, HSBC Holdings PLC raced to join the party. Sensing opportunity in the bottom end of the mortgage market, the giant British bank bet big on borrowers with sketchy credit records. … Such subprime customers have always been risky, but HSBC figured it could control that risk. In 2005 and 2006, it bought billions of dollars of subprime loans from other lenders, lured by the higher interest rates they carry." The Journal continues, "Now, the party is over for HSBC -- and for lots of other bankers who aimed to cash in on the housing boom of the first half of this decade. When interest rates ticked up and the market cooled, HSBC reached a disconcerting conclusion: Its systems for screening subprime borrowers and for assessing the default risk they posed were flawed. … Many of those loans have soured, sometimes quickly. The percentage of HSBC mortgages more than 60 days past due is climbing. Fraud by borrowers has been higher than expected." The Journal adds, "In a surprise announcement late yesterday, HSBC said its subprime-mortgage problem was worse than previously indicated. It said the capital it sets aside to cover all bad debts, including the soured mortgages, would be 20%, or $1.76 billion, higher than analysts' consensus estimates. … HSBC's mortgage woes provide a window into the economic hangover brought on by the end of the housing boom. In recent months, mortgage bankers have taken a place beside home builders, condominium developers and real-estate agents, all of them struggling to adjust to a new housing landscape."

her role in H-P's board-investigation scandal." The Journal continues, "Mr. Holston, 44 years old, is a partner at the law firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP. He led H-P's internal review of the leak investigation and has worked with H-P as external counsel for more than a decade, H-P said. His new responsibilities will include the company's legal affairs in addition to other areas such as compliance, privacy and ethics. … In a statement, Chief Executive Mark Hurd said 'Mike is a first-rate lawyer, with extensive trial and government-relations experience.'" The Journal adds, "In September, H-P disclosed that external investigators retained by the company had used pretexting -- gaining access to private phone records through false pretences -- to spy on board members, employees, reporters and others in an investigation to ferret out boardroom leaks. The scandal resulted in the resignation of Patricia Dunn as chairman and investigations by several government agencies. … That month, Mr. Hurd asked Morgan Lewis to conduct an independent review of its leak investigation. Mr. Holston conducted the review and reported directly to Mr. Hurd. Another law firm had initially investigated the affair on behalf of the board. … Mr. Holston told reporters in September that Mr. Hurd attended a July 2005 meeting at which a summary of the first phase of the leak investigation was discussed, but Mr. Holston didn't specify if pretexting was mentioned in the meeting. Mr. Hurd also received a report on the investigation in March 2006 that explained pretexting but contained assurances that the tactics were legal, Mr. Holston disclosed. Mr. Hurd said he didn't read the report. … Fallout from the scandal included criminal charges by the California attorney general against Ms. Dunn, who pleaded not guilty. Ms. Baskins, was never charged. She declined to testify as part of a congressional investigation into the matter."

Judge Denies Request For Accelerated Trial Date For Former Fannie Mae Chief. The Washington Post (2/8, Hilzenrath) reports, "A judge yesterday rejected former Fannie Mae chief executive Franklin D. Raines's request that the government be compelled to begin a trial this month on administrative charges that he manipulated the company's earnings." The Post continues, "Accelerating such an extensive case 'would be nothing short of an absurdity,' administrative law Judge William B. Moran said at a scheduling conference. … Raines had argued that he was entitled to have the proceeding begin within 60 days of the filing of charges, which occurred in December." The Post adds, "The federal agency that filed the charges, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, had proposed a timetable that left the trial date open but gave the parties until nearly the end of this year to file pretrial statements. … Noting that Raines and other former Fannie Mae executives are seeking millions of pages of government documents for use in their defense, the judge said Raines's position was 'specious and somewhat disingenuous.' … Citing a Supreme Court decision in a previous case, the judge said the statute required that the scheduling conference, not the evidentiary hearing, occur within 60 days of the filing of charges. In future arguments, Moran warned, lawyers in the case should tell the court about case law that runs contrary to their positions. … Kevin Downey, an attorney for Raines, told the judge that if the trial begins this month, the burden on the defense would be comparable to the burden on the regulators. This week, a spokesman for Raines framed the request for a February trial date as an issue of fairness."

US Indicts Five In Iraq Contracting Scam. The AP (2/8, Jordan) reports, "Three U.S. Army Reserve officers were indicted Wednesday, accused of taking part in a bid-rigging scam that steered millions of dollars for Iraq reconstruction projects to a contractor in exchange for cash, luxury cars and jewelry." The AP continues, "An American businessman in Romania was charged as the go-between for the military officers and the contractor. The husband of one of the reservists was accused of helping smuggle tens of thousands of dollars into the United States that the couple used to pay for a deck and a hot tub at their New Jersey house. … Together, the five used the $26 billion Iraqi rebuilding fund 'as their own personal ATM machines,' Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in announcing the charges. … 'These defendants actually took bricks of stolen cash ... and smuggled them out of Iraq and back to the United States for their own personal use,' McNulty said." The AP adds, "The 25-count indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in New Jersey, marks the latest development in an investigation of $8.6 million in Iraq contracts awarded to construction mogul Philip H. Bloom. … Bloom, an American citizen who ran construction and services companies under Global Business Group, has admitted to laundering at least $2 million that was stolen from reconstruction funds managed by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. He awaits sentencing. … McNulty said the five people indicted Wednesday stole or otherwise misused $3.6 million from the CPA fund."

USA Today (2/8, 6A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Col. Curtis Whiteford of Riverton, Utah, Lt. Col. Debra Harrison of Trenton, N.J., and Lt. Col. Michael Wheeler of Amherst Junction, Wis., allegedly rigged the bids for more than 27 projects for businessman Philip Bloom, according to a 25-count indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Trenton. … More indictments are expected as the investigation continues into contract corruption in Iraq, said Stuart Bowen, special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction." US News & World Report (7/7, Ragavan) noted on its Web site, "The indictment accuses the defendants and coconspirators of steering at least 27 CPA construction projects in Iraq to Bloom and his companies through a 'rigged bidding process,' overpaying Bloom for his services by more than $8 million, structuring the contracts to Bloom in amounts under $500,000, the dollar limit of all contracting officers' authority, and conspiring to avoid scrutiny by the CPA's contract review board and auditors."

Citing Breach of Contract, Army To Withhold Funds From Halliburton. The New York Times (2/8, Shenon, 1.16M) reports, "The Army announced during a House oversight committee hearing on Wednesday that it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Company after recently discovering that the contractor had hired the company Blackwater USA to provide armed security guards in Iraq, a potential breach of its government contract." The Army "has said that its contracts with Halliburton, which has a five-year, $16 billion deal to support American military operations in Iraq, generally barred the company and its subcontractors from using private armed guards. But in a statement, Halliburton disagreed with the Army's interpretation and suggested that there was nothing to prohibit Halliburton's subcontractors from hiring such guards."

Russert Contradicts Libby On Key Conversation. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 3, 3:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported that at the trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, "the prosecution put its key witness on the stand today," NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert. NBC (O'Donnell) added, "Like so many Washington stories about scandal, what this case really boils down to is an alleged cover-up going back to the start of the war. … What happened at court today pits the man who was Vice President Cheney's closest advisor against a national known journalist," and "Russert's testimony is pivotal to the prosecution because it contradicts what Libby said to a grand jury. Under oath, Libby said it was Russert who first told him about a CIA operative named Valerie Wilson. … But today, Russert told the jury that never happened: 'That would be impossible because I didn't know who that person was until several days later.' … But Libby's lawyer, Ted Wells, in lengthy, sometimes prickly questioning, challenged Russert's memory and pressed him on why as a journalist he had not used the call to get information from Libby." Russert "told the jury that he treated the call as a complaint and not as a conversation with a high level government source."

ABC World News (2/7, story 6, Gibson, 8.78M) called Russert's appearance "crucial testimony," and the CBS Evening News (2/7, story 4, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) noted that the trial "has Washington insiders riveted and the rest of us scratching our heads." CBS (Borger) added, "The courtroom testimony so far has provided a rare view inside a White House under fire during the lead up to the war in Iraq. It's not pretty. Top advisors squabbling in the West Wing, leaked secrets, faulty memories. All part of a full-blown damage control operation apparently led by the Vice President himself." Russert testified that his discussion with Libby "was more of a viewer complaint call. Russert said, 'If I had been told that, I would have remembered it.' Vice President Cheney could take the stand in Libby's defense, but he may also need to answer some questions about himself and whether he directly controlled a White House effort to discredit a political enemy."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Apuzzo) reports, "Russert originally told the FBI that he couldn't rule out discussing Wilson with Libby but had no recollection of it, according to an FBI report Wells read in court. Russert said Wednesday he did not believe he said that. Russert also acknowledged that in November 2003, shortly after the investigation began, that he told an FBI agent that he had not discussed Wilson's wife with Libby." The Washington Post (2/8, A4, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) notes that Russert was "the final, and perhaps most critical, prosecution witness," and adds, "In 11 minutes of direct testimony, Russert offered a vivid description of his telephone call with Libby, and said it rapidly 'evolved into a consumer complaint.' Russert said Libby…was upset that 'Hardball' host Chris Matthews had said in two broadcasts that the vice president was responsible for Wilson's mission to Niger for the CIA and had made negative remarks about Libby. 'What the hell is going on with "Hardball"?' Russert quoted Libby as having asked him. 'Damn it. I'm tired of hearing my name over and over again. What is being said is not true.' In addition to testifying that he had not mentioned Plame to Libby, Russert said that Libby did not bring her up, either.

The New York Times (2/8, Lewis, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "Mr. Russert, whose signature technique in interrogating officials on his television program includes confronting them with documents and texts of previous quotes, found the technique used on him. A defense lawyer displayed documents on a large television screen in the courtroom as he challenged Mr. Russert's recollection of events. The cross-examination is expected to conclude on Thursday." Meanwhile, "white-collar criminal defense lawyers" yesterday "said Mr. Fitzgerald's case lacked emotional appeal, but gave the jurors an uncluttered and convincing story of wrongdoing. Defense efforts to trap prosecution witnesses in contradictions and memory lapses had probably helped Mr. Libby, the lawyers said, although they expressed doubt that the effort had jelled into a plausible explanation of Mr. Libby's conduct."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Perez, 2.04M) reports, "Also, yesterday in court, Mr. Libby's taped testimony revealed that in 2003, as controversy ensued over the Wilson criticism, Mr. Cheney ordered Mr. Libby to leak portions of an intelligence report, which said that Iraq 'vigorously' sought to procure uranium for its weapons program, to The Wall Street Journal. Mr. Libby said he asked Paul Wolfowitz, then deputy Defense Secretary, to leak parts of the report to an editor of the paper's opinion page. … A July 17, 2003, Journal editorial criticized Mr. Wilson's claims, citing the intelligence report, which was made public after the editorial was published."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Schmitt, 850K) and Financial Times (2/8, Daniel) also report on Russert's testimony, and the Washington Post (2/8, C1, Kurtz, 690K) reports, "With the perjury trial…hanging in the balance, the 'Meet the Press' inquisitor -- the man who puts all those quotations up on the screen and presses politicians about contradictions and evasions -- found himself on the receiving end of a tough cross-examination. Russert emerged relatively unscathed yesterday, except for a previously acknowledged memory lapse about a phone call unrelated to the Libby case. But it was a long afternoon for someone who much prefers asking the questions."

On Fox News' Special Report With Brit Hume (2/7), Fred Barnes said, "Obviously, the testimony made by Tim Russert was not helpful to the Libby defense," but "there have been any number of other witnesses who have had very, very fuzzy memories. Just this week, we had an FBI agent, Debra Bond, come back and say well, she had mis-testified the week before when she said it was Karl Rove who originally told columnist Robert Novak about Valerie Plame," and "that is, I think, the core of the defense case, 'Look at all these other people, they couldn't remember correctly, either. And why would you expect scooter Libby to?'"

The AP (2/8, Yost) reports, "Russert's much-anticipated version of the July 2003 telephone conversation is important to the case because Libby told the grand jury that his conversation with Russert was the first time the White House aide had heard about Wilson's wife. He later said he had forgotten that Vice President Dick Cheney had told him about Wilson's wife a month earlier." The AP continues, "Defense attorneys want to know who negotiated the agreement to get Russert's testimony and other details, including any interaction with Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan, who oversaw the grand jury that indicted Libby. … In a court filing, prosecutors said that nothing in the government's possession is inconsistent with Russert's statements in the investigation. Prosecutors said they've already provided Libby's lawyers with details of Russert's cooperation." The AP notes, "At the start of the trial, jurors were told that Russert was only questioned for 22 minutes, that he was not required to make a grand jury appearance and that prosecutors failed to ask Russert a number of important questions. … 'You're going to see that Tim Russert had a deal,' the jury was told by the defense during opening statements. … Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald says prosecutors' dealings with Russert had to conform to Justice Department guidelines, which require greater caution when dealing with journalists as opposed to other witnesses."

Bloomberg (2/8, Asseo) reports, "Prosecutors are near completion of their case in Libby's trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton told defense lawyers to be prepared to begin presenting evidence tomorrow. … Potential defense witnesses include Cheney, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward and other journalists." Bloomberg adds, "Wells sought to show that Russert has previously displayed a faulty memory, pointing to a letter he wrote to the Buffalo News acknowledging he forgot that he had called a News columnist to dispute an article about Russert's performance in moderating a debate by presidential candidates in 2000. … Wells also questioned how Russert could have talked to an FBI investigator in November 2003 about his conversation with Libby and later resisted a subpoena to testify before a grand jury. … In speaking to the FBI investigator, 'the focus was on my words, my words, not Mr. Libby's words,' Russert said, adding that he didn't reveal anything Libby said in confidence."

Libby Told Grand Jury Cheney Seemed Surprised By Plame Revelation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Yost) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney seemed surprised in 2003 when told where his chief of staff had learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame. 'From me?' Cheney asked, tilting his head, according to" Libby's grand jury testimony. "Libby's account of the conversation came near the end of nearly eight hours of audiotapes of his 2004 grand jury testimony that prosecutors finished playing at his trial Wednesday. Libby describes finding in his own handwritten notes a reference to Cheney saying in mid-June 2003 that the wife of war critic Joseph Wilson worked at the CIA. The reference by Cheney was more than a month before Plame was outed in a newspaper column."

Conference Panel Addresses Internet Threats To Children. CNET News (2/8, Ogg) reports, "The amount of unwanted sexual material that teens and preteens are exposed to on the Internet has skyrocketed in recent years, yet only a fraction of those children are likely to report it to an adult." CNET continues, "Those were among the concerns voiced Wednesday by members of a panel discussion here at the RSA Security Conference called 'Pandora's Box: Youth and the Internet.' The panel, which featured a journalist, pediatrician, federal law enforcement official and a security expert, threw out similarly scary statistics and invited the tech community to help find a solution to children's exposure to pornography as well as the prevalence of child pornography." CNET adds, "One in seven children between 10 and 17 have received an online sexual solicitation, according to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. In what may be even more disheartening to parents, NCMEC says only 27 percent of kids that received unwanted sexual material online are likely to report it to a parent or guardian. This can include receiving sexually explicit photos or videos, or an invitation to meet someone. … The type of material on the Internet and the threat of child sexual predation is increasingly dangerous, said Drew Oosterbaan, the Department of Justice's chief of the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section. The exploitation of children in the last eight to 10 years has seen 'an amazingly scary escalation of abuse,' Oosterbaan said. A decade ago, the content of child pornography his department worked to eradicate depicted children usually no younger than 13. 'Now there is horrific, tortuous sexual abuse involving babies and toddlers,' he said. … This escalation, he said, is partly due to the Internet's ability to bring communities together. Prior to the explosion of the Internet, pedophiles were relatively isolated. They've now found each other online, and the community's main commodity is child pornography, which if they can't find, they create themselves."

Internet Attacks Highlight Need For Coordination Between Public, Private Sectors. Government Computer News (2/8, Jackson) reports, "Tuesday's denial-of-service attacks against three of the Internet's root DNS servers did not rise to the level of a major cyberincident, but it did highlight the government's efforts to coordinate responses with private-sector infrastructure providers. … 'There was some minor degradation of service,' but no large impact, said Jerry Dixon, head of the Homeland Security Department's National Cyber Security Division." GCN continues, "Dixon was joined Wednesday by Chris Painter of the Justice Department and Mark Hall of the Defense Department, his fellow co-chairmen on the National Cyber Response Coordination Group, at the RSA IT security conference. NCRCG is the government's tool for organizing its response to the most serious cyberattacks, coordinating the efforts of federal departments and agencies with the private sector. … So far, 'we haven't had a real crisis where we've had to stand up,' Painter said." GCN adds, "On a scale of 1 to 10, this week's attacks on top-level Domain Name Service servers only rated about a 3, Dixon said. The NCRCG co-chairs met to discuss the incident and monitor its impact and progress, but hands-on response was coordinated by the US CERT. … The attacks lasted for several hours and directed up to 54Gbps of traffic at the .mil, .info and .bus DNS servers, said US CERT deputy director Michael Witt. The .mil server was the most heavily targeted, he said. … Dixon said investigators are following leads to determine the source of the attacks."

Pennsylvania State Senator Vincent J. Fumo "pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges he defrauded taxpayers and a local nonprofit out of more than $2 million, and surrendered more than 200 firearms as a condition of bail. … The powerful Philadelphia Democrat declined comment during several hours at the federal building, when he was arraigned and processed by the FBI and U.S. marshals." The AP continues, "Fumo appeared confident in court, although his jaw twitched at times, as a clerk spent several minutes reading the 139 criminal counts lodged against him. …. 'Not guilty, your honor,' he said, in answer to the charges." The AP adds, "Fumo, 63, later declined to discuss the cache of guns, which prosecutors said he kept at his Philadelphia mansion, his Harrisburg-area farm and at beach homes in New Jersey and Florida. … Fumo sat in court beside his lead defense attorney, Richard A. Sprague, a legendary 81-year-old former city prosecutor who plans a press conference on the indictment on Thursday." The AP notes, "Co-defendant Ruth Arnao, the longtime Fumo friend who ran the nonprofit, the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also pleaded not guilty to the charges. … She was accompanied in court by her husband, Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission Chairman Mitchell Rubin. Rubin is not charged, but the 267-page indictment states that he joined Fumo on a 2001 trip to Cuba funded by the nonprofit and was paid for Senate contracts that involved little or no work. … The couple also enjoyed a sailing trip with Fumo at Martha's Vineyard on a yacht owned by the Independence Seaport Museum, the indictment charges. … Arnao, 51, of Philadelphia, obstructed the four-year investigation into Citizens' Alliance by helping delete years worth of e-mails, prosecutors said. … She is charged in 45 counts, including two counts of filing a false tax return for allegedly stating that the group did not engage in political activity. According to the indictment, Fumo ordered the charity to fund election polling, a politically motivated lawsuit against a Senate rival and other partisan efforts." The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/8, Shiffman, Lounsberry, 385K) reports on the arraignment, under the headline "Fumo Surrenders To FBI, Pleads Not Guilty," and the Philadelphia Daily News (2/8, Hinkelman, 106K) also reports the story.

Austrian Investigators Uncover International Child Porn Network. USA Today (2/8, 13A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The Austrian government has provided the FBI with more than 200 U.S. Internet addresses identified in a far-reaching international child pornography investigation in which suspects allegedly paid to watch graphic videos of young children being sexually abused. The investigation, which began last summer, has identified 2,361 Internet addresses in at least 77 countries, including the USA, where customers paid about $90 to view the abuse of infants and other children, Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter said Wednesday." USA notes, "It was unclear how many suspects could be traced to the addresses because computer users frequently maintain multiple addresses, FBI and Austrian authorities said. 'This is an ongoing investigation,' FBI spokesman Paul Bresson said. 'The FBI is working closely with the Austrian authorities … to combat the proliferation of online child exploitation. Although the number of subjects may end up being significantly less … it will likely result in the identification of numerous individuals in the U.S.' Platter said no arrests had been made."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Oleksyn) reports, "The children were under the age of 14 and screams could be heard, said Harald Gremel, an Austrian police expert on Internet crime who headed the investigation." Platter "said the FBI was investigating about 600 of the suspects in the United States. German authorities were following leads on another 400 people, France was looking into about 100 others, and at least 23 suspects were Austrians, he said." The New York Times (2/8, Smith, 1.16M) notes, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation announced last year it had assembled an international task force, with officials from Europol, the European Union's law enforcement organization, and 18 countries serving six-month rotations in the United States to help American child-pornography investigators." BBC News (2/7) added, "Twenty-three suspects were being questioned, Austrian officials said, and arrest warrants might soon be issued. Fourteen of them have confessed to downloading the material."

Fox News Live (2/7, 2:07 p.m.), CNN's Live Today (2/7), CNN.com (2/7, Pleitgen), Bloomberg (2/8, Tirone), Canada's CTV.ca (2/7) and Britain's The Sun (2/8, Sturgis) also reported on the Austrian probe, all noting that the FBI is investigating the Internet addresses identified in the US.

Internet Porn Rings Prove Difficult To Track. The AP (2/8, Bergstein) reports, "The numbers behind an international child pornography bust Wednesday were themselves disturbing: Nearly 2,400 suspects from 77 countries allegedly paid to view videos depicting sexual abuse online. But the nature of Internet traffic makes it sadly unsurprising that people would figure they could hide so much hideous material." The AP continues, "Finding and stamping out such content 'is needle-in-a-haystack work,' said Carole Theriault, a security consultant with Sophos PLC in London." The AP adds, '"Austrian authorities said an employee of a Vienna-based Internet file-hosting service approached his national Interior Ministry last July with word that he had noticed the pornographic material during a routine scan. … The videos showed 'the worst kind of child sexual abuse,' said Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter, citing the rape and sexual abuse of girls and boys younger than 14. At times the children could be heard screaming. … Lead investigator Harald Gremel said the videos were online for at most a day before they were discovered. The Austrian Internet service employee blocked access to the videos while recording the computer addresses of people who tried to download the material, and gave the details to authorities. … Within 24 hours, investigators recorded more than 8,000 hits from 2,361 computer addresses in 77 countries around the world, including the United States, according to Gremel. … Why did finding this take what would seem a lucky break by network administrator? Because everything traversing the borderless Internet looks the same while in transit. Whether it's a mundane e-mail or videos as insidious as this, all traffic gets splintered into packets of data that don't identify what they contain. … Consequently, unless a nefarious Web site advertises itself with spam e-mails or shuttles an inordinate amount of traffic, several factors can conspire to keep it in the shadows."

Massachusetts Man Charged With Possession Of Child Pornography. The Hingham (MA) Journal (2/8, Ford) reports, "Philip W. Herzberg, 50, of 243 South St., was arrested in Hingham last Thursday (Feb. 1) on federal charges of receipt and possession of child pornography, the U.S. Attorney's office said." The Journal continues, "Herzberg was one of three Massachusetts men who were the latest to be charged in a Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) nationwide investigation dubbed 'Operation Emissary' targeting a Web site based in New Jersey that offers images and movies of hardcore child pornography. … Herzberg, who was arrested at the Hingham Police Department, is charged with six counts of receipt of child pornography and one count of possession of child pornography. … If convicted, Herzberg could face a minimum of five years in prison for each charge of receipt of child pornography and a maximum of 10 years in prison for possession of child pornography." The Journal adds, "Federal agents had been monitoring Herzberg and others over the Internet for three months at the end of 2005 and 2006. In October 2006, more than 125 people in 22 states were arrested in the first wave of a nationwide sweep. … Lt. Michael Peraino, who is spokesman for the Hingham Police Department, said Hingham police assisted federal agents last September in executing a search warrant at Herzberg's home. They seized Herzberg's computers as a result of the federal investigation."

Delay Seen Likely For Cunningham Co-Conspirator's Hearing. The North County (CA) Times (2/8, Bennett) reports, "The sentencing of Randy Cunningham's co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, will likely be delayed again, as the former defense contractor continues to cooperate with federal prosecutors in the ongoing investigation into the Cunningham bribery case, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Washington said Wednesday." The Times continues, "Wade pleaded guilty in February 2006 to having bribed the now-imprisoned Cunningham with more than $1 million in a scheme to enrich himself through lucrative defense contracts. Wade faces up to 11 years in prison and remains free pending sentencing. He could have gotten up to 20 years, if not for a plea deal in which he promised to cooperate with prosecutors in their ongoing investigation. … In August, the U.S. attorney's office in Washington announced that it was postponing the presentencing hearing until early 2007 due to Wade's ongoing cooperation. And on Wednesday, Washington spokesman Channing Phillips said the hearing is likely to be put off for another six months, for the same reason. … 'If he's going to get the full benefit of his cooperation, it makes no sense (to sentence him) before his cooperation ends,' Phillips said in a Wednesday phone interview from his Washington office. … He said defense counsel and prosecutors generally work with the judge to negotiate decisions on whether to postpone a sentencing hearing."

FTC Reports ID Theft Again Leads Consumer Fraud Complaints. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Rugaber) reports, "Consumers reported over 670,000 cases of fraud and identity theft in 2006 that cost them $1.2 billion in losses, the Federal Trade Commission said in its annual report Wednesday. For the seventh straight year, ID theft was the most common complaint, the FTC said, accounting for 36 percent, or 246,035, of the complaints. ID theft complaints have leveled off after a steep increase earlier this decade. The number of ID theft complaints jumped from almost 162,000 in 2002 to a record 246,882 in 2004, slightly higher than last year's number, the agency said." The AP notes, "The annual report is based on data collected by the FTC and over 115 other organizations, including law enforcement agencies, such as the FBI, and private groups such as the Better Business Bureau."

Consultant Trains Convicts How To Survive In Prison. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/8, Fitzsimmons) reports, "Dr. Prison is a consulting business, based in La Mesa and run by a San Diego man, that coaches men and women who are about to serve sentences in jail or prison. Dr. Prison teaches them how to talk, how to carry themselves, how to make allies and how to avoid making enemies. Really, how to survive. … 'Dr. Prison's mission is to help you avoid being physically hurt, extorted, or possibly killed in prison,' the business says on its Web site, www.drprison.com. … 'Just because you didn't know you shouldn't walk into another person's open cell because you didn't ask permission doesn't mean you should get the crap beaten out of you,' said Steve Scholl, who started Dr. Prison about two years ago." The Union-Tribune continues, "Scholl has never been to prison, but he works with 10 on-call ex-convicts. He carefully selects the right ones to match the client's background and crime. Each client – he sees about two a month – is charged a fee based on the amount of time and attention they need. … 'They will always have directly across the table from them someone who has served time,' Scholl said." The Union-Tribune adds, "Rates start with the phone/e-mail package, at $275 for jail preparation and $375 for prison. The personal visit package runs $375 for jail, $575 for prison, with the client paying for travel expenses; and the video teleconference deal costs $900 for jail and $1,200 for prison. … Dr. Prison also works with families of convicts, advising them how to best support their loved ones as they deal with the sentence from their side of the bars. This month, Scholl and his consultants will start hosting a national, online radio talk show Saturday nights on www.wsRadio.com. Listeners can call in for advice. … Clients contact Dr. Prison on the advice of their lawyers or bail bondsmen. … They aren't gang members, and certainly aren't people who have been in prison before. … Based on interviews he conducted with released convicts, Scholl says a person who doesn't know how to act in prison has a 25 percent to 30 percent chance of getting killed; a 10 percent to 15 percent chance of being raped; a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of getting stabbed; and an 80 percent to 90 percent chance of getting beaten."

CIVIL LAW:

Air Traffic Controller Blamed In Airline Crash That Killed Radio Star. The Chicago Tribune (2/8, O'Connor) reports, "An aviation consultant testified Wednesday that an air-traffic controller's negligence led to the midair collision near Waukegan that killed radio star Bob Collins and two other people in 2000. … 'There were a multitude of things he did wrong,' Richard P. Burgess, who spent 32 years at the Federal Aviation Administration, testified at a federal trial into the cause of the crash." The Tribune continues, "Burgess, hired by lawyers for Collins' widow, also said that a 1997 midair collision at Chicago's Meigs Field that killed seven people was 'a wake-up call' that should have prompted the FAA to install radar at the Waukegan Regional Airport in addition to installing it at Meigs. … The Waukegan airfield was busier than Meigs, yet only Meigs was equipped with radar after the midair collision at the lakefront airport, according to testimony. … Radar was installed at the Waukegan field five months after the crash killed Collins, his passenger, Herman Luscher, and student pilot Sharon Hock in the other plane." The Tribune adds, "In testimony Tuesday, Gregory Fowler, the air-traffic controller in question, admitted he had no idea of the precise location of Hock's Cessna when he instructed her to turn toward the Waukegan airport. … Less than two minutes later, Collins' Moravan Z242L rear-ended the Cessna 172P. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, and Hock's plane plummeted to a Zion street. … Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending that the FAA was responsible for the crash even though a private company operated the Waukegan tower. U.S. District Judge John Darrah is to decide the case. … Burgess testified that Fowler erred when he issued certain directives to the two pilots, including clearing Collins to land, even though he had neither plane in sight. … On cross-examination of Burgess, Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, suggested he had a vendetta against the FAA after he had been suspended and reassigned to a nonsupervisory position late in his career.

Burgess denied any hard feelings. … Rosa also contended that in the last four years Burgess had found 32 air-traffic controllers at fault in 18 lawsuits in which he testified."

Report On Lynchburg, VA, Police Custody Death To Be Released Today. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (2/8, Lee) reports, "Two more investigations into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr. are complete and the findings will be released at a news conference today." The N&A continues, "Beard, a 46-year-old Lynchburg man, died in police custody last year after a struggle with two Lynchburg police officers. … Today's findings come a little more than three weeks after Lynchburg's top prosecutor said he would not bring criminal charges against officers Michael Eagle and Michael Huntsman." The N&A adds, "Commonwealth's Attorney Mike Doucette's findings were based on a Virginia State Police investigation. His report focused on whether or not the officers committed a criminal act. … Today's report is based on two internal investigations begun and almost immediately shelved by the Lynchburg Police Department after the state police started its outside investigation. … Lynchburg police have said they would release their findings once the state police inquiry wrapped up." The N&A notes, "One of the Lynchburg Police Department's investigations is looking into whether the officers acted legally during their encounter with Beard, while the other is to determine whether they followed department policy. … A state medical examiner's report showed Beard was suffering from advanced coronary artery disease and that there were no drugs in his system when he died. … Civil rights activists have called for the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the incident."

Three Atlanta Officers Expected To Face Murder Charges Following "No-Knock" Search. In a widely reported story, the AP (2/8) reports prosecutors "intend to seek murder charges against three Atlanta police officers involved in the shooting death of a 92-year-old woman in her home, according to a letter sent to an attorney for one of the officers. Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard sent a letter that said he will ask a grand jury on Feb. 26 to deliver a murder indictment against officers Gregg Junnier, J.R. Smith and Arthur Tesler, said Rand Csehy, Junnier's attorney." Kathryn Johnston "died and three officers were wounded in the Nov. 21 shootout when police used a no-knock warrant to search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home. … Narcotics officers said an informant had claimed there was cocaine in the home, but none was found."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/7) reported the three officers "were involved in securing a search warrant on Nov. 21 for the home of…Johnston. Shortly before the raid, Smith told a magistrate he and Tesler had a confidential informant buy $50 worth of crack at 933 Neal Street from a man named 'Sam.' But, according to the proposed indictment, no informant went to the house."

On its Web site, WXIA-TV, Atlanta (2/7) reports the district attorney "has told the officers' attorneys that he plans to take the case to a Grand Jury on February 26. An attorney for…Junnier said the charges the D.A. plans to take to the jury include felony murder, aggravated assault, false imprisonment, burglary, and other charges."

WSB-TV, Atlanta (2/7) reports on its Web site that the "big news is not only the notice of the indictment itself, but also an FBI action indicated to Channel 2's Mark Winne that the action by the Fulton County D.A.'s Office came without any notice to either the FBI or U.S. Attorney's Office. The official suggested the FBI investigation has not been completed and the FBI had not been notified of what he indicated was a unilateral action taken by the District Attorney."

Nashville Council Makes English Its Official Language. The AP (2/8) reports, "Nashville's city council has voted to adopt English as its official language, following similar moves by several smaller cities around the country." The AP continues, "After months of debate, the city's Metro Council voted 23-14 on Tuesday to approve the measure requiring all government communications to be in English, except when multilingual communications are required by federal rules or are needed 'to protect or promote public health, safety or welfare.' … The exceptions were added after the city attorney contended that the bill's original language was unconstitutional. Some supporters and opponents of the measure said the exceptions mean the law would have little effect on city business." The AP adds, "Nashville, a city of more than 600,000, is home to the nation's largest Kurdish community and has been a resettlement site for refugees from Africa and Southeast Asia. The Hispanic immigrant population also has boomed, and researchers say Nashville's foreign-born population has grown 350 percent since 1990. … Gregg Ramos, a Nashville attorney and first-generation American who opposed the measure, said Nashville is the largest city and the only state capital to pass such a law. … Twenty-eight states have adopted English as their official language, including Arizona, where voters approved a law last year, according to U.S. English Inc., a Washington-based advocacy group. … The U.S. Senate's version of last year's failed immigration bill would have made English the national language, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the measure would have been purely symbolic."

Former Nvidia Counsel Sues Firm For Age Discrimination. The California Recorder (2/8, Seyfer) reports, "Stephen Pettigrew built Nvidia Corp.'s legal department from a one-man-show -- himself -- into a full-fledged public-company team. … But when he got too old, executives demoted and fired him. That's what Pettigrew, who was 64 when he left Nvidia, alleges in an age discrimination lawsuit filed last month against the Santa Clara, Calif., graphics-chip company." The Recorder continues, "Pettigrew also accuses the company of retaliating because he voiced his concern that one of the company's top executives may have committed sexual harassment and gender discrimination. … 'Steve Pettigrew is an outstanding attorney who served this company loyally and very skillfully, and he didn't deserve this,' said his attorney, Allen Ruby of San Jose's Ruby & Schofield." The Recorder adds, "The suit is the latest legal shadow cast on the company, which remains the subject of a Securities and Exchange Commission probe into stock-option backdating as well as a Department of Justice antitrust investigation. The DOJ probe is looking into whether the company monopolized the market for two kinds of graphics products."

ACLU Sues For Removal Of Commandments Monument From Florida Courthouse. The AP (2/8) reports from Cross City, FL, "The American Civil Liberties Union is suing to force a conservative Christian county in Florida to remove a hulking Ten Commandments monument from the courthouse steps." The AP continues, "The 5-foot-tall 6-ton black granite monument stands in front of a building for the courthouse, the elections supervisor office, the tax collector and other public offices in Dixie County. The lawsuit filed in federal court Tuesday said the monument heaps on its religious message with the inscription 'Love God and Keep His Commandments' in large capital letters at its base. … The lawsuit says the monument violates two amendments to the U.S. constitution because it is not part of a historical display and because the uniquely Christian message of the Ten Commandments on a government building could intimidate people with different religious beliefs." The AP adds, "The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that religious displays are not inherently unconstitutional and must be considered on a case-by-case basis. Last year, the high court allowed the Ten Commandments to be displayed outside the Texas state Capitol but not inside two Kentucky courthouses, where the justices said the displays promoted a religious message. … The Dixie County Commission approved the monument, donated by a local businessman, in January 2006 and it was placed on the courthouse steps in November. Dixie County, a rural county where churches outnumber traffic lights, is on the Gulf Coast north of Tampa, Florida."

Wal-Mart Bias Suit Highlights Persistent Wage Disparities. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Trumbull) reports, "A lawsuit against America's largest employer is serving as a reminder that concerns about gender discrimination persist, despite four decades of focus on equal workplace rights." The Monitor continues, "Wal-Mart hasn't been found guilty of sex discrimination – and it may never be, in part because class-action cases on this issue are often settled out of court. … But the very fact that such a large case against the retailer has made it this far – with a federal appeals court giving the go-ahead Tuesday for a class-action lawsuit involving more than 1.5 million women – puts the issue back in the national spotlight more than at any other time in recent years." The Monitor adds, "The case revolves around wage issues – equal pay for equal work. But it also alleges that Wal-Mart shortchanged female employees on opportunities for promotion. … It's that issue – the proverbial glass ceiling – that studies find is the most intractable gender inequity in US industries today, despite the gains women have made since the equal-rights era. … The issue matters not just for women but the whole economy, because the underlying question is whether businesses are making the most productive use of the talent available. Gender discrimination represents a failure involving nearly half the workforce."

African-American Success Stories Seen As Overlooked. In a Washington Post op-ed (2/8, A21), Stephanie Robinson, the founding president and chief executive of the Jamestown Project, and Cornel West, professor of religion at Princeton University and a member of the Jamestown Project Advisory Board, say, "To think of America in 2007, it is impossible not to consider the contributions of African Americans -- many of whom have laid the foundation for American culture, democracy, freedom and equality." Amid the "celebrations commemorating the Jamestown anniversary, thousands of African Americans will convene in Hampton this weekend for the annual State of the Black Union. While the stage will be populated by the extraordinarily successful, the purpose of the State of the Black Union is to not only showcase our success but also to discuss the staggering numbers of African American citizens in poverty, those who are incarcerated, undereducated, underemployed and otherwise outside the reach of the American Dream. But, while the factors that conspire to create subcommunities characterized by unemployment and marginal literacy are debated often, and with vigor, rarely do we discuss the factors that led to the successes of millions of African Americans."

Blackstone Wins Battle To Acquire Equity Office Properties Trust. The Washington Post (2/8, D1, Cho) reports, "The battle to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord, came to an end after Vornado Realty Trust dropped out of the bidding yesterday, leaving the private-equity firm Blackstone Group as the all-but-official winner of the biggest buyout deal in history." The Post continues, "Equity Office's board had tried to get Vornado to sweeten its bid throughout the week, but Vornado said that the price had soared beyond its tastes. … 'The company concluded that the premium it would have to pay to top Blackstone's latest bid . . . would not be in its shareholders' interest,' Vornado said in a statement." The Post adds, "The high-stakes bidding war compelled Blackstone to up the ante several times. After initially offering $48.50 per share last fall, Blackstone is to pay $55.50 per share for Equity Office and assume about $16 billion of Equity's debt, bringing the total value of the deal to $39 billion. … Blackstone's offer was approved by shareholders yesterday."

The Financial Times (2/8, Politi, Guerrera) reports, "Blackstone's victory confirmed its status as one of the most powerful actors in global finance. It comes in the same month as Steve Schwarzman, who founded the firm in 1986, will celebrate his 60th birthday by throwing what is already expected to be one of the most glamorous parties in New York history." The Times adds, "By agreeing to a takeover by Blackstone, EOP will join the string of big companies in the US that have chosen to go private in the past few months. These include Clear Channel Communications, the largest US radio station, and Harrah's Entertainment, the biggest US casino owner."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A1, Forsyth, Sender, Frangos) reports, "Blackstone Group's $23 billion buyout of the owner of the biggest portfolio of U.S. office buildings will send ripples through the real-estate world, with a good chance it will raise the ceiling on already-record prices." The Journal continues, "With office buildings in red-hot demand as investment vehicles, Blackstone's control of prime properties likely will put it in position to demand prices on its individual buildings high enough to make the private-equity firm's bid pay off. The deal, approved yesterday by Equity Office Properties Trust after rival bidder Vornado Realty Trust bowed out following weeks of bidding, also cements Blackstone's clout as one of the most powerful investors on Wall Street." The Journal notes, "Losing out was a bitter disappointment for Vornado Chief Executive Steven Roth, who gave up for the second time in six months on his hope of acquiring Equity Office and its coveted office buildings in markets from Manhattan to San Francisco. … And for Equity Office founder and Chairman Sam Zell, who chatted with his longtime friend Mr. Roth after the shareholder vote, the deal represents a big payday. Factoring in stock options and other payments, Mr. Zell stands to make more than $800 million from the sale, according to proxy statements."

The New York Times (2/8, Sorkin, Pristin) reports, "The deal for Equity Office encapsulates two of the hottest trends in deal-making: the wave of capital flooding into commercial real estate and the growing power of private money. … While residential real estate has slowed, commercial real estate, office buildings in particular, looks more attractive as the market finally shakes off the effects of the burst technology bubble in 2000. Many investors expect office vacancy rates to continue to decline in the next couple of years, with a corresponding rise in rents. … And private equity firms like Blackstone have been among some of the most aggressive investors in commercial real estate. These firms have accumulated huge war chests: even now Blackstone is raising a new $10 billion real estate fund. The surge in buyouts — which accounted for a fifth of the record $3.8 trillion in deals last year — shows no sign of slowing."

FTC Settles Antitrust Claims Against Michigan MLS. Inman News (2/8, Roberts) reports, "The U.S. Federal Trade Commission this week announced a settlement with MiRealSource Multiple Listing Service in Michigan over rules that blocked some property listings from the MLS and set restrictions for other property listings based on the type of real estate contracts." Inman continues, "MiRealSource is the sixth MLS to settle similar antitrust allegations brought by the FTC in October -- the federal agency is proceeding with an antitrust lawsuit against Realcomp II Ltd., another Michigan MLS, over its listings policies. … In each of the cases, the federal government charged that the MLSs engaged in anticompetitive activity by placing restrictions on a category of property listings that could ultimately lead to reduced choices for consumers in real estate services." Inman adds, "Representatives for MiRealSource, which is a broker-owned MLS with about 7,000 members, announced in November that the MLS had agreed to settle the FTC complaint, and the agreement was subject to review and approval by members of the FTC. … 'Under the FTC consent order settling the complaint, MiRealSource has agreed to abandon ... collusive conduct and provide its services to all member brokers representing potential home sellers, regardless of the type of listing contract that they choose,' FTC officials announced in a statement Monday." Inman notes, "The FTC complaint against MiRealSource, issued Oct. 10, charged that the MLS violated antitrust law 'by adopting rules or policies that limit the publication and marketing of certain sellers' properties, but not others, based solely on the terms of their listing contracts. Specifically, the FTC alleges that MiRealSource favored exclusive right to sell listings and disfavored exclusive agency listings by, among other things, adopting a rule to exclude the latter entirely from the MLS.'"

Internet Real Estate Firms Shaking Up Industry. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Haddad) reports, "Recent Chicago transplants Pieter and Beth van Es have recovered from their sticker shock and are ready to buy a house in Southern California. Now, the Irvine couple have a new incentive. … When they buy their home through an online broker, they will get a nice chunk of their money back." The Times continues, "The Van Eses are using Seattle-based Redfin, one of several new brokerage services that hope to revolutionize home buying by rebating part of their commissions back to buyers. The challenge is aimed at traditional firms that charge full commissions, which often total tens of thousands of dollars in today's high-priced Southland market. … Although these upstarts have yet to make a major dent in nationwide sales volume, they are raising eyebrows and causing traditional brokerages to worry." The Times adds, "Redfin, which launches today in Southern California, offers rebates because buyers do much of the groundwork of finding homes via the Web. The brokerage handles the paperwork and conducts negotiations, usually over the phone or via e-mail or fax. … Typically, the commission totals 5% to 6% of the sale price, which is then split between the buyer's agent and the seller's agent. The industry is prevented by law from setting commission rates. As a buyer's broker, Redfin rebates more than half of its cut to the buyer. … Cutting customers in on commission fees isn't a trend the brand-name, more established brokerages are exactly cheering about. The industry is mired in a slowdown, and the number of brokerages and agents is expected to shrink as firms consolidate or go out of business." The Times notes, "What's more, after growing fat on fees that totaled more than $60 billion in 2005, the industry finds itself under attack for alleged anti-competitive practices. The Justice Department has sued the National Assn. of Realtors for trying to limit the availability of property-listing data to upstart online firms such as Redfin and others. … Such data are at the core of the burgeoning rebate movement. As consumers access the same information that brokers have long controlled, a growing awareness of the costs of buying and selling a house is taking hold."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Promotes Boost In National Park Funding. ABC World News (2/7, story 10, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush visited Shenandoah National Park in Virginia today, to rally support for his plan to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into National Parks. A key part of the President's plan is a $3 billion ten-year initiative to improve and maintain parks. One-third of that money would come from private donations that would be matched by the government."

The Harrisonburg Daily News Record (2/8, Turner) says Bush and Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne "led a round-table discussion on the president's National Parks Centennial Initiative, which he revealed earlier this week as part of his proposed 2008 budget." The President's visit "began with a few opening remarks on why he's attempting to persuade Congress to support his initiative. Then Bush engaged in a discussion with national parks officials and representatives of organizations with a vested interest in the nation's parks." Said the President, "Our national parks are really one of America's great treasures. … And the fundamental question is, 'Are we wise enough to treat them as such?'"

McClatchy (2/8, Hutcheson) says Bush's proposed boost comes as part of "an otherwise lean domestic budget." For the new funds to be approved, "first Congress must go along, and it's not clear that it will. The plan includes a controversial proposal to leverage federal funds with matching private donations." McClatchy adds, "Insiders see the influence of first lady Laura Bush, an avid hiker who visits a national park with her Texas pals at least once a year. She and the president will travel to Virginia's Shenandoah National Park on Wednesday to promote the parks-improvement plan."

The AP (2/8) notes the First Lady was also present at the round-table discussion. Ron Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association, "said the president's proposal would be a significant step toward solving some of the parks' major problems, including crumbling facilities, growing pollution and lack of staff." But "House Natural Resources Committee Chairman Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., said the new funding is largely the result of shifting money from existing important park programs, such as construction, into a new budget column with a new label."

The Washington Post (2/8, A6, Fletcher, 690K) notes Rahall's criticism, and says "some critics were leery of Bush's idea of relying in part on private donations to fund major improvements in the nation's parks." The Post adds, "As Bush was campaigning for his parks initiative in the Blue Ridge Mountains, press secretary Tony Snow was challenging the notion that the administration's interest in the parks -- and the environment more generally -- marks a change for the president. Snow noted that last year Bush created the largest protected marine reserve in the world when he set aside as a national park an island chain spanning 1,400 miles of the Pacific northwest of Hawaii." Snow also "countered suggestions that Bush had denied that global warming has a large human component. The White House later released an open letter citing statements dating to 2001 in which Bush had said global warming was largely man-made."

The New York Times (2/8, Stolberg, Barringer, 1.16M), in a story titled "The President Shows His Environmentalist Colors," says that "at a time when his policies on global warming are under scrutiny from environmentalists," Bush "this week cloaked himself in another environmental issue: conservation. … Most environmentalists would not say George W. Bush and Theodore Roosevelt in the same sentence, unless making an invidious comparison." Bush, "his detractors say, has let the national parks slide into decline -- until now."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/8) reports Bush's budget "would give the National Park Service its largest-ever funding increase." Bush is quoted saying, "Congress needs to hear loud and clear how important this initiative is. … I hope the citizens groups who are concerned about the parks beat a hasty trail to the Congress and remind the Congress about what we have done, and what we need to do as good stewards of the parks."

The Rocky Mountain News (2/8, Sprengelmeyer) reports the plan "will take shape between now and the end of May, after…Kempthorne, who oversees the park service, leads a series of 'listening sessions' around the country about projects members of the public and would-be donors would like to see." Bush's proposed budget "includes a 17 percent increase for parks, monuments and other sites in Colorado."

The Beacon Journal (2/8, Downing) notes "the Cuyahoga Valley National Park would get a major boost under…Bush's 2008 federal budget, and park visitors would see a big difference with the 10 percent funding increase." The additional $1 million "would enable the park to hire six full-time staffers and 16 seasonal employees and to restore cuts in interpretive, educational programs and services that were made because of tight budgets in recent years, said Superintendent John P. Debo Jr." The additional funds proposed by Bush represent "a huge turnaround in the budget fortunes of the National Park Service,"' Debo said, adding, "We're just delighted."

The President's trip to Shenandoah National Park was extensively covered by local TV stations across the country. WVIR-TV Charlottesville (2/7), late in its 11 o'clock newscast said the President and First Lady "stopped at Shenandoah

National Park to highlight a big dollar boost over the next ten years through the National Parks Centennial Initiative."

KTRV-TV Boise (2/7) reported, "The presidential visit was part of a roundtable discussion with Kempthorne, the National Parks Service director and other park officials."

WBAY-TV Green Bay (2/7, 5:13 pm) added, "The visit was meant to promote the President's plans to boost park spending. … Conservation groups say many parks have suffered years of neglect and a cleanup is long overdue."

More Commentary. John Bridgeland, vice chairman of the Earth Conservation Corps and CEO of Civic Enterprises, and Curt Buchholtz, president of the National Park Friends Alliance and executive director of the Rocky Mountain Nature Association, write in the Washington Times this morning (2/8) that "the president's release of a multibillion-dollar centennial plan will be an important step in determining what national park system we celebrate in 2016. … What we do with our parks over the next decade will affect how our children and grandchildren enjoy and learn from them and how America's evolving story and heritage are safeguarded. Let's hope our generation meets the challenge to preserve this collective consciousness of our nation and has something grand to celebrate at the 100th anniversary of our national park system."

Interior Extends Deadline For Final Decision On Bald Eagle. The New York Times (2/8, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "With a court-ordered deadline looming for removal of the bald eagle from the endangered species list, the Interior Department, rejecting the advice of its staff wildlife biologists, tried to limit a separate set of protections for the majestic bird that has served as a national symbol for centuries. Public reaction, however, to its December proposal was so sharp that the department had sought a reprieve from the deadline, which it received Wednesday." It now "has until June 29 to make its final decision on the eagle's status and the extent of its continuing protections." The Times adds H. Dale Hall, said in an interview yesterday that contrary to published accounts, "I have never been overruled" by top officials at the Interior Department "on the extent of protections. He said he 'stands behind' the December proposal from the department, which gave the eagles less protection."

Investigators Say Lack Of Deepwater Oversight Led To Coast Guard Waste. The Washington Post (2/8, A7, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Even as contractors built patrol boats with buckling hulls and a large new cutter with structural flaws, a US Coast Guard review gave their performance high marks last year, extended their deal for nearly four years and paid them a multimillion-dollar bonus, government investigators said." DHS IG Richard L. Skinner told legislators at a hearing of the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security Tuesday that analysts evaluating the Deepwater program disregarded "defective ships under development by companies led by Northrop Grumman and Lockheed Martin." Skinner said the decision to turn over "to a private 'systems integrator' the main responsibility for planning, designing and producing a fleet to meet" the Coast Guard's needs had resulted in a failure "at times…to protect taxpayers' interests." Skinner and GAO head David M. Walker "called for more aggressive oversight."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Agent Over Discrimination Complaint. As reported on Tuesday by the Minneapolis Star Tribune and in a widely-distributed AP story, the Washington Times (2/8, Seper, 88K) reports, "A Minneapolis civil jury…unanimously held that the FBI illegally retaliated against Jane Turner, a 25-year veteran FBI agent, by downgrading her performance reviews." The Times notes, "Among FBI officials named in court documents as participating in the retaliatory actions were James Burrus, the assistant director of the FBI's criminal division, and James Casey, a high-level official in the FBI's counterterrorism program. The $565,000 judgment is expected to be reduced by Chief U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum, who heard the case, to the statutory limit of $360,000."

ATF Replaces Two Top Officials. USA Today (2/8, 10A, 2.27M) reports the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives "has replaced two of its leaders. Edgar Domenech, the No. 2 official at the agency, has been transferred to head the bureau's field division in Washington, D.C., ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell said. The assistant director, Michael Bouchard, will leave to oversee field operations nationally." Mixell "would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of a Justice Department audit alleging mismanagement and questionable spending decisions at ATF that led to Director Carl Truscott's departure last August."

The AP (2/8, Jordan) reports, "Mixell said the two will be replaced with what she described as veteran special agents who 'bring a combination of leadership experience and great respect from colleagues that is critical to the ATF's success at the executive level.' … Mixell would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of mismanagement allegations and questionable spending decisions that led to the departure last August of Carl J. Truscott as director. … An audit by the Justice Department's inspector general in October found that Truscott ordered his staff to help with his nephew's high school homework, wasting the agency's time and violating ethics rules. The report also concluded that Truscott's leadership, hiring practices and financial decisions were troubling, including his plan to spend $100,000 on gym equipment for the ATF's new headquarters."

Police Chiefs From US, Latin American Seek Anti-Gang Coordination. AFP (2/8, Bustamante) reports, "Police chiefs from Latin America and the United States opened a three-day summit aimed at forming a strategy to crack down on violent crime gangs." AFP continues, "Latino gangs which originated from Los Angeles have been blamed for smuggling drugs and weapons as well as murders, rapes and robberies. … 'Gang violence is a problem of international scope, and we must face it on a international scale,' Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa told reporters. … 'We must coordinate with our international counterparts in a smart and effective way.'" AFP adds, "Delegates from Mexico, Belize, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras attended Wednesday's conference along with several US police chiefs and officials from the FBI and Justice Department. … The conference aims to agree ways of increasing information-sharing among law enforcement agencies and look at how best to fight gangs thought to be responsible for trafficking drugs and illegal weapons. … FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said the conference's focus was to 'fight gang violence in all its forms.'" AFP notes, "Central American nations have seen a sharp uptick in gang-related crimes, Eimiller said. El Salvador, with a population of 6.8 million people, saw an average of 10 homicides a day in 2006 -- about 70 percent committed by gangs. … 'That trend needs to stop before it comes here,' Eimiller said."

Villaraigosa Identifies City's Worst Gangs, Vows Broad Crackdown. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, McGreevy, Winton, 850K) reports, "Launching a counteroffensive against organized street thugs, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and police officials took the unusual step Wednesday of identifying the city's 11 worst gangs, then promising to go after them with teams of police, federal agents, probation officers and prosecutors. … How many local and federal officers will be committed to the anti-gang push remained unclear, however. And given the complexity of what has been a long-standing social problem, some experts questioned whether the plan would be any more effective than past police crackdowns." Meanwhile, California Gang Investigators Association director Wes McBride "said he feared that some gangs would feel slighted if not named and might try to up the ante with more violent crimes. Najee Ali, a community activist and former gang member, said he also was opposed to any ranking system. … 'To the gang members it is a badge of honor.'"

Study Of Latino Gangs Finds Few Connections To Overseas Groups. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Aizenman) reports, "A study of Latino gangs in the Washington area and five Central American nations debunks the popular belief that the gangs are engaged in a systematic, organized effort to spread their influence." The Post continues, "Although the gangs have significant membership, the study found that their crimes are largely limited to petty theft and neighborhood extortion rather than some of those traditionally associated with organized crime -- drug trafficking, prostitution, human smuggling and arms sales. … The report, conducted by Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico and the nonprofit advocacy group Washington Office on Latin America, comes as U.S. and Central American authorities are coordinating intelligence in the belief that the gangs have a networked structure." The Post notes, "Recent testimony in Washington area courtrooms has pointed to occasional cooperation between local gang members and counterparts in other regions. A 19-year-old Hyattsville man pleaded guilty in federal court last week to collecting dues and sending wire transfers to members in Los Angeles as treasurer of a cell of Mara Salvatrucha. And in an earlier trial, a Salvadoran police officer testified that gang leaders in El Salvador instructed Maryland gang members on how their organization should be run. … But Connie McGuire, who conducted the Washington area component of the study, said her interviews with law enforcement, community groups and 15 former gang members found no sign of transnational coordination among gang members. … 'We shouldn't pretend that gangs aren't a big, scary problem,' Thale said. "But we shouldn't misunderstand what the problem is and misdirect resources for solving it.' … Researchers said the current misconceptions may stem from the transnational nature of the gangs' origins. The two most powerful Central American gangs, 18th Street, also know as Eighteen, and Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, emerged in Los Angeles in the 1980s when Salvadoran, Honduran and Guatemalan immigrants fleeing their region's various civil wars joined Chicano gangs or started gangs to protect themselves from African American gangs in the same neighborhoods."

Civil Rights Lawyer Says Police Crackdown Alone Won't Stop Gangs. In a Los Angeles Times (2/8, 850K) op-ed titled "A 'Surge' On Gangs Alone Won't Help," civil rights lawyer Constance L. Rice writes, "Cheryl Green died Dec. 15 because she was black in the wrong gang-dominated neighborhood," and "L.A. politicians and law enforcement leaders have reacted forcefully to her death." Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "vowed to put the gang out of business. Police Chief William Bratton, Sheriff Lee Baca and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III announced weapons of mass crackdown," and "two days after this display, 204th Street shot another innocent black resident waiting in his car for his daughters." Rice adds, "Let's be clear here: Strategic suppression is essential, a strong response to violent gangs such as 204th Street is necessary, and the effort will need more resources. But it is unclear whether the city has learned that suppression must be coordinated with comprehensive prevention and intervention strategies. And, right now, the prevention and intervention side of the equation is mostly missing. Law enforcement is doing its part; it's the rest of us who are AWOL."

New Jersey "Kingpin" Gets Life Sentence In Drug, Money Laundering Case. In Newark, the New York Times (2/8, Holl) reports a man who prosecutors "said controlled much of the city's heroin trade for years was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to life in prison without parole." Hakeem Curry "was convicted of drug charges and money laundering in July." The Times says Curry's organization "is believed to have supplied nearly 85 percent of the heroin dealt on the streets of Newark and roughly 50 kilograms of cocaine a week for the last several years."

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (2/8) reports Curry, the "notorious kingpin who ran an unparalleled drug empire in Newark for years and kept out of jail by marking those who threatened it with death, was sentenced to life in prison and fined $8 million by a federal judge yesterday. U.S. District Judge Faith Hochberg said she'd never seen a drug organization 'even remotely comparable' to the one Curry ran with 'incredible skill, acumen and intelligence,' but also 'extreme violence.'" The Star-Ledger says according to testimony, Curry "tried to hire a hit man to kill the prosecution's star witness against him. He also ordered the murder of a rival and the execution of another government witness who was supposed to testify in a case against an ally, the testimony showed."

On its Web site, WNBC-TV, New York (2/8) reports prosecutors say the Curry organization "was estimated to supply approximately 85 percent of the heroin in Newark while also supplying 30 to 50 kilograms of cocaine a week through its network of street level distributors. Cooperating witnesses testified that millions of dollars in drug profits were generated by the criminal organization."

Prosecutors Outline Case Against Accused DC Gang "Enforcer." The Washington Post (2/8, B5, Duggan) reports prosecutors say as an "enforcer for a violent drug-dealing crew in Northeast Washington, authorities allege, [Larry Gooch] pulled the trigger in four slayings and aided in a fifth. He sold crack, PCP and Ecstasy, according to an indictment, and tried to shoot a D.C. police officer to prevent a fellow gang member's arrest. … Many of the two dozen or so defendants indicted in the case have been convicted or have pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in exchange for reduced prison terms. The charges followed an 18-month investigation by D.C. police and the FBI." The Post notes that Gooch is on trial alone and "is the only defendant facing a possible death sentence."

Cuba To Deport Reputed Top Boss Of Norte Del Valle Cartel. The AP (2/8) reports Cuba "will deport reputed drug kingpin Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante to Colombia, which plans to extradite him to the United States, a government official told The Associated Press on Wednesday. The Colombian official said Gomez was expected to arrive in Bogota on Thursday and would be held at its heavily fortified chief prosecutor's office compound before being extradited to the United States. … Gomez, an alleged top boss of Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel known by his alias 'Rasguno,' is wanted on a U.S. indictment in New York on drug trafficking, racketeering and money-laundering charges. … The Norte del Valle cartel, the most powerful traditional drug organization in Colombia, is believed to account for as much as 60 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. However, many of its top bosses have been captured in recent years and a campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department has frozen many of their assets, including front companies." The AP story was used by the New York Times and Washington Post.

Bush Administration Urged To Rethink Afghanistan Counternarcotics Strategy. The AP (2/7) reported four House Republicans on Wednesday "urged the Bush administration to rethink its policy on opium production in Afghanistan, saying more needs to be done to counter the growing threat of narco-terrorism. The lawmakers, in a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates, said the U.S. must end its dispute with Britain over opium eradication and design a uniform counternarcotics policy with the British and NATO. … 'It is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for al-Qaida,' wrote Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the top Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and Reps. Mike Pence of Indiana and Elton Gallegly and Dana Rohrabacher, both from California." The AP says the four also "suggested a 'ride-along policy' where Drug Enforcement Administration agents could join U.S. and international military forces in unsecured areas where the DEA is targeting illicit drugs and drug kingpins." The AP story was used by ABC News, CBS News, the New York Times, and Washington Post.

Seattle Gun Dealer Questioned In AUSA Murder Indicted On More Charges. The Seattle Times (2/8, Carter, 118K) reports, "A federal grand jury has added another firearms-related felony charge against a Bellevue gun dealer once arrested as a material witness in the 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales. Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan was charged Wednesday with unlawful possession of a short-barreled rifle, which carries a potential prison term of up to 10 years. Kwan earlier had been charged with possession of a machine gun. Kwan has been scrutinized by the FBI and federal prosecutors because of evidence that he purchased two replacement gun barrels for a handgun like the one that was used to kill Wales. Kwan claims he recalls buying only one barrel, which he turned over to the federal agents. However, his attorney and court documents say he failed a FBI polygraph about the second barrel. Agents with a task force investigating Wales' slaying say they do not think Kwan killed Wales. They are trying to determine whether he gave the second gun barrel to the person who did."

IMMIGRATION:

Commission Criticizes Lack Of Change On US Asylum Procedures. The AP (2/7, Gamboa) reported a report released Thursday by the US Commission on International Religious Freedom says the Department of Homeland Security "is failing to protect asylum seekers from being wrongly deported or treated like criminals. … The commission said few of the changes it had recommended to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have been made. 'Despite the passage of two years and a personal meeting with Secretary Chertoff and our expectation he would establish a system that both protects our borders and asylum, we are disappointed and dismayed,' said Felice Gaer, the commission's chairwoman. Stewart Baker, assistant secretary for policy at DHS, said several of the recommendations have been carried out but many 'were not entirely realistic and very difficult to implement.'" He "said building separate facilities only for asylum seekers and flying them to a better facility would be expensive and might serve as incentive for people to claim asylum."

The New York Times (2/8, Swarns, 1.16M) reports the commission "warned" that "in its zeal to secure the nation's borders and stem the tide of illegal immigrants," the Bush administration "may be leaving asylum seekers vulnerable to deportation and harsh treatment." The Times adds that Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman "said he planned to introduce legislation by March to require the Department of Homeland Security to adopt several of the commission's main recommendations." The Times runs quotes from Baker similar to those in the AP article and adds that he "said the department looked forward to working with Mr. Lieberman and would review his measure after it had been introduced."

Online Hunters Seek Fugitive Nazis. USA Today (2/8, Dorell) reports, "Bill Gray was working as a student intern at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem when he decided to use the Internet to find fugitive Nazis. … Within a few hours he found five, all living in the USA. … 'To think of the horrible crimes that these people committed,' said Gray, 24, a Harvard student from Munster, Ind. 'And to think that they were living in the United States for so long, so happily.'" USA continues, The Nazis whom Gray found were already known to the Justice Department. Some had been deemed too ill to prosecute, and Justice is taking a second look at the others, the center said. … Gray's use of Internet-based search engines and databases such as voting records comes at an important time. The Wiesenthal Center is making an intense push, known as 'Operation: Last Chance,' to find fugitives of the Holocaust and bring them to justice before they die. The center, renowned for finding scores of ex-Nazis, is also seeking collaborators, camp guards and leaders of paramilitary groups who helped round up and kill Jews and others during the Holocaust." USA adds, "The effort has rolled across Europe and collected hundreds of allegations and names from Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Romania, Austria, Hungary and Germany. This year the program will expand to Argentina, Brazil and Chile. … The suspects are all older than 80, so any time saved by using the Internet is critical. … 'It helps make my job easier,' says the world's chief Nazi hunter, Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Center's Jerusalem office. 'It helps me get up-to-date whereabouts on the current suspects.'" USA notes, "That's what happened when Zuroff gave Gray, then a new volunteer, a list of people he had been searching for. Zuroff had compiled the list by cross-checking World War II-era U.S. refugee records with names of suspected war criminals. But Zuroff could find nothing on what happened to the people."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Conrad: Budget Talks Off Over Cheney's Stated Opposition To Any Tax Hikes. The New York Times (2/8, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "A leading Democratic senator said Wednesday that previously undisclosed behind-the-scenes bipartisan budget talks with the administration had collapsed because of comments by Vice President Dick Cheney and others in the administration." Sen. Kent Conrad, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, also "accused the administration of undercutting the possibility of talks by refusing to signal a willingness to compromise on taxes to save Social Security and Medicare or to balance the budget in the years ahead." Conrad "made his comments at a hearing with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, who defended the $2.9 trillion plan that the Bush administration submitted on Monday." At the "root" of the current flap is "a Democratic strategy of saying tax increases, or rescinding tax cuts, are essential to solving many fiscal problems, but demonstrating reluctance to be first to offer a specific proposal. More specifically, Democrats fear that if they propose, and pass, tax increases, they will be vetoed and Republicans will club them over taxes for the next two years." Democrats "say tax increases might come out of bipartisan talks like those under Presidents Bill Clinton and the first George Bush." Conrad, in a telephone interview, "said that "back-channel communications" with Mr. Portman and Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. had made headway but that Mr. Cheney undercut progress by saying last month that the administration still opposed tax increases."

Meanwhile, Roll Call (2/8, Pierce) reports House Budget Chairman John Spratt "is quietly and methodically laying the groundwork to build support across the Democratic Caucus for a 2008 budget resolution that he hasn't even written yet." Spratt "said he already has engaged Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) in his plan to convince the diverse Caucus to help him pass a five-year balanced budget plan this spring." Spratt "acknowledged that Democrats, and himself in particular, are going to have a tough time balancing the budget with relatively limited funds."

Commenting on the upcoming debate, the Financial Times (2/8, Callan) notes Democrats "said the president's budget was filled with 'debt and deception' and 'disconnected from reality," but they "will almost undoubtedly mimic these alleged sleights of hand to conceal cracks in the US fiscal outlook when they present their own budget proposals next month. Party strategists said their proposals were still taking shape and would not be agreed until key committee chairmen met to work out the details by March 15. The plans would again be overhauled after that to produce a budget for next year in time for the real work of appropriating spending that gets under way in June." But "the budget priorities emerging at this early stage in the process suggest the party will postpone tackling many of the most divisive fiscal dilemmas facing policymakers – including changes to costly entitlement programmes and the president's $1,700bn (£867bn) tax cuts."

Budget Would Raise Agencies' IT Funding By 2.6 Percent. Under the headline, "Budget Keeps Tabs on Computer Security Risks," the Washington Post's (2/8, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column examines the work of Karen Evans, administrator of e-government and information technology for OMB who, when "the president releases a new budget," finds "herself in demand. She draws a crowd because, as the government's high-tech policy chief, she oversees big money for computer systems and other information technology investments. The fiscal 2008 budget proposes spending $65.5 billion on technology -- a handsome chunk of change by almost any standard." The Post adds, "Overall, fiscal 2008 spending on information technology in the government is increasing 2.6 percent from what Bush sought in fiscal 2007." The Post adds, "Under the president's budget," Evans said, "the government would spend about $46 billion this year on maintaining technology systems that support agency missions, and about $20 billion on projects to modernize or develop computer systems."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush Budget Plan. Under the headline "Mr. Bush's Improbable Budget," the New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) editorializes, "The budget is based on a series of improbable, if not dishonest, assumptions. To make it appear as if the tax cuts are affordable in the near term, it assumes that the Pentagon will not spend a single penny on Iraq or Afghanistan after 2009. It also assumes there will be no costs for fixing the alternative minimum tax after this year, even though Mr. Bush and virtually every politician in America is committed to such relief." The plan "has Bush's new budget has a few worthwhile nuggets, like a proposed increase in Pell grants for low-income college students and a jump in the funds for AIDS treatment worldwide. In drafting a real budget, Congress can take those items from the president's version, and jettison the rest."

Bush Budget Strategy Seen As Similar To Approach To Iraq. In the Wall Street Journal (2/8, 2.04M), David Wessel writes, "William Gale of the Brookings Institution think tank -- populated by deficit-fearing Democratic wonks who have been trying to find common ground with deficit-fearing Republican wonks -- has been thinking a lot lately about the parallels between Mr. Bush on Iraq and Mr. Bush on the budget." He argues, "The Bush administration's two signature policies have been the war in Iraq and consistent pressure for tax cuts. … On the surface, they look quite different and were advocated by different parts of the administration. Look a little deeper and some common patterns emerge -- so maybe this says something about the principles or management style of the Bush administration." Bush, says Gale, "took the US into Iraq with 'falsely rosy scenarios' about the post-Saddam landscape there, he says. Mr. Bush built his tax cuts in 2001 on a similarly unrealistic hope that the budget surplus was large enough to cut taxes without creating deficits."

GOP Fiscal Conservatives Ask Bush To Block CR Earmarks. Roll Call (2/8, Stanton) reports Senate Republican budget hawks "are urging President Bush to use an executive order or presidential signing statement to block some of their fellow lawmakers from adding earmarks or pet projects to the fiscal 2007 continuing resolution." The Senators' "call for help from the Bush administration comes as Senators, House Members and K Street lobbyists have begun pushing agencies to ensure funding for earmarks included in appropriations bills passed by the two chambers last year but never sent to the president." In a Feb. 7 letter to Bush, "the group of fiscal conservatives led by GOP Sens. Jim DeMint (S.C.) and Tom Coburn (Okla.) urged Bush to make good on his State of the Union pledge to oppose earmarks."

House Democrats Readying Tax Breaks To Accompany Minimum Wage Measure. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A3, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "House Democrats are preparing a $1 billion package of small-business tax breaks to be paired with an increase in the federal minimum wage, hoping to break a stalemate with the Senate over one of their top legislative priorities. In doing so, the House is likely to avoid many of the revenue increases passed by the Senate in its small-business tax package, increases that have caused heartburn for business groups and lawmakers in both parties." The House package "is far smaller than the $8 billion, 10-year package of tax breaks the Senate approved last week as part of its minimum-wage-increase package. Still, it represents a nod by the House to the Senate's insistence that tax breaks are needed to get Republican support sufficient to enact a phased-in, $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage."

McConnell Says Democrats Reversed Course On Medicare Drug Benefit. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/8, A14), Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell writes, "The Medicare drug benefit that Congress passed in 2003 and which took effect last January has exceeded every expectation. Not only is the program more popular than we imagined, it is also more flexible and less expensive." Four "out of five enrolled say they are satisfied, and why wouldn't they be? Monthly premiums, expected to cost $37, average $22. Part D is honored at 55,000 neighborhood pharmacies nationwide. Those who prefer home delivery can arrange for that, too. And critically, it covers nearly every drug approved by the FDA." But "some in Congress want to make over Part D to resemble the drug benefit program of the Veterans Administration, where the government sets a price on drugs that it can get at the cheapest rate and limits access to those it can't. As a result, the VA benefit excludes three out of four drugs available through Part D, including some of the most innovative treatments for arthritis, high cholesterol, breast cancer and other ailments." Both parties "used to oppose rationing." The "sudden reversal" by Democrats "is a mystery. Are Democrats unaware of their history on the issue? Are they unaware of the facts?"

SMU Faculty Rejects Faculty Referendum Over Bush Library. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports, "The Faculty Senate at Southern Methodist University in Dallas rejected a proposal yesterday for a faculty referendum on plans for an independent policy institute on campus that would accompany President Bush's future library and museum." The university notes "more than 170 faculty members, about a quarter of the full-time professors on campus, signed a petition calling for a referendum because the proposed institute would be controlled by the Bush Foundation, not the university. … Other faculty members and many students have expressed support for the institute and library."

Pelosi Draws Fire For Seeking Use Of Large Military Aircraft. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's effort to arrange for a secure military airplane, first noted skeptically in the conservative Washington Times, has begun to attract critical attention even from mainstream media outlets.

The CBS Evening News reported the story "has Washington buzzing tonight. At a time when they're cracking down on congressional perks, the new Speaker of the House is apparently asking for a big travel upgrade." CBS (Attkisson) added, "Ever since 9/11, a small military jet like this has been made available to transport the speaker of the House for security reasons. The speaker is second in the line of succession to the presidency. Back then, it was Republican Dennis Hastert. Now it's Democrat Nancy Pelosi, but she may be getting a little more leg room. Speaker Pelosi is reportedly asking for a much bigger jet, a government version of the Boeing 757 that can make the trip between Washington and her San Francisco home without stopping to refuel. The Speaker's critics have dubbed it 'Pelosi One.' Military officials are said to be grumbling about it and the Speaker finds herself on the defensive. Today she insisted size doesn't really matter." Speaker Pelosi: "It's not a question of size, it's a question of distance. We want an aircraft that can reach California." Attkisson: "But an aircraft like that can comfortably seat 50 and Republican leader Roy Blunt is among those questioning how all those extra seats might get filled." Rep. Blunt: "If you can say to your supporters, 'Do you want to fly with me from San Francisco this week, spend a week in New York and then fly with me back in,' that's an incredible perk, an incredible fund-raising tool." Attkisson: "Pelosi's office told us she'll follow all the appropriate guidelines. The problem is there aren't any yet. Because of the flak, the Department is said to be quickly writing rules for the speaker's plane, everything from size to who can go along for the ride."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Fiore, Barnes, 850K) reports Pelosi's "people say she just wants to get home to California now and then and would like to do it in a plane that can make it all the way without stopping to refuel." But Pelosi's "conservative critics say the San Francisco Democrat is abusing the perks of power by attempting to commandeer a fancy jumbo-size military jet with a 'distinguished visitor compartment with sleep accommodations.'" The "flap over how the House speaker gets around has been circling over Washington since last week, but was largely ignored until Wednesday when, as things tend to do on a slow news day in the nation's capital, it exploded." Pelosi supporters "charge that the controversy is being fueled by GOP opponents who are still burning over an election loss that stemmed from Pelosi's charges of a 'culture of corruption' in Congress."

McClatchy (2/8, Talev) reports, "Republicans charge that she's trying to abuse the privileges of office. Pelosi, a California Democrat, denies doing anything wrong and says such slurs could be coming only from the White House." Still, "it's a potential image problem for the first female speaker - already caricatured for her wealth, love of designer clothes and chocolate obsession - to be portrayed as thinking she deserves her own Air Force Three." Republican "complaints about Pelosi's jet draw on recent articles in The Washington Times, a conservative newspaper in the nation's capital, that cited unnamed sources."

Defense Department Sets Limits On Pelosi Plane Use. The Washington Times (2/8, Hurt, Scarborough, 88K) reports the Department of Defense "sent a letter to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that puts limits on the size of the plane she may use to travel across the country and restricts the guests she can bring, The Washington Times has learned." A congressional source "who read the letter signed by Assistant Secretary of Defense Robert Wilkie said it essentially limits her to the commuter plane used by former Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, which requires refueling to travel from Washington to Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district. A second source, in the Bush administration, confirmed the contents of the letter." The letter "leaves open the possibility that Mrs. Pelosi may get a larger plane that does not require refueling if one happens to be available in the 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force Base. But, generally, the larger military passenger jets are in high demand, especially due to the Iraq war."

Indicted New Jersey Attorney Was Guest At White House Holiday Party. Bloomberg (2/8, Voreacos, Glovin) reports, "President George W. Bush invited an indicted New Jersey lawyer to a White House holiday party less than two months after the attorney was charged with immigration fraud, court records show." Bloomberg continues, "Jonathan Saint-Preux was indicted on Oct. 5 with his wife, Michele, and another man on federal charges that they submitted fraudulent documents to help hundreds of undocumented immigrants stay in the U.S. Saint-Preux, who pleaded innocent, attended the White House party on Nov. 30, said his attorney, Patrick Toscano. … U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden in Newark, New Jersey, signed an order granting permission for Saint-Preux 'to travel to Washington DC to attend a function at the White House at the request of President and Mrs. Bush.' A Justice Department prosecutor consented to the trip, court records show. … 'He was at a Christmas party,' Michele Saint-Preux said in an interview yesterday at her husband's office in Irvington, New Jersey, where she is the manager. 'He's been doing political work with the White House for years.' … Michele Saint-Preux said her husband also did political work to support former President Bill Clinton." Bloomberg adds, "White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore didn't have details on why Saint-Preux was invited to the party. 'Thousands of people attend the White House holiday parties,' she said. … 'I doubt very highly that if the president was aware that Mr. Saint-Preux was having legal problems here in New Jersey, he would have been invited,' Toscano said in an interview yesterday. … Toscano and Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Lurie signed a consent order that allowed Saint-Preux to take the trip. Hayden approved that order on Dec. 1. Saint-Preux is free on $250,000 bail and is not supposed to leave New Jersey without a judge's authorization. It wasn't clear why Hayden signed the order on Dec. 1, the day after the party. … 'This is the sort of request that we get routinely from defense lawyers wanting to relax the bail restrictions because of business, family, or social reasons,' said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie in Newark. … According to the indictment, Saint-Preux, his wife, and a man who recruited clients for him, Naranjan Patel, lied on immigration documents. They claimed the immigrants had lived continuously in the U.S. from before 1982 until at least May 1987, prosecutors said. Prosecutors claim the ruse was intended to help immigrants qualify for legal residency under a U.S. amnesty program."

Miller Denies Corruption Allegations At Closed-Door GOP Caucus Meeting. The Hill (2/8, Crabtree) reports California Rep. Gary Miller (R) "passionately pleaded his innocence before GOP colleagues at a closed-door conference meeting Tuesday, nearly a week after several media outlets reported that the FBI is looking into his land deals. Miller told colleagues that the press and Democrats had launched a smear campaign against him, singling out The Hill and the Los Angeles Times as perpetrators, as well as a former Democratic mayor of the Southern California city of Monrovia, Lara Larramendi Blakely, who now works for Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), according to GOP sources." The Hill notes Minority Leader John Boehner "tried to reassure members at the conference meeting Tuesday with regard to the FBI review of Miller's land deals, as well as an ongoing FBI probe of Rep. Jerry Lewis's (R-Calif.) relationship to a lobbying firm and its contracts. … Boehner told the conference that he believed that the legal precept of innocent until proven guilty should prevail."

House Panel To Probe SBA. The New York Times (2/8, Nixon, 1.16M) reports, "A House committee is holding the first of several hearings today to discuss the Small Business Administration, an agency that has come under criticism for its disaster relief program in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, as well as its operating, lending and contracting practices." Rep. Nydia M. Velásquez, chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, "said that the hearings would look into other issues, including recent disclosures that federal investigators have accused a lender in an S.B.A. program of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years." The administrator, Steven C. Preston, "is scheduled to appear at today's hearing, which will also address budget and staffing issues. An internal memo prepared by the agency's chief financial officer in January said that the S.B.A. had dropped below its minimal staffing levels because of budget shortfalls."

Frank Legislation Would Increase Control Over Foreign-Led Transactions In US. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "Senior House members signaled intention to push forward with legislation tightening US scrutiny of foreign-led transactions, despite Bush administration concerns over a potential chilling effect on the nation's investment climate." In testimony before the House Financial Services Committee, Clay Lowery, the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for international affairs, "said the efforts on Capitol Hill are being closely watched abroad, especially in the wake of last year's tumult over a Dubai company's bid to take control of several American port operations." House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank "said he intends to move legislation, which has wide, bipartisan support, through his committee next week, and to the House floor soon after. He suggested action could calm concern in the business community over the issue and bring certainty to the marketplace by clarifying how deals would be reviewed."

Norwood To Receive Hospice Care For Lung, Liver Cancer. USA Today (2/8, 10A, 2.27M) reports Republican Rep. Charles Norwood "is going home to Augusta for hospice care, forgoing further treatment for lung cancer that has spread to his liver, spokesman John Stone said." Stone said Norwood is not resigning, adding, "He said, 'Let me go back home, stop all the treatments and just see how I can do there.'"

Roll Call (2/8, Whittington) reports Rep. Norwood, "who has been hospitalized as he battles complications from a debilitating lung disease and lung cancer, has decided to forgo further medical treatment in Washington, D.C., and will return to his Augusta home for hospice care." Norwood had "been receiving chemotherapy treatments since last fall that have caused him to become extremely ill." While those "close to Norwood continue to dismiss any talk that he might resign, the Congressman's ailing health has led to subtle, and not so subtle, speculation back in his Northeastern Georgia district about who is interested in succeeding Norwood should he not seek another term in 2008." Republican state Reps. Barry Fleming and Ben Harbin and former state Sen. Brian Kemp (R) "are mentioned as possible candidates to succeed Norwood."

Congress' Work Week Extended, But Not Strenuous. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (2/8, A2), Dana Milbank says, "Is there no rest for the weary lawmaker? 'Members Resist Five-Day Workweek,' one of the Capitol Hill newspapers proclaimed on its front page yesterday. Senators were 'ready to revolt' and House members were 'simmering' over their legislative demands." The new Congress "has a problem. The just-empowered Democrats have declared that lawmakers will work five-day weeks like most other Americans. But, at this early date, there isn't much legislation ready for passage -- so what little there is has to be stretched out to fill the week." The House, "which will hold its Iraq war debate next week, will extend that discussion by giving five minutes of floor time to all 435 members. And in the Senate, the pace is so lethargic that Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) told colleagues late Tuesday that he would give them an extra week of vacation if they would take up the legislation he wants."

Bushes Attend Farewell Reception For White House Chief Of Protocol. The Washington Post (2/8, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "George and Laura Bush walked (walked!) across the street to Blair House last night and actually mingled with more than 100 guests at the farewell reception for Chief of Protocol Donald Ensenat and his wife, Taylor."

Productivity Growth Up In 4th Quarter, But May Be Slowing Overall. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A7, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "US productivity growth rebounded in the fourth quarter of 2006 but still appears to be slowing overall, clouding the outlook for economic growth, inflation and corporate profits in the months ahead. Nonfarm labor productivity -- a measure of the average worker's output per hour -- rose at an annual rate of 3% in the fourth quarter, bouncing back from an unusual decline of 0.1% in the previous quarter, the Labor Department reported." Growth in labor costs "per each unit of output, meanwhile, slowed to an annual rate of 1.7% in the quarter from the third quarter's 3.2%. … So far, slowing productivity growth and rising labor costs haven't crimped corporate profits, but that seems likely to change."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 6, :10 Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today the blue chips managed to skip out a tiny gain. The Dow finishing the day up about half a point [to close at 12,666.87]. Nadsaq gained 19 points [to close at 2,490.50] on today's trading." USA Today (2/8, 5B, 2.27M) and Wall Street Journal (2/8, C1, Browning, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers.

Emerging Markets Expected To Challenge US Dominance. USA Today (2/8, 1B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that "emerging markets, once known dismissively as the Third World, are now central to Americans' lives. Not long ago, these countries were of interest only to the Peace Corps. Now, everything from the financial lifeline that makes possible the modern American lifestyle to the identity of your next boss, customer, competitor or cultural trendsetter likely can be found in the developing world." USA Today adds, "The new prominence of emerging markets represents a sharp departure from the flurry of financial crises that tore through Mexico, Asia and Russia in the 1990s. … China alone sits atop a $1 trillion mountain of cash. Russia, Mexico, India and South Korea also are swiftly building their cash hoards, according to Treasury Department data." Developing nations "have gone from beggar to banker. The US must borrow enormous sums each day to finance the gap between its anemic national savings rate and its consumption. Increasingly, those funds -- largely raised by selling Treasury securities -- come from poorer nations."

Wal-Mart, Unions Press For Affordable Healthcare. A coalition including Wal-Mart, the Service Employees International Union, AT&T, Intel, Kelly Services Inc., and the Communications Workers of America called for affordable health insurance Wednesday. Reports in major papers, including the New York Times (2/8, Barbaro, Pear, 1.16M), USA Today (2/8, 2B, Appleby, 2.27M), the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Maher, 2.04M), and the Washington Post (2/8, D1, Mui, Russakoff, 690K), emphasize that the groups traditionally oppose each other on major issues. For example, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Maher, 2.04M) reports, "Yesterday's announcement in Washington united Wal-Mart Chief Executive H. Lee Scott and Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, who has criticized the Bentonville, Ark., retailer's pay and benefit policies. The inclusion of Wal-Mart, the nation's largest private employer and an industry bellwether, in any push to overhaul health care is significant." The New York Times (2/8, Barbaro, Pear, 1.16M) reports that the "extraordinary" meeting "could be the beginning, however tentative, of a détente between the nation's largest employer and its labor critics," but says "[t]he agreement is unlikely to end the rancor between Wal-Mart and unions, largely because the retailer's fiercest critic is the United Food and Commercial Workers, the union behind WakeUpWalMart.com."

USA Today (2/8, 2B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "The groups did not offer details of how to change the system, laying out instead four broad principles: Every person must have insurance; businesses, government and individuals must help pay for it; people have a responsibility to maintain their health; and the health system must become more efficient."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Maher, 2.04M) adds, "While there is interest in doing something about the uninsured, consensus is lacking on what should be done, how much money to spend and how many Americans to try to cover. The new partnership offers no solution, only general goals, such as that individuals, business and government 'all should contribute to managing and financing a new American health- care system.' Wal-Mart remained noncommittal yesterday as to who should take the lead."

Criticism Of Wal-Mart Noted. The Washington Post (2/8, D1, Mui, Russakoff, 690K) reports, "Wal-Mart used to be noticeable for its absence from business coalitions calling for government help with the health-care crisis. As the rising cost of employee medical care staggered other large companies, Wal-Mart, which did not provide health coverage for the majority of its employees, was silent. But during a national crisis over the growing ranks of uninsured workers, Wal-Mart quickly became a target. … Change began in 2005 after Wal-Mart created a health-care plan with premiums of $11 per month. In a speech to the National Governors Association a year ago, Scott announced other major concessions, including reducing the eligibility requirement for part-time employees from two years to one and adding coverage for their children. But he also wanted help from government leaders and other groups to make substantive changes to the country's health policies. The speech caught Stern's attention. He was also impressed by Wal-Mart's efforts in environmental sustainability, in which it had worked with activist groups such as the Rocky Mountain Institute and TransFair USA."

The AP (2/8, Caterinicchia) reports, "Stern said the SEIU would continue to fund its Wal-Mart Watch campaign, which as recently as last month said Wal-Mart's health plans were a raw deal for employees. Stern said he expects to be criticized for teaming up with Wal-Mart, but that he felt it was in the best interest of workers who lack coverage, and their families."

In GOP Race For President, McCain Drops, While Giuliani Climbs. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Feldmann, 59K) reports that while polls have long shown Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) and ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) as the frontrunners in the '08 GOP race for president, "pundits have tended to discount Mr. Giuliani's chances, given his liberal stands on social issues such as abortion and gay rights. Now, a combination of factors is forcing a new look at both Senator McCain's vulnerabilities, particularly over his steadfast support for an unpopular Iraq war, and Giuliani's potential to overcome weaknesses. For the first time since October 1999, McCain's favorability rating among American voters has dropped below 50 percent. A Gallup poll taken last month showed him at 48 percent, down 6 points from November." Giuliani, meanwhile, "has held above 60 percent favorability in Gallup polls, most recently at 62 percent." The Monitor notes, "For Giuliani, winning over enough of the conservative Republican base to secure the nomination has long been seen as a potentially insurmountable task. But now, analysts say, it's possible that Republican-leaning independents could make the difference in the early GOP primaries." New Hampshire-based pollster Dick Bennett of ARG said that McCain's problem "is that he has lost some of his luster as the 'maverick.' … That is hurting him in particular among independents, says Mr. Bennett. The problem is Iraq. 'They view McCain and Bush in the Iraq situation together,' he says."

Mormon Romney Confident His Religion Won't Undermine Presidential Hopes. The New York Times (2/8, Nagourney, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports that ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), a presidential hopeful, "is facing a threshold issue: Will his" Mormon religion "be a big obstacle to winning the White House? Polls show a substantial number of Americans will not vote for a Mormon for president. The religion is viewed with suspicion by Christian conservatives." While "Romney's advisers acknowledged that popular misconceptions about Mormonism…could give his opponents ammunition in the" GOP battle "to become the consensus candidate of social conservatives," Romney, in an interview "last week, expressed confidence that he could quell concerns about his faith, pointing to his own experience winning in Massachusetts. … 'People have interest early on in your religion and any similar element of your background,' he said. 'But as soon as they begin to watch you on TV and see the debates and hear you talking about issues, they are overwhelmingly concerned with your vision of the future and the leadership skills that you can bring to bear.'" That said, Romney "has set up a meeting this month in Florida with 100 ministers and religious broadcasters. That gathering follows what was by all accounts a successful meeting at his home last fall with evangelical leaders, including the Rev. Jerry Falwell" and "the Rev. Franklin Graham." Romney also "said he was giving strong consideration to a public address about his faith and political views, modeled after the one John F. Kennedy gave in 1960 in the face of a wave of concern about his being a Roman Catholic."

With Criticism Of Campaign-Finance Reform, Romney Reverses Field. The Hill (2/8, Bolton) reports that Romney, "who strongly criticized campaign-finance regulations in a private meeting with House conservatives last week, once touted dramatic restructuring measures such as taxing political contributions and placing spending limits on federal campaigns. Romney's past positions on campaign-finance regulation, anathema to many social conservatives who believe such rules place unconstitutional limits on free speech, could complicate his ongoing efforts to court conservative leaders." The Hill relates, "At a private meeting with conservative House Republicans in Baltimore Friday, Romney "specifically criticized the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act sponsored by his rival for the GOP presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). 'Referring to the bill, [Romney] called it 'one of the worst things in my lifetime,'' one conservative Republican said. 'The place erupted. That was by far the biggest applause line.'" The Hill notes, however, "A review of Romney's public statements from his 1994 senatorial and 2002 gubernatorial campaigns reveal that he once touted stringent campaign-finance modifications." For example, "a Boston Globe article from July 1994 reported that Romney publicly advocated placing spending limits on congressional campaigns and abolishing political action committees (PACs)," and "the Quincy Patriot Ledger and the Worcester Telegram & Gazette reported in the fall of 2002 that Romney proposed taxing political contributions to finance publicly funded campaigns."

Obama Wants To Preserve Public Financing Option. The AP (2/8, Pickler) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama is "asking whether he can take money from donors who want him to be president, then give it back later. The Federal Election Commission said Wednesday that it will look into the novel question." Obama is "indicating that he wants to at least keep the option of using the public financing system for his presidential campaign if he becomes the Democratic nominee. To do so, the Illinois senator could not spend any money from contributors for political purposes, but instead use federal funding that is expected to total about $85 million for next year's general election." Obama has "decided to raise unlimited private contributions for the primary and general campaigns, following the lead of chief Democratic rivals Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards." But Obama's lawyer, Robert Bauer, "suggested in an advisory opinion request to the FEC that Obama may want to participate in the public financing system for the general election if he's nominated and the Republican candidate agreed to do the same."

The New York Times (2/8, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports if Obama "won the Democratic nomination, he could then strike a deal with the Republican nominee to return their private donations and use only public money for the general election. For 2008, that would limit each general election campaign to about $85 million." It is "unclear how plausible such a truce might be. A candidate with a much bigger bank account at the start of the general election would be reluctant to relinquish that advantage." Obama's filing "raises delicate questions for some of his rivals. Three of them — Mrs. Clinton and John Edwards among the Democrats, and Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona — have begun raising private contributions outside the public financing system. All three have said they value the public financing system and support updating it to keep it alive."

The Washington Post (2/8, A9, Cillizza, Mosk, 690K) reports Dan Pfeiffer, "a spokesman for Obama, said the senator's filing is intended to 'preserve the public financing option for the party's nominees.' Other aides explained that the request is aimed at defining what Obama can and cannot do in a murky area of campaign finance law." Until now, candidates "have accepted that once they start to raise a separate pool of money for the general election, they have committed to running without federal matching funds. Obama's filing questions that assumption."

McConnell Urges Scrapping Public Finance System. In a USA Today op-ed (2/8, 14A), Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell says, "The recent decision by a number of presidential aspirants not to dip into the public trough for campaign funds is a clear sign of just how expensive national elections have become. It's also a sign that the current system of public funding for private campaigns is on its way out. This is as it should be." Congress should follow the candidates' "lead — and that of nearly every American taxpayer— and do away with the current public financing system once and for all."

USA Today Praises Public Finance For Campaigns. USA Today (2/8, 14A, 2.27M) says in an editorial, "Seven states (Arizona, Connecticut, Maine, North Carolina, New Jersey, New Mexico and Vermont)and two cities (Albuquerque and Portland, Ore.) are using or preparing to use public funding for some or all races. Politicians who accept public funds must agree not to raise more money and to abide by strict spending limits. Opponents of this practice — incumbents, lobbyists, others seeking power — make hay deriding this as 'welfare for politicians.' Hardly. Candidates can spend more time with voters, and those who win office don't have to check with moneyed interests before taking action."

Seton Hall Law Professor To Serve As Policy Director For Obama Campaign. The Hill (2/8, Youngman) profiles Seton Hall law professor Mark Alexander, who "is signing on to Obama's 2008 presidential campaign as policy director." Alexander, a "Yale graduate and friend of Obama's for 10 to 12 years," said "he takes issue with those who might question Obama's depth of policy knowledge. 'I don't think he's short on substance at all,' Alexander said." Alexander "worked as issues director for then-Sen. Bill

Bradley's (D-N.J.) 2000 presidential campaign," and "for Sen. Edward Kennedy's (D-Mass.) 1988 reelection campaign, and most recently served as general counsel to new Newark Mayor Cory Booker's campaign. His primary areas of study lie in First Amendment free-speech issues, election law and campaign finance reform." The Hill notes, "With a crowded field that includes" New York Sen. Hillary Clinton(D) and ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D), "as well as hefty-résumé-wielding candidates such as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Obama needs to avoid any early policy missteps lest his critics and opponents successfully paint him as too inexperienced for the job, according to political analyst Charlie Cook. 'When you've got a presidential candidate who has to dispel notions of inexperience…having a strong policy director that avoids mistakes and avoids painting the candidate into a corner is incredibly important,' Cook said. 'Obama can't afford any serious policy mistakes.'"

WPost Calls On Hillary Clinton To Identify "Bundlers." The Washington Post (2/8, A20, 690K) says in an editorial, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had a party at her house the other night for an elite group: about 70 fundraisers who agreed to raise at least $250,000 -- and some as much as $1 million -- for her presidential campaign. That soiree and a meeting for lower-level fundraisers ($25,000 and up) prompts us to raise again the question that we couldn't get the Clinton campaign to answer the other day. What are the candidate's plans to release the names of her big bundlers? Will she meet the standard of disclosure set by President Bush and every 2004 Democratic presidential contender except John Edwards and make the fundraisers' identities available? So far -- though we've been putting this question to the Clinton campaign since last Friday by telephone and by e-mail -- we haven't gotten an answer."

LATimes Urges Pelosi To Back Bundling Disclosure. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, 850K) says in an editorial, "Unlike their other activities, bundling by lobbyists is not a matter of public record." It "would be public under the Senate ethics bill and a similar House proposal by Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Martin Meehan (D-Mass.)." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has promised that the 110th Congress would be 'the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history.' She can make good on that pledge by steeling her colleagues to resist the importuning of lobbyists — and their own worse instincts — and join the Senate in shining light on bundling."

Democratic Leaders Support Edwards' Plan To Boost Taxes. The Washington Times (2/8, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic state chairmen yesterday said they support former Sen. John Edwards' plan to increase taxes on upper-income Americans if he wins the presidency in 2008, a plan backed by the party's House and Senate leaders. Those who responded to a survey of Democratic chairmen across the country said they approved of the plan presented Sunday by" Edwards "on NBC's 'Meet the Press' to raise the top tax rates on salaries of more than $200,000 and possibly other tax levies as well. But many state party leaders don't want to step into the politically charged issue of raising taxes, at least at this early juncture in the presidential-election cycle -- even if their party's congressional leadership has embraced the idea." For example, Louisiana Democratic Chairman Chris Wittington said, "Raising taxes is a really tough decision, but I think Edwards is just being realistic, considering the Iraq war costs and the war debt we've got. … If he's starting at $200,000, there aren't many of those people at that level in Louisiana who would be affected by it." However, Wittington "cautioned that just talking generally about raising taxes was politically risky. 'He's got to define his message to make sure he's clear about who will be affected,'" he said.

Anti-Poverty Message Seen As Contrasting With Edwards' Lavish Home. The AP (2/8, Baker) reports, "Two homes, two images, one candidate. Democrat John Edwards, who has made an anti-poverty message the theme of his 2008 presidential campaign, is taking heat for the lavish home he has constructed in Orange County, N.C. In December, Edwards chose the modest backyard of a New Orleans woman who had lost her home to Hurricane Katrina as the image that best underscored his campaign theme. Now voters are seeing another, sharply contrasting image of Edwards: his own home. Sitting on 102 secluded acres -- surrounded by trees and defended by no-trespassing signs -- the 28,000-square-foot estate that Edwards and his family call home has presidential privacy." The AP notes, "With a current building value of $4.3 million, the unfinished Edwards estate is already about $1 million more expensive than any other house in the county, according to tax records. It sits on land worth about $1.1 million." Edwards "has faced criticism regarding the estate. It also has become the subject of late-night jokes. 'Well, I think we know which America he's living in,' Jay Leno quipped on NBC's 'Tonight Show,' a riff of Edwards' frequent mention of the 'two Americas' -- one for the wealthy and one for the poor."

An Angry Matthews Says It's Time For A President Who Doesn't Own A Ranch. The Washington Times (2/8, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "MSNBC's Chris Matthews has 'lurched even further off the deep end,' said Rich Noyes of the Media Research Center who chronicled Mr. Matthews' appearance yesterday on 'Imus in the Morning.'" Matthews, "who appeared by phone, went on a rant declaring how he's 'sick of Southern guys with ranches running this country.' Losing control, Matthews dropped the F-bomb on national television: 'I want a guy to run for president who doesn't have a [expletive] I'm sorry, a ranch.' As host Don Imus began to snicker, Matthews plowed ahead with his Democratic talking points: 'Wouldn't that be good, Don, a guy who wasn't on the ranch during Katrina, he was on the street corner answering questions?'"

New York Police Gave RNC Protestors Additional Scrutiny. The New York Times (2/8, Dwyer, 1.16M) reports that when "more than a thousand people were swept up in mass arrests during the 2004 Republican National Convention, defense lawyers complained in court that the protesters had to wait much longer to see a judge than those accused of far more serious crimes like robbery or assault." Newly released "city records not only put precise numbers to those claims, but also show the special scrutiny the New York Police Department gave to people arrested in or near the convention protests." Donna Lieberman of the New York Civil Liberties Union said, "We found out that the Police Department had a special set of rules in place for the R.N.C., and they didn't necessarily comport with the law."

Theft By Campaign Treasurers Not Uncommon. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A1, Cummings, 2.04M) reports Florida Republican Nancy Detert "had two days to register her candidacy for Congress last April when she got a disturbing email from her secretary: Ms. Detert's campaign treasurer was missing." Court records "show that Randolph Maddox, the treasurer, had transferred $94,000 from the Detert campaign's Wachovia Bank account in Venice, Fla., to a Bank of America account he controlled in another county. Then he withdrew the money in cash, stuffed it into two carry-on bags and flew to Buenos Aires." What "happened to Ms. Detert isn't uncommon in campaigns because candidates trust friends to handle their money and often don't look too carefully at their work. Thanks to the Detert case, the Federal Election Commission is poised to pass new guidelines to strengthen campaign fund-raising operations. But even those changes will amount to 'bake-sale level oversight,' says FEC Vice Chairman David Mason."

Railroad Industry Hiring Relatives Of Lawmakers, Staff. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Williamson, 690K) reports the railroad industry "is hiring relatives of Capitol Hill lawmakers and staff members as it faces tighter federal safety legislation, employing a tactic untouched by the Democrats' new ethics proposals: lobbying by congressional family members." The new Democratic Congress "is working on the first overhaul of railroad-safety laws in 13 years. Long attuned to Republican control, railroad companies are now working to keep their GOP allies but also hiring Democratic lobbyists." Days "after Jennifer Esposito became majority staff director of the House transportation panel's subcommittee on railroads, her father, Sante Esposito, and brother Michael Esposito signed up as railway lobbyists." Rep. Daniel Lipinski (D-Ill.) has "just taken a seat on the subcommittee, and in the coming weeks, the railroad industry trade association said, his father and predecessor in Congress, William O. Lipinski (D-Ill.), will register as a railroad lobbyist, too."

New Ethics Rules Seen As Burden To Charities. The Washington Post (2/8, A19, Romano, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Anxiety over the new House ethics rules ratcheted up this week as lawmakers' spouses demanded clarification of whether the rules apply to them, and eight House members backed out of a fundraising gala for a major theatrical company when ethics lawyers stated that they could not attend as guests." At a "packed ethics briefing for congressional spouses last weekend, a number of wives struggled to understand whether the complicated rules would prevent them from accepting free tickets to bona fide charity events -- particularly those in which they were involved or served as chairmen." Ethics lawyers "and Hill staffers tried to dispel the uncertainty by explaining that spouses must adhere to the same rules, unless they are invited to an event by virtue of their own stature or job." Hill employees, spouses and "charity organizers complained this week that the new rule on gifts is an exceptional burden to charities -- which are known as 501(c)3s under the federal tax law and are tax-exempt -- because they depend mightily on House members' celebrity to sell tickets and raise money."

Cuban Americans Planning For Life After Castro. The Washington Times (2/8, Gentile, 88K) reports several rumors of Fidel Castro's death "have swept through Miami since Mr. Castro fell ill in July, only to be dashed with the release of videos showing a frail but indisputably living Cuban leader, most recently receiving a visit from Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez." That has "not deterred Miami's Cuban-Americans from planning and preparing for the dictator's death. Some say they intend to return to the island, while others anticipate that thousands of Cuban refugees will stream into southern Florida." Others are "preparing more pragmatically for the post-Castro Cuba. Business and legal leaders say they have already started working on ways to address a tangle of property-rights issues dating from the start of the Cuban revolution, when the communists seized and redistributed private land."

Kennedy Allegedly Offered To Aid Soviet Public Relations In US. In a Washington Times op-ed (2/8), a retired CIA analyst writing under the pseudonym John Smith says, "In 1983, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy offered to help the Soviets mount a public-relations offensive in the United States. This propaganda attack would target President Reagan and his policies. These are the same policies that eventually ended the Cold War and reduced the possibility of nuclear annihilation. This charge was made by Paul Kengor in his book 'The Crusader: Ronald Reagan and the Fall of Communism.'" The "bottom line is that if there is any shred of truth in these documented stories, the senator from Massachusetts, as well as any other compromised politicians, should resign or be kicked out of the Senate or Congress."

Daley's Lease Of City Assets Examined. In his Washington Post column (2/8, A21), George Will says Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley has "become an accomplished practitioner of today's new wrinkle in public finance." Chicago "became the first city to sell a toll road. Actually, it has leased the road for 99 years, which is much the same as selling it. The 7.8-mile, six-lane Skyway goes from the Indiana Toll Road (which the state of Indiana last year leased for 75 years to a Spanish-Australian group for $3.85 billion) to Chicago's Dan Ryan Expressway." Skyway was "still a sufficiently attractive investment to have drawn $1.83 billion from the same consortium that leased the Indiana Toll Road." By "selling future revenue streams, Daley believes, the city can ignite a virtuous cycle: Buying improvements 'as quickly as possible' in education and infrastructure can lure people back to the city, thereby improving the city's tax base and cultural vibrancy, which enables further improvements that attract still more residents."

Rice Says Military Must Fill Civilian Jobs In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/8, A18, DeYoung, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Congress yesterday "that more than 40 percent of nearly 300 State Department positions to be added in Iraq as part of President Bush's new strategy will have to be filled by military personnel." During testimony before the House Foreign Relations Committee yesterday morning, Rice said, "Frankly, the agencies of the US government cannot fill that many posts" as quickly as necessary, noting that "our agreement with the Department of Defense was that for a period of time...we would actually use reservists to fill those positions." In a Senate hearing Tuesday, Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said that he shares the concerns raised by senior military officers over a Rice memo detailing the request." State Department officials "expressed surprise" yesterday at Gates's remarks. However, Rice "insisted there is no controversy."

Under the headline "Few Veteran Diplomats Accept Mission To Iraq," the New York Times (2/8, A12, Cooper, 1.16M) reports, "While the diplomats and Foreign Service employees of the State Department have always been expected to staff 'hardship' postings, those jobs have not usually required that they wear flak jackets with their pinstriped suits." But now with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the White House "is calling for more American civilians to head not only to those countries, but also to some of their most hostile regions -- including Iraq's volatile Anbar Province -- to try to establish democratic institutions and help in reconstruction. That plan is provoking unease and apprehension at the State Department and at other federal agencies." While Secretary Rice said Wednesday that State Department employees were "volunteering in large numbers" for difficult posts, including Iraq, "several department employees said that those who had signed up tended to be younger, more entry-level types, and not experienced, seasoned diplomats." The reluctance "highlights a problem with the administration's new strategy for Iraq, which calls on American diplomats to take challenges on a scale unmatched anywhere else in the world, when the lack of security on the ground outside the Green Zone makes it one of the last places people, particularly those with families, want to go."

Rice Pressed For Evidence On Iran. AFP (2/8) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "faced a blistering challenge in Congress over the administration's failure to provide evidence to back up allegations Iran is building nuclear weapons and fueling attacks on US forces in Iraq." Rep. Ron Paul (R-TX) said, "Unproven charges against Iran's nuclear intentions are eerily reminiscent of the false charges made against Iraq before we invaded that country." He also warned that "unproven accusations of Iranian support for the Iraqi insurgency" were also serving as a pretext for "escalating our sharp rhetoric toward Iran." However, Rice rejected suggestions the Administration is "planning or intending an attack on Iran." Instead, she insisted the Administration is "responding to a number of Iranian policies both in Iran and around the world that are actually quite dangerous for our national security." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, meanwhile, said the Administration would reveal its evidence of Iranian involvement in Iraq "on our own timeline."

Rice Disputes Claim Of Iranian Overture. The AP (2/8, Gearan) reports Rice "disputed claims Wednesday that the Bush administration bungled a diplomatic overture from Iran that offered a broad dialogue" with the United States in 2003. Rice told Congress she "does not remember seeing the 2003 Iranian proposal, which suggested Iran was ready to discuss its disputed nuclear program, support for militant groups that the United States labels terrorists and the acceptance of Israel." During House testimony, Rice said, "We had people who said the Iranians went to talk to you… But I think I would have noticed if the Iranians had said, 'We're ready to recognize Israel.'"

The Washington Post (2/8, A18, Kessler, 690K) adds "former administration officials have said the proposal was discussed and ultimately rejected by top U.S. officials," including "Rice, who was then national security adviser." The Post says Rice's comments "add a new level of complexity to an issue that has generated debate among foreign policy experts: Did the Bush administration forgo a chance to pursue a dialogue with Iran shortly after the fall of Baghdad, when US power seemed at its height?"

US Reiterates Calls For Europe To Tighten Iran Sanctions. The Financial Times (2/8, Fidler) reports Washington on Wednesday "voiced its growing frustration over the failure of European governments to toughen financial sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program." Differences over the sanctions between Washington and European governments "threaten to open a new transatlantic division" over how to deal with Tehran's nuclear program. US Ambassador to the IAEA, Gregory Schulte, "went public with Washington's complaints, saying the Europeans should do more," saying during an address in Munich, "Faced by the defiance of Iran's leadership, the European Union and European countries can do more -- and should do more -- to bolster our common diplomacy. Why, for example, are European governments using export credits to subsidise exports to Iran? Why, for example, are European governments not taking more measures to discourage investment and financial transactions?" The ambassador said Europe should use "the full range of non- military measures at its disposal" to put pressure on Iran's leadership.

Iranians "Uneasy" With Ahmadinejad's Nuclear Diplomacy. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Murphy, 850K) reports, "Iran's leadership is facing mounting public unease and the seeds of mutiny in the parliament over the combative nature of its nuclear diplomacy." For the "first time," there is "broad, open criticism" of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiance of the Bush administration and United Nations Security Council. Warnings have "emerged that the public may not be prepared to support the Islamic regime through a war." The "mounting dissent, however, does not appear to have chipped away at Iran's determination to maintain an active nuclear program, according to politicians, diplomats and political analysts" in Tehran. But those observers say it "opens the door to a face-saving compromise and signals that a broad range of Iranians hope to avoid an all-out confrontation."

Webb Says Deployment Of Carrier Raises Tensions. In an interview with MSNBC's Hardball (2/7, Matthews), Sen. Jim Webb said, "When I was Secretary of the Navy and until very recently, we never operated aircraft carriers inside the Persian Gulf" in part because "the chance of accidentally bumping into something that would start a diplomatic situation was pretty high. We now have been doing that, and with the tensions as high as they are, I'm very worried that we might accidentally set something off in there and we need, as a Congress, to get ahead of the ball game here."

More Commentary On Iran. In a New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) op-ed, Iranian ambassador to the UN Javad Zarif writes, "The United States administration is -- unfortunately -- reaping the expected bitter fruits of its ill-conceived adventurism" in Iraq, "taking the region and the world with it to the brink of further hostility. … The United States administration is trying to sell an escalated version of the same failed policy. It does this by trying to make Iran its scapegoat and fabricating evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq. … Forging imaginary new threats, as the United States administration is now doing with Iran, may provide some temporary domestic cover for the failure of the administration's Iraq policy, but it can hardly resolve problems that -- as widely suggested -- require prudence, dialogue and a genuine search for solutions."

In a Washington Post (2/8, A21, 690K) op-ed, Vali Nasr of the Naval Postgraduate School and Ray Takeyh of the Council on Foreign Relations write, "As Iran crosses successive nuclear demarcations and mischievously intervenes in Iraq, the question of how to address the Islamic republic is once more preoccupying Washington." The US "would do better to shelve its containment strategy and embark on a policy of unconditional dialogue and sanctions relief. A reduced American threat would deprive the hard-liners of the conflict they need to justify their concentration of power. In the meantime, as Iran became assimilated into the global economy, the regime's influence would inevitably yield to the private sector, with its demands for accountability and reform."

In his Wall Street Journal (2/8, A15, 2.04M) column, James Taranto writes, "Confrontation with Iran is very unpopular among the Democratic antiwar base. Last week Ezra Klein of The American Prospect, a left-liberal magazine, confronted" John Edwards about a recent speech on Iran, "and the candidate waffled. Although allowing that 'it would be foolish for any American president to ever take any option off the table,' he offered this criticism of President Bush: 'When he uses this kind of language "options are on the table," he does it in a very threatening kind of way.' Does Mr. Edwards mean to be docile? … Perhaps voters next year, chastened by Mr. Bush's dangerous boldness, will opt for someone more risk-averse. But if a crisis arises and the president proves unable to lead, they may find themselves longing for Mr. Bush's steadfastness. An excess of caution is itself a form of recklessness."

Hamas, Fatah Vow To Continue Talks Until Agreement Reached. The New York Times (2/8, A6, Fattah, 1.16M) reports the leaders of Hamas and Fatah "ended their first day of an emergency summit meeting on Wednesday promising to stay until they agreed on a new government to end a wave of violence in Gaza and the West Bank and salvage the moribund Israeli-Palestinian peace effort." Disputes reportedly remain between the two groups "on how to divide the ministerial portfolios, especially the security portfolios, and how the new government could meet Western criteria of renouncing violence, recognizing Israel and accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements."

The Financial Times (2/8, Morris) says Ismail Haniyeh "might remain as prime minister in a new multi-party cabinet but, to be accepted by the international community, Hamas would have to bow to demands that it recognize Israel, commit itself to non-violence and accept existing agreements with Israel." The Times says an agreement at Mecca "would set the tone for a trilateral summit in Jerusalem next week" involving Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

WSJournal Says Palestinians Unable To Rule Themselves. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, 2.04M) writes that the recent violence among Palestinian factions negates "the notion that what is mainly needed for an Israeli-Palestinian settlement is a change in Israeli policies." Now as the two sides engage in talks in Saudi Arabia, "For King Abdullah, as for the Palestinians, the main challenge is not simply to midwife an agreement; it's the principles of their prospective statehood. If the experience of Gaza…demonstrates anything, it is that the absence of Israeli occupation is not a sufficient condition for a Palestinian state." The Journal suggests that the "first such condition would be a monopoly on the legitimate use of force," which "doesn't exist today in the Palestinian Authority." In addition, it says "the US must also insist that Mr. Abbas dismantle Hamas as a military entity, by force if necessary." The Journal concludes that "it is now clear that the deepest problems are of Palestinian making. That may not be much comfort to diplomats hungry for the next breakthrough. But no breakthrough will be worth the effort if the result is a state that cannot govern itself."

Rice Urges Release Of Egyptian Dissident. AFP (2/8) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "urged Egypt to release a prominent jailed dissident, shortly before she met with the country's foreign minister." Testifying in Congress, Rice said she had repeatedly raised the case of opposition leader Ayman Nour with Egyptian officials "in the past and would continue to do so." Rice met later Wednesday Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit for talks expected to focus on US and Egyptian efforts to break the stalemate in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Egypt Cracks Down On Muslim Brotherhood. The Financial Times (2/8, Saleh) reports the Egyptian government has "referred the cases of forty members of the illegal Muslim Brotherhood to a military tribunal in a move which signals another escalation of the government's crackdown against the group." The charges, which include money laundering and creating a militia, "arise from actions by Islamist students at Al Azhar university who in December staged a parade in which they wore black hoods and carried out martial arts exercises during a protest against the rigging of student union elections." In recent weeks, the Brotherhood has also "been the target of a new campaign of arrests in which some 260 people have been detained."

US, North Korea May Be Close To Reaching Nuclear Agreement. The AP (2/8, Herman) reports Pyongyang "expressed its readiness Thursday to discuss initial steps of its nuclear disarmament, raising hopes for the first tangible progress" at the six-party talks. On arriving in Beijing for the latest round of talks, North's nuclear envoy Kim Kye Gwan said, "We are prepared to discuss first-stage measures." Japanese media reports Thursday "suggested the North may agree to freeze its main nuclear reactor and allow international inspectors in exchange for energy aid as a starting step to disarm," but Kim said any moves by North Korea would be "based on whether the United States will give up its hostile policy and come out toward peaceful coexistence." Earlier Thursday, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said he sensed "there is a real desire to have progress" by the North Koreans at the talks.

Separately, the AP (2/8) notes the Japanese daily Asahi Shimbun reported Thursday that the US and North Korea "signed a memorandum during talks last month by which Pyongyang would begin closing a nuclear reactor while the US starts providing energy assistance." However, AFP (2/8) reports Assistant Secretary Hill denied the report, saying, "No, we did not sign anything. … Although it was a very useful discussion, we did not sign anything."

In a preview of Thursday's talks, the New York Times (2/8, A13, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "Recently, North Korea has seemed to signal more of a willingness to bargain and to specify its demands." For example, last weekend, "two American envoys returning from Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, said the nation was prepared to disable its main nuclear reactor in Yongbyon in exchange for an energy package of electricity and oil from its neighbors."

The Financial Times (2/8, Fifield) says, "When diplomats sit down" at the talks "they will do so amid a new sense of optimism." If in the past North Korea's nuclear ambition "has been one of the world's most intractable diplomatic challenges, this time the six-party talks appear to have a clear -- and perhaps achievable -- goal, diplomats say." Extensive "behind-the-scenes dealings, increasing pressure on the North Korean regime, and an embattled US administration seeking success in its dealings with one of the 'axes of evil' have helped breathe life into a process long considered terminal," the Times says.

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Ramstad, 2.04M) says "a deal appears more likely -- despite repeated failures in the past -- because the North's top negotiator has signaled it is willing to compromise and the US has settled on a more conciliatory approach." Meanwhile, in the US, "the election of a Democratic Congress and the departures of John Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations, and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- both of whom took a hard line against North Korea -- have given moderates in the State Department more leeway to compromise."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, LaFranchi, 59K) reports that despite the optimism, "The spoiler may be that Pyongyang, which toughened its bargaining position by testing a nuclear weapon last October, may demand too high a price for putting its nuclear ambitions on the table."

However, the Washington Times (2/8, Lanfranco, 88K) reports a Chinese analyst warned yesterday that "the United States and its partners in six-party talks have taken steps they knew would prevent progress in halting North Korea's nuclear program." In comments seen as "much more pessimistic than what has been heard from" Hill, Teng Jianqun, deputy secretary-general at the China Arms Control and Disarmament Association, "also warned of the risk of war between the United States and China if the North Korean nuclear issue is mishandled."

French Trial Over Muhammad Cartoons Begins. The New York Times (2/8, A8, Bernard, 1.16M) reports hearings began Wednesday "in a suit brought by two influential French Muslim organizations against a satirical weekly newspaper for printing cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad that had touched off international rioting." The Paris Mosque and the Union of Islamic Organizations of France contend that the newspaper, Charlie Hebdo, and its director, Philippe Val, "are guilty of slander, an offense that carries a possible six-month sentence and a fine of up to 22,500 euros, or about $29,000."

Hu Defends China's Investments In Africa. The Washington Post (2/8, A14, Timberg, 690K) reports Chinese President Hu Jintao Wednesday "sought to reassure Africans that his country's aggressive investments in oil, copper and other natural resources do not amount to a new wave of colonialism," saying China would "not do anything harmful to the interests of Africa and its people." Hu's comments, made in Pretoria on the sixth stop of an eight-country tour of the continent, "came amid rising anxiety that China's economic power is strangling African manufacturing while locking up vital resources for years." Although China has "long-standing relationships with many countries in Africa," among Africans "concerns about rising Chinese clout are more often economic."

Poll Finds Religion Surging Among Chinese. The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Cody, 690K) reports a new government-sponsored survey on spirituality in China "has found that the number of religious believers among the country's 1.3 billion people is far higher than generally known, amounting to as many as 300 million." The findings, "based on a poll of 4,500 people conducted by professors at East China Normal University in Shanghai, supported growing indications that many Chinese are searching for new value systems to replace the communist doctrine that has been jettisoned in favor of market economics and a race for prosperity."

US Assures Russia On Kosovo Position. The Washington Times (2/8, Kralev, 88K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday said the US "has assured Russia that Washington's support for Kosovo's eventual independence from Serbia does not mean it will back the breakaway aspirations of Russian autonomous regions in the Caucasus." In congressional testimony yesterday, Rice said she has told Russian officials that "Kosovo is a precedent for nothing," but warned that delayed action on Kosovo's status could cause "a breakdown in order in Kosovo itself." Russia has been "reluctant to join American and European endorsements of a plan proposed by U.N. envoy Martti Ahtisaari that would lead to independence for Kosovo in all but name."

WPost Condemns New Charges Against Russians. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/8, A20, 690K) writes, "We won't accuse Russian President Vladimir Putin of being subtle this week. On Monday, Russian prosecutors leveled charges against a pair of Mr. Putin's one-time political enemies that are beyond implausible. … Precisely why Mr. Putin wants to keep these two men in jail for another 15 years or so is still up for speculation. Observers of Russian energy politics see it as a way to assist the Kremlin in grabbing the remaining bits of Yukos's assets inside and outside the country." Regardless of his reasons, the Post says Putin "has systematically dismantled the institutions of democracy inside Russia while bullying his neighbors and jailing his opponents." After the new charges were announced, the Post notes that a State Department spokesman said that the proceedings "raise questions about Russia's commitment to the responsibilities which all democratic, free market countries embrace," and that American policymakers will discuss the issue with the Kremlin "at an appropriate time and at the appropriate level." However, "We doubt that Mr. Putin will lose much sleep over that prospect."

US, Brazil Discuss Partnership To Promote Ethanol Use. The Washington Post (2/8, A14, Reel, 690K) reports the US and Brazil "are meeting this week to discuss a new energy partnership that they hope will encourage ethanol use throughout Latin America and that US officials hope will diminish the regional influence of oil-rich Venezuela. US officials said they expect to sign accords within a year that would promote technology-sharing with Brazil and encourage more Latin American neighbors to become biofuel producers and consumers." The US and Brazil "together produce about 70 percent of the world's ethanol, a fuel that President Bush has called a cornerstone in reducing US dependence on oil." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, who led discussions with Brazilian officials, Wednesday "declared that biofuel is now the 'symbolic centerpiece' of US relations with Brazil, a country that US officials have long hoped could counteract Venezuela's regional anti-American influence."

Venezuelan Oil Company Struggling As Chavez Squeezes Profits. The Washington Times (2/8, A1, Hill, 88K) reports on its front page, "Venezuela's national oil company is buckling under the burden of financing President Hugo Chavez's more than $9 billion a year in social and political ventures. Production at Petroleos de Venezuela is declining, and any major drop in oil prices or failure to reverse declining investment and production could lead to bankruptcy of the goose that lays the golden egg for Venezuela, Moody's Investors Service warned yesterday." The "well-tuned Venezuelan network of production facilities, Caribbean and U.S. Gulf Coast refineries and U.S. gas stations operated by Citgo has begun to falter after six years of Chavez rule, and the outlook for the once-thriving oil company looks bleak in light of the president's announced agenda to further squeeze profits from the oil sector."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Touts Argentina's Efforts To Seek Justice In 1994 Jewish Center Bombing. The AP (2/7, Cormier) reports from Buenos Aires, Argentina, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Wednesday toured a Jewish cultural center bombed in 1994 and said the United States supports Argentina's efforts to seek justice for its worst terrorist attack." The AP continues, "Eight Iranians are wanted in Argentina in connection with the bombing, including the president, foreign minister and intelligence chief at the time. … 'Civilized nations cannot easily forget the pain that we share when terrorist attacks occur,' Gonzales said after laying flowers and meeting with Jewish leaders and relatives of victims of the attack. 'Whether 1994 in Argentina, 2001 in the United States or 2004 in Spain, these moments bind us together in our grief.'" The AP adds, "Eight-five people were killed and 200 wounded when a van packed with explosives blew up outside the seven-story center on July 18, 1994. The center, known as the AMIA, has since been rebuilt. … Gonzales did not take questions from journalists on Wednesday. … He also did not say where the United States stands on Argentina's request for help from Interpol, which must decide in the coming weeks whether to issue global alerts for the arrests." The AP notes, "Iran has denied any involvement and has said it does not recognize the validity of the warrants. It said it would oppose any attempt to detain former President Hashemi Rafsanjani or other Iranian citizens. … Gonzales called the attack a 'vicious act of hate.' … 'We will never give up the fight for justice ... just as we are bound together in our memories of the terrorist attacks, so too, we must be bound together in our resolve,' he said. 'Argentina has steadfastly pursued the perpetrators of the AMIA attacks ... the memory of what happened here, like our September 11th, is a touchstone for us.'"

Verizon Backs DOJ Request To Stop Contempt Hearing By Maine PUC. The AP (2/8, Quinn) reports, "Verizon is backing the U.S. government's attempt to stop a contempt hearing for the telecommunications giant that's scheduled for Friday by the Maine Public Utilities Commission." The AP continues, "Federal officials say the hearing could compromise national security. … 'The MPUC seeks, under threat of sanction, to compel Verizon to provide information in state proceedings concerning its alleged cooperation with an alleged national security program despite the fact that the United States has specifically instructed Verizon that providing such a response would violate federal law,' lawyers for Verizon wrote in a legal brief." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge John Woodcock is expected to hear arguments in Bangor on Thursday. … A multi-customer complaint filed with the PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. The complaint followed reports about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency. … The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date." The AP notes, "On Tuesday, the Justice Department asked Woodcock to bar the PUC from going ahead with a contempt hearing at this time. … The Justice Department also asked the judge to block Verizon from responding to PUC demands for an affirmation of previous statements 'because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities.' … Verizon supports the federal government's request for a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction."

"Third Generation Terrorists" Organizing Without Al Qaeda Help. McClatchy (2/8, Schofield) reports, "While U.S. and British intelligence officials think that al-Qaida has regrouped in the mountains of Pakistan and is again capable of and intent on launching mass attacks around the globe, investigators in Britain, Germany and France are convinced that there's a broader terrorist threat against Europe. … Unlike the Sept. 11 plotters, the new wave of terrorists -- the so-called third generation terrorists -- are dreaming up, planning, funding and attempting attacks on their own, without international support." McClatchy notes that "the third generation has learned its hatred from television and its tactics from the Web, according to the experts. Its only connections to al-Qaida are Web sites and a shared anti-West philosophy. Its practitioners go online to find inspiration as well as practical advice, such as how to build a bomb."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Indiana Inmate Sentenced To 27 Years For Anthrax Hoax. The AP (2/3) reported, "A federal inmate has been sentenced to more than 27 years in prison for mailing what a letter claimed was anthrax to an assistant U.S. attorney who had prosecuted him. Charles E. Fuller, 39, pleaded guilty to one count of mailing a threatening communication and one count of threatening the use of a weapon of mass destruction before he was sentenced, prosecutors said Friday." The AP noted, "Fuller already is serving a 77-month sentence for attacking an inmate at the federal prison in Pekin, Ill., with an ice pick, prosecutors said.

He was convicted in 2004 on a charge of threatening the president's life."

Bush Issues Orders For Medical Response To Terrorist Attack. The AP (2/7, Lumpkin) reported, "President Bush issued orders Wednesday for how federal medical personnel should respond to a nuclear, radiological, biological or chemical attack, saying authorities should focus on threats that can be dealt with medically." … 'We are moving heaven and earth to prevent' an attack, Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said. He called the directive a playbook for how the federal government will respond and coordinate in providing medical treatment in case prevention fails." Meanwhile, a DHS IG report criticized the agency's BioWatch program, saying that "the department had not properly enforced or monitored the Environmental Protection Agency and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which are also involved in the program. But it noted that Homeland Security had taken action to resolve the issues, and 'we consider the recommendations resolved and closed.'"

USA Today (2/8, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) reports the IG report said BioWatch "was bungled by the Homeland Security Department and has since undergone a revamping." Jeff Stiefel, the program's manager, "says the problems cropped up because the program was created quickly in 2003 in response to concerns that terrorists could spread deadly biological agents in densely populated areas. Homeland Security officials say they have 'taken action to resolve the issues,' the report says. Stiefel says that 'without question, those issues (raised by the report) are resolved.'"

DHS Releases Report On Border Patrol Shooting. The AP (2/7, Caldwell, Gamboa) reported a Department of Homeland Security report "on the shooting of a suspected drug smuggler by Border Patrol agents concurs with prosecutors that the men committed obstruction of justice by failing to report the shooting, destroying evidence and lying to investigators." The report was, made public Wednesday, "offered few, if any, new details on the case." Lawyers for the convicted agents, Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, "did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment. A spokeswoman for US Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said the report only bolsters the congressman's support of the agents. 'The OIG report has just emboldened our position because there is nothing in there that indicates these agents were not justified in shooting this individual,' said Tara Setmayer."

The Washington Times (2/8, Seper, 88K) reports the DHS document "said the agents covered up the incident and tried to assault the alien, but the report fails to substantiate earlier accusations that they wanted to 'shoot a Mexican.' The long-awaited and heavily redacted report by the department's Office of Inspector General was billed as a substantiation of the government's conviction." However, "it falls short of statements by the Inspector General's Office in September to a House subcommittee. The office had told lawmakers that the officers confessed to knowingly shooting at an unarmed suspect and that they did not think he was a threat, they wanted to shoot a Mexican and they lied to investigators."

Lawmakers Angry Over DHS Official's Statements In Growing Border Agent Controversy. The Houston Chronicle (2/8, Mittelstadt) reports, "Republican congressmen's outrage over the imprisonment of two Border Patrol agents from Texas intensified Wednesday as the top Homeland Security investigative official apologized for his aides' misleading statements to lawmakers about the case." The Chronicle continues, "The agents, sent to federal prison for wounding a fleeing Mexican drug trafficker and hiding evidence, never told investigators that they went on patrol intending to 'shoot a Mexican,' admitted Richard Skinner, the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general, under questioning during a House Homeland Security Committee hearing. … The misstatements occurred when aides briefed four Texas congressmen in September about the 2005 shooting near Fabens, southeast of El Paso. … 'It was an unfortunate mischaracterization,' Skinner told Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, whose district stretches to Harris County. 'I apologize on behalf of our staff, and I just want to make perfectly clear this was not intentional.' … But McCaul and several other House members from the Houston area who are involved in the Border Patrol agents' case said the misstatements never would have come to light had they not forced Skinner's office to release an investigative report on the shooting." The Chronicle adds, "The report, released Wednesday with some sections deleted, does not substantiate what McCaul said were some of the more inflammatory claims made by the inspector general's office last fall. The claims included the alleged 'shoot a Mexican' comment and an assertion that agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos had no fear for their lives when they fired 15 rounds at the trafficker as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a van with 743 pounds of marijuana. … 'Those representations became misrepresentations if not downright false statements to members of Congress,' McCaul said, later suggesting that Skinner should consider disciplining or firing the staffers." The Chronicle notes, "Other Republicans on Capitol Hill went further than McCaul in what has mushroomed into a growing political liability for President Bush and his administration — a vulnerability all the greater because some of the president's staunchest conservative allies have turned against him on this issue. … Reps. John Culberson of Houston and Sam Johnson of Plano said Skinner and his top aides should be forced to resign. … Rep.

Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., demanded that the Bureau of Prisons chief, Harley Lappin, be fired after Saturday's beating of Ramos by six inmates at a Mississippi prison. … Bush faces increasing demands from House Republicans and others that he pardon Ramos and Compean, who were sentenced in October to 11 and 12 years, respectively, after being convicted of violating the trafficker's civil rights and tampering with evidence for picking up their shell casings and not reporting the shooting. "

FBI Outreach To Muslim-Americans "Steep Uphill Climb." Under the headline "Distrust Hinders FBI In Outreach To Muslims," the Washington Post (2/8, DeYoung, 690K) reports in a front-page, 2200-word story that without the help of Muslim-Americans, "the FBI, sheriffs and police chiefs believe they will never penetrate the world of homegrown Islamic extremists and potential terrorists the officials are convinced is out there. … Yet for both sides, the effort remains a steep uphill climb with frequent detours into resentment, suspicion and misunderstanding. Virtually all 56 FBI field offices and many local police departments have invited Muslim leaders to join multicultural advisory boards and to teach classes in the basics of Islam to agents and police. At community meetings, the FBI listens to Muslim complaints and asks for assistance in finding potential terrorists in their own communities." However, "Muslims are 'in denial' over the threat in their midst, one senior officer said, adding: 'All they say is "There is no problem. Stop picking on us."'"

US Wants To Expand Armed Pilot Program Internationally. USA Today (2/8, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports in a front page article, "The Homeland Security Department, working with the State Department, is trying to expand a 4-year-old program that allows thousands of pilots to carry guns on domestic flights." Conan Bruce, a spokesman for the Federal Air Marshals Service, which runs the armed-pilots program, said they are working toward having armed pilots "'be able to perform their duties on international flights.' Some countries may block US efforts because they don't want guns on airplanes, even if they're carried by trained pilots who have been sworn as law officers." Sweden, for instance, "would rather not see any weapons aboard airplanes," according to Michael Mohr, homeland security liaison at the Swedish Embassy in Washington. "The effort to expand the armed-pilots program comes amid criticism that it is falling short of its potential. A Homeland Security report released last month said the program needs improvement, and some policies 'may have dissuaded pilots from participating.'"

TSA Screeners To Get AMBER Alerts. USA Today (2/8, 3A, Frank, 2.27M) reports the TSA announced Wednesday that its "43,000 airport security screeners will get notices and photos of abducted children as part of the AMBER Alert network's quest to find missing people. … 'The goal is to get that (alert) to TSA officers within minutes,' said Gale Rossides, a TSA associate administrator. Screeners 'meet so many children every day, they may actually notice something that's out of character with a child.'" Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, said the effort "is the first time AMBER Alerts will go directly to airports."

House Democrats Insist On Physical Screening Of All Air Cargo. The New York Times (2/8, Lipton, 1.16M) reports the handling of cargo stored on commercial aircraft "has set off an intense debate in Congress," where "House Democrats are pushing for a requirement that, within three years, all air cargo be inspected at a level equal to that of checked baggage, at an estimated cost to the federal government of $600 million per year." However, "officials at the Transportation Security Administration said the security measures already in place for air cargo — while very different from the passenger-baggage inspection system — were sufficient to prevent a bomb from getting aboard." TSA Administrator Kip Hawley said the Democrats' proposal "could actually reduce safety…because the high cost would require other security measures to be curtailed. … 'If you put all of your resources into making something invulnerable, you end up ironically with less security,'" Hawley said.

Groups Reach Out To Wireless Firms To Craft Emergency Communications Systems. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, B1, Sharma, Schatz, 2.04M) reports "convinced that the federal government alone can't answer their concerns, public-safety groups are turning to commercial wireless companies for help" with communications systems for emergency workers. "The new Congress is taking a hard look" at a proposal that would license a section of the radio spectrum "to an entity called a Public Safety Broadband Trust. A private bidder would be selected to manage the creation of a broadband network shared by consumer cellphone users and public-safety workers such as firemen and policemen; in an emergency, public-safety users would take precedence." However, "getting any legislation through a divided Congress this year will be difficult, especially given the controversy the plan is generating in the wireless industry. Critics say it amounts to a corporate giveaway to Cyren Call," which has lobbied "feverishly" for the Public Safety Broadband Trust.

WAR NEWS:

Seven Senate GOP Centrists Threaten To Tie Up Business Over Warner Resolution. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Levey, 850K) reports seven Republican senators "threatened Wednesday to tie up Senate business until a resolution opposing President Bush's planned troop buildup gets a vote, saying they will try to attach the measure to future legislation." Sens. Norm Coleman, Susan Collins, Chuck Hagel, Gordon Smith, Olympia Snowe, John Warner, and George Voinovich "sent a letter to Senate leaders of both parties Wednesday evening." Voinovich "had not previously expressed support for the Warner measure." The Times says the "procedural gambit does not guarantee the Senate will vote any time soon on Bush's plan to send more troops into Baghdad to control sectarian violence there. But it may further complicate Senate debate on the war, just as Senate Democratic leaders seemed prepared to let the Democratic majority in the House take up the legislative challenge to the White House." McClatchy (2/8, Talev) says the letter declared, "The current stalemate is unacceptable to us and to the people of this country. We will explore all of our options."

The Washington Post (2/8, Murray, 690K), in a front-page report, says the group, "who earlier this week helped block deliberations" on the resolution, "changed course yesterday and vowed to use every tactic at their disposal to ensure a full and open debate." The letter "was not more specific about the Republican senators' strategy for reviving the war debate. But under the chamber's rules, senators have wide latitude in slowing the progress of legislation and in offering amendments, regardless of whether they have anything to do with the bill."

Roll Call (2/8, Stanton) says an "exasperated" Warner "put his colleagues on notice Wednesday that he would look to attach his resolution" to "any measure moving across the Senate floor." Warner's announcement "followed a day of angry and increasingly partisan recriminations between Senate Democrats and Republicans over who was to blame for the collapse of a planned debate on Iraq."

Novak Says McConnell Made GOP "Look Obstructionist." In his Washington Post (2/8, A21, 690K) column, Robert Novak writes, "Listening to Minority Leader Mitch McConnell boast last weekend that he had the votes to prevent closing off Senate debate on Iraq, Republicans opposing President Bush's troop surge feared the worst. The new Republican leader sounded as though he wanted to prevent passage of an anti-surge resolution at the cost of making his party look obstructionist. That's exactly what happened. The result of McConnell's tactics is that no resolution will be passed by the Senate anytime soon. The White House was overjoyed. But Tuesday's headlines indicated a public relations fiasco for Republicans."

Specter Drafting Rules Change On Amendments. Roll Call (2/8, Pierce) reports Sen. Arlen Specter, "frustrated" with Majority Leader Harry Reid's "efforts to control floor debates," said he is "drafting a rules change that would guarantee the minority the right to offer amendments to legislation on the Senate floor. Specter acknowledged that his proposal stands virtually no chance of achieving the two-thirds majority required to change Senate rules. But he said he wanted to bring attention to what he described as a growing problem with the way Reid is running the floor."

Webb Says GOP Leaders "Know They're Going To Lose." Sen. Jim Webb said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/7, Matthews), "I think the proposals that the Majority Leader put forward are good proposals and honestly, I think right now the Republican leadership just does not want a vote because they know they're going to lose."

Lieberman Moving Further Away From Democrats On Iraq. The New York Times (2/8, Zernike, 1.16M) reports that it "came as little surprise that when Senate Republicans blocked debate Monday on a resolution that would have opposed President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, erstwhile Democrat, sided with them." But Lieberman also "went further, accusing Democrats of giving strength to the enemy and abandoning the troops, and arguing that an alternative resolution that he and many Republicans backed was 'a statement of support to our troops.'" Defeated last year "in the Democratic senatorial primary in Connecticut but then elected as an independent to a fourth term, Mr. Lieberman has kept a promise to caucus with the Democrats, giving them a majority of only 51 to 49 and earning for him a designation as 'the most influential man in the Senate.'" But on Iraq, "the issue that made the last year the most difficult of his political life, he has moved farther and farther from the party, winding up to the right of many Republicans who now embrace what six months ago was almost solely a Democratic position on the war."

Yesterday, on CNN's The Situation Room (2/7, Blitzer), Lieberman said, "How we end Iraq is going to be very important to our security and our progress in the war against the Islamist terrorists who attacked us on 9/11. So, I'm supporting this latest plan, the new plan with a new general, a new secretary of defense, because I really do think it has some significant hope of working. And I'm not planning for failure. Gen. Petraeus told us when he was before the Armed Services Committee that he thought by this summer we'd have the beginning of an idea about whether this was working or not. I'm going to do everything I can to support it and I hope it does work and that we won't have to think about what's next."

House Democrats Move Toward "Stripped-Down" Resolution. Meanwhile in the House, the AP (2/7, Flaherty) reports Democratic leaders "coalesced Wednesday around a stripped-down measure that disapproves of President Bush's decision to send more forces to Iraq and declares support for the troops, according to party aides who said a vote was likely next week." Democratic officials "said they hoped for bipartisan support for the measure, and one Republican leader conceded some members of the GOP rank-and-file would likely break ranks." House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam said, "I don't think it'll be a pure party-line vote." USA Today (2/8, 7A, Kiely, 2.27M) adds that Putnam said, "It will be virtually impossible for us to defeat it." But the "question is how broad a bipartisan majority the resolution will attract. 'It totally depends on what the language is,' said Putnam."

The New York Times (2/8, Zeleny, 1.16M) says Democratic leaders in the House sought to "reconcile deep differences within the party" over the war. Seventy-one House Democrats "signed a statement urging Congress to take a stronger stance against the war, including setting a six-month timetable for withdrawing American forces from Iraq," but Democratic leaders "have said that they favor a nonbinding resolution simply requiring lawmakers to support or reject the president's policy." The Hill (2/8, Kaplan) reports Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said they "intend to pass a clean and simple resolution opposing President Bush's troop surge while supporting the soldiers in Iraq."

Gates Says US Will Know If Surge Is Working Within Months. The AP (2/8) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "told a House panel Wednesday that the US should know in a few months if the Iraqi government is making progress toward peace and whether the United States 'is going to have to look at other alternatives and consequences.'" In "stark contrast to predecessor" Donald Rumsfeld, Gates also "said there was no doubt the Army and Marine Corps needed to be larger if they are to deal with future wars and give troops enough rest between combat tours." The Washington Times (2/8, Dinan, 88K) reports Gates also "said Congress doesn't endanger troop morale by voting on nonbinding resolutions opposing President Bush's Iraq reinforcement plan." The comments "are in stark contrast to arguments made by Republicans, including the president's spokesman, Tony Snow, that a debate on resolutions could have an effect on the troops."

VoteVets.org Seizes Key Role In Surge Debate. The Washington Post (2/8, A4, Layton, Weisman, 690K) writes that the "small band of veterans" that makes up anti-Iraq war group VoteVets.org "are saying things many Democrats would like to express but can't. And as the politics heat up over the Iraq war, Democratic leaders increasingly are being drawn" to the group's chairman, Iraq veteran Jon Soltz, and his "angry soldiers. VoteVets.org appears to be the most active group trying to influence the debate about the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq."

WSJournal Chides Clinton For Move To Left On Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, 2.04M) editorializes, "One pleasant surprise of Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as New York Senator has been her tough-minded approach on national security. She responded to 9/11 by supporting President Bush's strategy of taking on not just terrorists but the states that harbor them. She also voted for the war in Iraq and has refused to follow much of her party in alleging that Mr. Bush 'lied' about weapons of mass destruction. But as Mrs. Clinton bids to win the Democratic Presidential nomination, she is taking a marked turn to the left. Pressured by other candidates and by her party's left wing, she is walking back her hawkish statements and is now all but part of the antiwar camp." The Journal runs a "summary of the arc of Mrs. Clinton's public thinking on Iraq," and concludes that "now that the war has proven to be difficult, and her fellow Democrats are outflanking her on the antiwar left, she is steadily, even rapidly, moving in their direction."

Public Debate Over Iraq Policy Seen As Deficient. In his New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) column, David Brooks says, "This week, in private, everyone acknowledges how complex the choices are. Everyone senses that the policy being promoted possibly won't work and could have ruinous consequences. This week, the mood — in private — is sober and anxious." But the "politicians have completely failed to institutionalize that sense of sobriety in the public sphere. Instead of having a serious debate, the Senate disgraced itself with mind-bendingly petty partisanship. Meanwhile, the Democratic presidential candidates engaged in an unholy bidding war to get out of Iraq soonest, which had nothing to do with realities in Iraq and everything to do with applause lines in Iowa."

Effort To Secure Baghdad, Anbar Province Now Underway. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Londoño, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The U.S. military's chief spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that US and Iraqi forces had begun a joint effort to secure Baghdad and troubled Anbar province. 'The plan is being fully implemented as we speak,' Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters after being asked when the plan would start. 'Not all aspects are in place at this point.'" The plan "is being led by Iraqi officials and is designed to stop violence in the capital's volatile neighborhoods, Caldwell said. Officials have established nine new security districts in Baghdad and are creating dozens of security stations that Iraqi police and military officers will share with U.S. military personnel."

As the new operation gets underway in Iraq, two broadcast networks ran pessimistic reports on the situation on the ground in Iraq, and suggested US troops are less optimistic than in the past. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 2,

2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US military announced the official start of the new security operation in Baghdad" as the AP "reports its grim new count of American casualties in Iraq: 334 American troops…were killed in combat in Iraq between the beginning of October and the end of the month of January. That number is higher than in any other four-month stretch since the war started." On ABC World News (2/7, story 2, 2:10, 8.78M), anchor Charlie Gibson asked correspondent Martha Raddatz, "I know this is trip No. 12 for you over four years. What has particularly struck you as different this time?" Raddatz replied, "I think, perhaps, the pessimism of some soldiers. I haven't really seen that in the past. Now, one officer explained it as pessimistic optimism. But I think they're very, very worried about the outcome here in Iraq. I was struck by the sense of personal safety, Charlie. I think a lot of soldiers don't think about it often. A lot of journalists who have been here don't think about it off. But this time, the soldiers were talking about it a lot."

Car Bomb Kills Ten In Baghdad. NPR (2/8) broadcast in a report, "Iraqi police say a car bomb exploded in a vegetable market in a mainly Shiite town south of Baghdad today, killing at least ten people. Police say more than 20 others were also wounded in the attack." CBS Radio (2/8) aired a similar report.

Henninger Says Troops Should Be Equipped Like US Police. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A14, 2.04M) Daniel Henninger, Pulitzer Prize winning Wall Street Journal editorial writer and editor, writes that if US troops in Iraq were equipped as well as police in our nation, then insurgents would be easier to identify, follow, and arrest. Formerly, without even fingerprint identification resources, troops wrote "down suspects' names and addresses" while some had "created their own spreadsheets and PowerPoint programs, or" used "digital cameras to input the details of suspected insurgents," because at the time "no Iraq-wide software architecture" existed. Henninger optimistically points out that, thanks to a few technically-savvy Marines and a few changes in military procurement priorities, the military has now tested and developed fingerprint and biometric identification systems soldiers can use in the ongoing fight against insurgents.

Two More US Helicopters Downed In Iraq. The New York Times (2/8, Oppel, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "With two more helicopter crashes near Baghdad, including a Marine transport crash on Wednesday that killed seven people, the number of helicopters that have gone down in Iraq over the past three weeks rose to six." US "officials say the streak strongly suggests that insurgents have adapted their tactics and are now putting more effort into shooting down the aircraft. The number also includes a previously unreported downing of a helicopter operated by a private security firm on Jan. 31." The Times adds, "Some aspects of the recent crashes indicate that insurgents have become smarter about anticipating American flight patterns and finding ways to use old weapons to down helicopters."

ABC World News (2/7, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) noted that "in the last 2 1/2 weeks, 5 US helicopters have gone down in Iraq, killing 28 Americans. Seven Marines were lost in the chopper crash today."

The CBS Evening News (2/7, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "As if it weren't already dangerous enough for US Forces in Iraq, insurgents are apparently getting much better at shooting down American aircraft." CBS (Logan) added that "CBS News has learned that" the "transport helicopter was shot down during what the military called routine operations. But before the US could announce the cause of the crash, a jihadi Website linked to Al Qaeda was already declaring victory."

NBC Nightly News (2/7, lead story, 3:10, Yang, 9.87M) said, "Military officials tell us there is so much concern about this trend that Defense Secretary Robert Gates and General Peter Pace, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff are personally reviewing the details of these crashes to see if any procedures need to be changed." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Susman, 850K), USA Today (2/8, 6A, Dorell, 2.27M) and Washington Times/AP (2/8, Reid), among other newspapers, run similar reports this morning.

Citing Breach of Contract, Army To Withhold Funds From Halliburton. The New York Times (2/8, Shenon, 1.16M) reports, "The Army announced during a House oversight committee hearing on Wednesday that it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Company after recently discovering that the contractor had hired the company Blackwater USA to provide armed security guards in Iraq, a potential breach of its government contract." The Army "has said that its contracts with Halliburton, which has a five-year, $16 billion deal to support American military operations in Iraq, generally barred the company and its subcontractors from using private armed guards. But in a statement, Halliburton disagreed with the Army's interpretation and suggested that there was nothing to prohibit Halliburton's subcontractors from hiring such guards." The announcement "came during a hearing of the House Government Oversight Committee that included emotional testimony about the killing of four Blackwater employees in Falluja." The Financial Times (2/8, Kirchgaessner) runs a similar report.

Reserve Officers, US Civilians Charged In Iraq Bid-Rigging Scheme. ABC World News (2/7, story 3, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Three former Army Reserve officers and two US civilians have been charged with taking part in a brazen bid-rigging scheme in Iraq. The reservists, while assigned to the Coalition Provisional Authority, allegedly helped to steer $8.6 million in Iraq reconstruction projects to one contractor. And in return, the contractor allegedly paid more than $1 million in bribes."

The Washington Post (2/8, A17, Merle, 690K) notes "three of the central characters in the scheme have pleaded guilty. Robert J. Stein, a former Coalition Provisional Authority employee, was sentenced last month to nine years in prison and ordered to forfeit millions of dollars for his role in steering contracts to businessman Philip H. Bloom. Lt. Bruce D. Hopfengardner also admitted to steering contracts to Bloom for money and a Harley-Davidson motorcycle." Bloom "pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bribery and money-laundering charges last year." The "alleged fraud scheme is the largest to emerge out of the Iraq reconstruction effort."

NYTimes Celebrates Congressional Oversight. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) editorializes, "The details are graphic: billions of dollars of Iraqi oil revenues -- 363 tons of cash -- bundled up and urgently flown to Baghdad on 484 pallets from the Federal Reserve Bank to jump-start a new Iraqi government. Four years later, the unanswered questions are just as graphic: Who was responsible for the money? What became of it? … The details emerging provide a lesson in how easily cash can evaporate into the fog of an unmonitored war. … Republican lawmakers at the hearing again tried to gloss over the administration's mismanagement of the war, complaining that the mystery billions were 'old news.' The real news is that -- at long last -- the truth about the Iraq fiasco is being pursued in public by Congressional investigators."

Families Of US Contractors Killed In Iraq Appear Before House Panel. ABC World News (2/7, story 4, 3:05, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "Incompetence, cutting corners, overbilling and cover-up were the themes today, as the families of the four contractors killed in Fallujah finally got someone's attention in Washington. Now, three years after those gruesome killings, the families of dead men say the company they worked for, Blackwater USA, has tried to cover up what led to the tragedy." ABC added that during a hearing before the House Government Oversight Committee, it came out that "the men, all former military, got lost as they escorted a convoy of trucks carrying kitchen equipment. The families told Congress they have discovered their men were sent out by Blackwater in unarmored cars, without automatic weapons, no maps and no tail gunners as promised."

NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 7, 2:30, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "The committee produced this e-mail from the day before the attack. An urgent appeal from Blackwater's Iraq manager for more ammo, more powerful guns, body armor: 'I've requested hard or armored cars from the beginning.' Today, a Blackwater official said the company cares about the safety of employees. And that these men, had adequate equipment."

Mistrial Declared In Watada Court-Martial. ABC World News (2/7, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "At Fort Lewis, the judge overseeing the court-martial of an Army Lieutenant who refused to deploy to Iraq declared a mistrial today." Lieutenant Aaron Watada "signed a document admitting some of the charges. The judge ruled he didn't understand what he was signing and a retrial is expected in March."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Verhovek, 850K) reports the decision "left military prosecutors visibly stunned." The ruling by the judge, Lt. Col. John Head "turned on the contentious issue of whether factual stipulations agreed to earlier by the prosecutors and the defense team amounted to a confession of guilt." Prosecutors "argued, in effect, that Watada did confess to refusing direct orders to fly to Iraq with his unit last summer, and that his reasons were irrelevant." Watada "said he had admitted to the fact that he deliberately missed his flight, but that he did so because he considered the war illegal -- and wanted to explain his reasoning at the trial." The New York Times (2/8, Oppel, Glanz, 1.16M) runs a similar report.

El Paso Corp. Agrees To $7.7 Million Oil-For-Food Probe Settlement. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Neumeister) reports, "The nation's largest natural gas pipeline company agreed to pay the federal government $7.7 million to settle corruption allegations related to the U.N. oil-for-food scandal over aid to Iraq, according to a settlement announced Wednesday. El Paso Corp. will forfeit $5.48 million to the United States, which will seek to transfer the money to the Development Fund of Iraq to be paid as restitution for the benefit of the people of Iraq, according to the agreement announced by federal prosecutors and the FBI. In a separate deal with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Houston-based company will pay an additional $2.25 million." The AP notes that "El Paso will not be prosecuted for any crimes except possibly criminal tax violations as long as it continues to continue cooperating fully with the federal government in its investigation into the scandal-ridden U.N. oil-for-food program."

US Trying To Prevent Quick Hanging For Former Saddam VP. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A4, Bravin, 2.04M) reports, "US officials are working to spare Saddam Hussein's former vice president from a rapid trip to the Iraqi gallows, fearful that his execution, following the flawed hangings of Mr. Hussein and a co-defendant, could further damage the credibility of the American-backed government." The former vice president, Taha Yassin Ramadan, "was among seven officials -- including Mr.

Hussein -- convicted in November by the Iraqi High Tribunal, an Iraqi-run court established by the U.S. to try members of the ousted regime."

US Marine To Face Trial In Italian Court. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports in a trial that "is straining relations" between the US and Italy, "an American Marine was ordered to stand trial in Italy in connection with the shooting death of a top Italian intelligence agent in Iraq in 2005. But the trial, set for April 17 in Rome, is likely to occur without the defendant. United States officials cleared the Marine, Specialist Mario Lozano, of any wrongdoing in the death of the agent, Nicola Calipari" who, at the time of his death, "had just secured the release of an Italian journalist, Giuliana Sgrena, who was kidnapped in Baghdad."

$7M To Be Paid By El Paso in Oil-For-Food Settlement. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports that "the El Paso Corporation, the largest American natural gas pipeline operator, agreed Wednesday to pay the federal government $7.73 million to settle allegations of involvement in illegal payments under the oil-for-food program run by the United Nations in Iraq." El Paso "will forfeit $5.48 million under a settlement with federal prosecutors in New York" which is the "amount…of secret surcharges paid to Saddam Hussein's government by third parties from whom El Paso purchased oil." The Securities and Exchange Commission has also sought "a civil penalty of $2.25 million" because they allege El Paso "had bought about 21.4 million barrels of Iraqi crude oil from third parties participating in the program;" a program "that more than 4,500 companies had taken part and that more than half had paid kickbacks," according to former Federal Reserve chairman Paul A. Volcker.

Gates Holds NATO To Its Promise To Boost Help In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports that Defense Secretary Robert Gates will join NATO defense ministers in Seville on Thursday "to discuss ways to confront an expected Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, amid growing American pressure for the allies to commit more troops and resources" to the growing unrest and terrorist activity in the region. During the "two days of informal talks," members "will also discuss developments in Kosovo, where tensions are quietly simmering over its future status." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "and NATO's new military chief, Gen. Bantz J. Craddock…face a baptism of fire with their first official meeting" where Gates plans "to prod his partners to supply the promised troops and military equipment for the 35,000-strong NATO-led International Security Assistance Force." According to one anonymous senior American defense official, General Craddock has "drawn up a new set of requirements for the Afghan mission that would be discussed at the meeting in Seville."

DOJ:

Emanuel Wants Dismissed US Attorney Named Special Counsel In Cunningham Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Paltrow) reports, "Democrats have signaled they aren't dropping the controversy over what they describe as the Bush administration's 'firing' of federal prosecutors." House Democratic Caucus Chair Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-IL) "yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, demanding that he appoint the recently fired U.S. Attorney in San Diego as a special counsel so that she can continue overseeing a congressional corruption probe." The Journal adds, "Carol Lam, appointed in 2002 as San Diego U.S. Attorney, was among at least seven U.S. attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department. Ms. Lam supervised the investigation and prosecution of Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, now in federal prison for soliciting bribes. That case led to related investigations, including inquiries into a businessman who also had dealings with Rep. Jerry Lewis, the California Republican who until recently was chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, and into Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo, the former third-ranking official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Both individuals deny any wrongdoing." The Journal notes, "In his letter, Mr. Emanuel said, 'As you are aware, there are many questions surrounding the recent dismissal of seven U.S. Attorneys, including whether or not your office has the authority to dismiss these individuals, and if their firings were politically motivated.' … The Justice Department has said most of the prosecutors in question were asked to leave because of poor performance. It has strongly denied any intent to derail investigations. A spokeswoman said the Justice Department wouldn't comment specifically on Mr. Emanuel's letter because it hadn't received it. 'As a general matter,' she said, 'U.S. attorneys leave office for all sorts of reasons, and complex and important cases carry on with no interruption by the career prosecutors who manage them. There is no reason to suggest that any ongoing cases in San Diego would be any different.'"

The Hill (2/8, Crabtree) reports, "Lam was one of seven U.S. attorneys the Justice Department asked to resign late last year, using a little-known provision in the USA Patriot Act that allows Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors on an indefinite basis. At the time of her dismissal, Lam was investigating whether the Cunningham case involved other members of Congress and lobbyists." The Hill adds, "Beyond Cunningham, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego sent a flurry of subpoenas for records to three congressional committees in late December. According to a Democratic leadership aide, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has been working with the House General Counsel's office and was

'close to a deal' last week with the assistant U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego on whether to comply with those subpoenas — and, if the papers were handed over, which documents to include." The Hill notes, "In a letter sent to Gonzales yesterday, Emanuel argued that keeping Lam on as an outside counsel would allow the Bush administration to dispel questions about whether Lam's firing was politically motivated. … Emanuel highlighted Lam's record on crime and immigration prosecutions to counter explanations that she was asked to leave because she was not prosecuting enough of these cases."

Former Washington US Attorney Says He Was Ordered To Resign. The AP (2/8, Johnson) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney John McKay told The Associated Press on Wednesday that his resignation last month was ordered by the Bush administration, which gave him no explanation for the firing. … 'I was ordered to resign as U.S. attorney on Dec. 7 by the Justice Department,' McKay, who had led the department's Western Washington office, said in a telephone interview from Washington, D.C. 'I was given no explanation. I certainly was told of no performance issues.'" The AP continues, "McKay previously had said only that he was resigning because it was time for him to move on. His comments came one day after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty acknowledged to the Senate Judiciary Committee that the Justice Department has fired seven U.S. attorneys in the West in the past year, most of them for 'performance-related' reasons he would not divulge." The AP adds, "The dismissals have been heavily criticized by Democratic lawmakers. … 'John McKay has worked diligently for our region and it is deeply disconcerting that he could have been let go for political reasons,' said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash. 'Congress and the American people have no tolerance for the politicization of the U.S. attorney's office.'" The AP notes, "Robert Lasnik, the chief U.S. District Court judge for the Western District of Washington, said he and his fellow judges could not understand the firing and were dismayed that the Justice Department implied there was anything wrong with McKay's performance. … 'This is unanimous among the judges: John McKay was a superb U.S. attorney,' Lasnik said. 'For the Justice Department to suggest otherwise is just not fair.' … 'By every measure, the performance of his office improved during his tenure,' Lasnik added. 'If you talk to local prosecutors, or local sheriffs, or the FBI or the ATF, they never had the kind of service from the U.S. attorney's office in terms of service, cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under John McKay's leadership. We're busier than ever before because they're bringing more cases.'"

McKay Got Positive Review Seven Months Before Ouster. The Seattle Times (2/8, Bowermaster) reports, "Seven months before he was forced to resign as U.S. attorney for the western district of Washington, John McKay received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators. … 'McKay is an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the [U.S. attorney's office] and the District's law enforcement community,' the team of 27 Justice Department officials concluded, according to a copy of their final report obtained by The Seattle Times." The Times continues, "Yet on Dec. 7, Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, called McKay and asked him to step down. … 'I was told to resign by the end of January,' McKay confirmed Wednesday. 'I asked what the reason was, and they told me there was none. … Ultimately, I serve at the pleasure of the president,' McKay said. 'I accept that now and I accepted that then, and that's why I resigned.'" The Times adds, "McKay's revelation came one day after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate judiciary committee that six U.S. attorneys had been asked to resign in December for 'performance-related' issues. … Democrats convened the hearing to express concerns that the White House was purging U.S. attorneys, either to replace them with political loyalists or to penalize them for cases they prosecuted. … McNulty denied both assertions at the hearing. … Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., was not satisfied. … 'I would like the Justice Department to inform me exactly what it means by "performance-related" reasons and reassure me that Mr. McKay was not dismissed solely on the basis of partisan politics,' Murray wrote in a letter to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who chairs the judiciary committee. Tasia Scolinos, director of public affairs for the Department of Justice, said the department would not confirm whether McKay was asked to step down, or why. … 'The department appreciates John's commitment to the job and the important work done during his tenure as U.S. attorney,' Scolinos said."

Senators Mull Changing Patriot Act Provision On US Attorneys. Congress Daily (2/8, Talbott) reports, "Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter, R-Pa., Tuesday said he would support a bid to reverse a provision in the USA PATRIOT Act that helped facilitate what Democrats charge was the improper dismissal of seven U.S. attorneys." Congress Daily continues, "Denying an accusation by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that the provision was 'slipped into the PATRIOT Act in the dead of night' on his watch, Specter said he discovered it recently and agreed 'We ought to change it back to what it was.' … The provision authorizes the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods." Congress Daily adds, "A bill by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. to change the appointment procedure is scheduled to be voted on in the committee Wednesday."

Friends Praise New Arkansas US Attorney. The Arkansas Democrat & Gazette (2/8, Barton) reports, "Ask friends of new U. S. Attorney Tim Griffin to describe the 38-year-old prosecutor, and they gush adjectives. They call him

'driven,' 'conscientious, ' 'highly intelligent' and fiercely loyal to his home state of Arkansas." The D&G continues, "Rep. John Boozman, the lone Republican in the Arkansas delegation, is typical: 'He's a very smart guy and very hard worker. He's done great no matter where he has been.' … But outside the circle of Griffin's friends and many of the state's prominent conservatives, Griffin remains something of a mystery. … 'I don't know many people who know anything about him,' veteran Little Rock attorney Scott Trotter said. When Griffin, a Magnolia native, was appointed to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas in December, 'we just sort of scratched our heads.'" The D&G adds, "Said Arkansas' senior senator, Democrat Blanche Lincoln, 'I really didn't know much about him, aside from what I read about him in the newspaper and what I found on Google.' … Griffin's political resume — key player in both of President Bush's campaigns, deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove — is better known than his legal resume. Many saw his appointment as forcing out the popular Bud Cummins in order to reward a campaign operative. … Cummins was not among them. … He, too, was a loyal Republican and Bush backer when he was appointed in 2001. To replace him with Griffin, Cummins has said, was 'entirely within the prerogative of the White House.'"

More Commentary. The Denver Post (2/8) editorializes, "The dismissals of at least seven U.S. attorneys in the West is a vivid reminder of just how far the Bush administration will go to circumvent Congress." The Post continues, "The firings will have a chilling effect on all federal prosecutors, as McNulty well knows. U.S. attorneys should be empowered to pursue justice wherever the road takes them. They certainly shouldn't fear for their jobs because the administration wants to reward the well-connected, or because their exercise of judgment could be seen as unwelcome independence. … Congress should act quickly to reinstate time limits on interim U.S. attorney appointments, a move supported by Specter and many other lawmakers. Scrutiny of these appointments will protect the country from nominees whose fidelity is to the White House instead of the Constitution."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/8) editorializes, "The Justice Department had a chance to defend its dismissal of H.E. Cummins III, the United States attorney for Eastern Arkansas, along with six other U.S. attorneys across the country. Apparently the move was indefensible. … Offered a chance to explain the move at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing this week, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty said he knew of no complaints about Cummins' service. … This after Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said: 'I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation.' … Could the credibility of the administration get worse?" The Appeal adds, "The losers here go beyond Cummins and the Senate, which didn't get a chance to vet Cummins' replacement because of a little-known provision of last year's reauthorization of the Patriot Act that allows the White House to circumvent the Senate approval process with open-ended interim appointments. The people of Eastern Arkansas have lost a capable federal prosecutor with a formidable record of public service. … Griffin could turn out to be capable as well. But he enters office under a cloud of doubt, created by an administration that has manipulated the Patriot Act to consolidate presidential power to an unprecedented degree."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Attorneys Claim Impasse Over Nacchio Evidence. The Denver Post (2/8, Vuong) reports, "The Department of Justice said in a new court filing that it is at an impasse with attorneys for former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio over how the parties will handle the introduction of certain classified information during the course of his criminal insider trading trial." The Post continues, "Nacchio's attorneys have said they plan to use classified information to defend him against 42 counts of illegal insider trading." The Post adds, "Prosecutors said in the filing that an unnamed government agency believes its identity will be disclosed under the defense's proposed handling of certain top-secret information. … 'The agency believes that the defendant's proposals, if adopted, will reveal the agency's identity,' Justice Department attorneys wrote in the filing. … The government asked U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham to rule on its proposed handling of the information. … A hearing is scheduled for Thursday."

The AP (2/8, Shore) reports, "Prosecutors say they are at an impasse with former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio's attorneys over the best way to describe some of the classified material to be used at his trial on insider trading charges." The AP continues, "The evidence includes government documents that must be withheld from the public under federal law. Attorneys for both sides have been working on substitute explanations for the documents that can be made public without violating the law." The AP adds, "Representatives of a federal agency have said they believe a description proposed by defense attorneys will reveal the agency's identity, prosecutor Leo Wise said. … 'After discussions between the parties, it now appears that the parties are at an impasse on this issue,' Wise wrote in a brief filed late Tuesday." The AP notes, "The brief was filed the same day Nacchio's attorneys sought a 60-day postponement in the trial, contending prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that Nacchio's rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts as scheduled. … At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed. … Defense attorney Herbert Stern told Nottingham that he needs the additional time to evaluate material that prosecutors have turned over in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of documents that Stern said he was made aware of Monday. … Prosecutors have countered that evidence exchange has been hampered because of the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets strict guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts."

Judge Seen Unlikely To Dismiss Brocade Fraud Charges. The California Recorder (2/8, Scheck) reports, "The initial casualties of the government's massive stock option backdating probe had their first chance to try to get their cases thrown out of court on Wednesday. … But after an hour of arguments, it seemed unlikely that U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer would dismiss some of the fraud counts against former Brocade Communications CEO Gregory Reyes and ex-HR manager Stephanie Jensen." The Recorder continues, "The motion to dismiss seven criminal counts is part of a two-pronged effort -- made possible by Breyer's insistence that criminal and civil government cases proceed together -- to gut criminal and civil SEC charges accusing the defendants of backdating employee stock options to recruit and retain top talent during the dot-com boom. … The other prong, a motion for summary judgment on the civil side, was filed late Monday." The Recorder adds, "At Wednesday's hearing, a lawyer for Reyes -- Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom partner Christopher Gunther -- argued that an August decision by the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals should invalidate seven counts in the indictment. Reyes is indicted on 12 counts and Jensen on eight. Gunther's energetic presentation included a chalkboard drawing and a stroll across the courtroom to display how far 'out on a limb' prosecutors were going with their case. … The opinion he cited, U.S. v. Brown, 2006 WL 2130525, found that a person cannot be convicted on charges of denial of honest services if he or she was acting in the best interests of the company. … And, Gunther said, the government's indictment says that Reyes and Jensen manipulated options grants not for their own gain, but to benefit the company." The Recorder notes, "Breyer seemed interested in the Brown arguments and asked the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal, whether the Department of Justice had decided how to deal with the case's fallout. … 'Right now, the only policy I'm aware of, your honor, is that Brown was wrongly decided,' Steskal said. He also told the judge that it's possible that later in the case, when the government produces its evidence, it could offer support for behavior that would involve self-dealing. … In the end, Breyer seemed inclined to not dismiss the indictments -- at least not right away -- since the honest services issues could be revisited later in the case."

Delaware Ruling In Maxim Case Opens Door To Shareholder Options Suits. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A7, Jones, Maremont) reports, "An influential Delaware judge issued a strongly worded opinion that could open the doors to more shareholder derivative lawsuits against companies alleged to have backdated stock options." The Journal continues, "William Chandler, chancellor of the Delaware Court of Chancery, ruled Tuesday that certain claims brought by a shareholder of Maxim Integrated Products, Inc., a Sunnyvale, Calif., chip maker, against several current and former board members could go forward despite defendants' objections. … Separately, Maxim last week said an internal probe overseen by a special committee of its board found backdating of options to its employees and directors, though options for top officers were 'properly granted.' The company said it expects to restate results back to at least 2000." The Journal adds, "The suit, brought by Walter E. Ryan, is called a derivative suit, in which a shareholder technically sues on behalf of the corporation itself. To file a successful derivative suit, a plaintiff generally must first ask the board to remedy the alleged problem. But that requirement may not apply if a plaintiff can raise a reason to doubt that board members were complicit in the alleged behavior. … Defendants moved to dismiss the case on a variety of grounds, among them that Mr. Ryan had failed to take the backdating issue to the board. Chancellor Chandler denied the motion on that point, ruling that because 'one half of the current board members approved each challenged transaction,' the requirement to ask for board approval wasn't necessary."

Former Siemens Official Reportedly Cooperating With German Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A11, Esterl, Crawford) reports, "A former Siemens AG executive alleged to have negotiated a $50 million payment to cover up bribes in Saudi Arabia is cooperating with German authorities, according to people familiar with the matter. … The executive's assistance could lend momentum to a widening international investigation into alleged corruption at the German conglomerate." The Journal continues, "Police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several suspects. Prosecutors suspect senior Siemens employees set up sham consulting contracts to bribe potential customers. … Siemens is cooperating with prosecutors. The company said in December it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions spanning seven years." The Journal adds, "The prosecutor's office in Munich yesterday said it released a former Siemens employee who had turned himself in for questioning last week. … It would only identify the witness as 'J.-C.S.,' adding that the person had traveled to Germany from Argentina and made extensive statements to authorities. … People familiar with the situation said the witness -- who is also a suspect -- is Juan-Carlos Stotz, 43 years old, a former telecommunications-equipment executive suspended late last year by Siemens. … Mr. Stotz allegedly helped broker a $50 million settlement in 2004 with a Saudi consulting firm that had threatened to forward documents to U.S. authorities detailing bribes paid on the German company's behalf, according to another key suspect cooperating with German authorities."

Banks Suffer From Misjudging Mortgage Risks. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Mollenkamp) reports, "When the U.S. housing market was booming, HSBC Holdings PLC raced to join the party. Sensing opportunity in the bottom end of the mortgage market, the giant British bank bet big on borrowers with sketchy credit records. … Such subprime customers have always been risky, but HSBC figured it could control that risk. In 2005 and 2006, it bought billions of dollars of subprime loans from other lenders, lured by the higher interest rates they carry." The Journal continues, "Now, the party is over for HSBC -- and for lots of other bankers who aimed to cash in on the housing boom of the first half of this decade. When interest rates ticked up and the market cooled, HSBC reached a disconcerting conclusion: Its systems for screening subprime borrowers and for assessing the default risk they posed were flawed. … Many of those loans have soured, sometimes quickly. The percentage of HSBC mortgages more than 60 days past due is climbing. Fraud by borrowers has been higher than expected." The Journal adds, "In a surprise announcement late yesterday, HSBC said its subprime-mortgage problem was worse than previously indicated. It said the capital it sets aside to cover all bad debts, including the soured mortgages, would be 20%, or $1.76 billion, higher than analysts' consensus estimates. … HSBC's mortgage woes provide a window into the economic hangover brought on by the end of the housing boom. In recent months, mortgage bankers have taken a place beside home builders, condominium developers and real-estate agents, all of them struggling to adjust to a new housing landscape."

Attorney Who Led Internal Hewlett-Packard Probe Named GC. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, B5, Lawton) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. appointed Michael Holston executive vice president and general counsel, succeeding Ann Baskins, who resigned in September over her role in H-P's board-investigation scandal." The Journal continues, "Mr. Holston, 44 years old, is a partner at the law firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP. He led H-P's internal review of the leak investigation and has worked with H-P as external counsel for more than a decade, H-P said. His new responsibilities will include the company's legal affairs in addition to other areas such as compliance, privacy and ethics. … In a statement, Chief Executive Mark Hurd said 'Mike is a first-rate lawyer, with extensive trial and government-relations experience.'" The Journal adds, "In September, H-P disclosed that external investigators retained by the company had used pretexting -- gaining access to private phone records through false pretences -- to spy on board members, employees, reporters and others in an investigation to ferret out boardroom leaks. The scandal resulted in the resignation of Patricia Dunn as chairman and investigations by several government agencies. … That month, Mr. Hurd asked Morgan Lewis to conduct an independent review of its leak investigation. Mr. Holston conducted the review and reported directly to Mr. Hurd. Another law firm had initially investigated the affair on behalf of the board. … Mr. Holston told reporters in September that Mr. Hurd attended a July 2005 meeting at which a summary of the first phase of the leak investigation was discussed, but Mr. Holston didn't specify if pretexting was mentioned in the meeting. Mr. Hurd also received a report on the investigation in March 2006 that explained pretexting but contained assurances that the tactics were legal, Mr. Holston disclosed. Mr. Hurd said he didn't read the report. … Fallout from the scandal included criminal charges by the California attorney general against Ms. Dunn, who pleaded not guilty. Ms. Baskins, was never charged. She declined to testify as part of a congressional investigation into the matter."

Judge Denies Request For Accelerated Trial Date For Former Fannie Mae Chief. The Washington Post (2/8, Hilzenrath) reports, "A judge yesterday rejected former Fannie Mae chief executive Franklin D. Raines's request that the government be compelled to begin a trial this month on administrative charges that he manipulated the company's earnings." The Post continues, "Accelerating such an extensive case 'would be nothing short of an absurdity,' administrative law Judge William B. Moran said at a scheduling conference. … Raines had argued that he was entitled to have the proceeding begin within 60 days of the filing of charges, which occurred in December." The Post adds, "The federal agency that filed the charges, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, had proposed a timetable that left the trial date open but gave the parties until nearly the end of this year to file pretrial statements. … Noting that Raines and other former Fannie Mae executives are seeking millions of pages of government documents for use in their defense, the judge said Raines's position was 'specious and somewhat disingenuous.' … Citing a Supreme Court decision in a previous case, the judge said the statute required that the scheduling conference, not the evidentiary hearing, occur within 60 days of the filing of charges. In future arguments, Moran warned, lawyers in the case should tell the court about case law that runs contrary to their positions. … Kevin Downey, an attorney for Raines, told the judge that if the trial begins this month, the burden on the defense would be comparable to the burden on the regulators. This week, a spokesman for Raines framed the request for a February trial date as an issue of fairness."

US Indicts Five In Iraq Contracting Scam. The AP (2/8, Jordan) reports, "Three U.S. Army Reserve officers were indicted Wednesday, accused of taking part in a bid-rigging scam that steered millions of dollars for Iraq reconstruction projects to a contractor in exchange for cash, luxury cars and jewelry." The AP continues, "An American businessman in Romania was charged as the go-between for the military officers and the contractor. The husband of one of the reservists was accused of helping smuggle tens of thousands of dollars into the United States that the couple used to pay for a deck and a hot tub at their New Jersey house. … Together, the five used the $26 billion Iraqi rebuilding fund 'as their own personal ATM machines,' Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in announcing the charges. … 'These defendants actually took bricks of stolen cash ... and smuggled them out of Iraq and back to the United States for their own personal use,' McNulty said." The AP adds, "The 25-count indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in New Jersey, marks the latest development in an investigation of $8.6 million in Iraq contracts awarded to construction mogul Philip H. Bloom. … Bloom, an American citizen who ran construction and services companies under Global Business Group, has admitted to laundering at least $2 million that was stolen from reconstruction funds managed by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. He awaits sentencing. … McNulty said the five people indicted Wednesday stole or otherwise misused $3.6 million from the CPA fund."

USA Today (2/8, 6A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Col. Curtis Whiteford of Riverton, Utah, Lt. Col. Debra Harrison of Trenton, N.J., and Lt. Col. Michael Wheeler of Amherst Junction, Wis., allegedly rigged the bids for more than 27 projects for businessman Philip Bloom, according to a 25-count indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Trenton. … More indictments are expected as the investigation continues into contract corruption in Iraq, said Stuart Bowen, special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction." US News & World Report (7/7, Ragavan) noted on its Web site, "The indictment accuses the defendants and coconspirators of steering at least 27 CPA construction projects in Iraq to Bloom and his companies through a 'rigged bidding process,' overpaying Bloom for his services by more than $8 million, structuring the contracts to Bloom in amounts under $500,000, the dollar limit of all contracting officers' authority, and conspiring to avoid scrutiny by the CPA's contract review board and auditors."

Citing Breach of Contract, Army To Withhold Funds From Halliburton. The New York Times (2/8, Shenon, 1.16M) reports, "The Army announced during a House oversight committee hearing on Wednesday that it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Company after recently discovering that the contractor had hired the company Blackwater USA to provide armed security guards in Iraq, a potential breach of its government contract." The Army "has said that its contracts with Halliburton, which has a five-year, $16 billion deal to support American military operations in Iraq, generally barred the company and its subcontractors from using private armed guards. But in a statement, Halliburton disagreed with the Army's interpretation and suggested that there was nothing to prohibit Halliburton's subcontractors from hiring such guards."

Russert Contradicts Libby On Key Conversation. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 3, 3:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported that at the trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, "the prosecution put its key witness on the stand today," NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert. NBC (O'Donnell) added, "Like so many Washington stories about scandal, what this case really boils down to is an alleged cover-up going back to the start of the war. … What happened at court today pits the man who was Vice President Cheney's closest advisor against a national known journalist," and "Russert's testimony is pivotal to the prosecution because it contradicts what Libby said to a grand jury. Under oath, Libby said it was Russert who first told him about a CIA operative named Valerie Wilson. … But today, Russert told the jury that never happened: 'That would be impossible because I didn't know who that person was until several days later.' … But Libby's lawyer, Ted Wells, in lengthy, sometimes prickly questioning, challenged Russert's memory and pressed him on why as a journalist he had not used the call to get information from Libby." Russert "told the jury that he treated the call as a complaint and not as a conversation with a high level government source."

ABC World News (2/7, story 6, Gibson, 8.78M) called Russert's appearance "crucial testimony," and the CBS Evening News (2/7, story 4, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) noted that the trial "has Washington insiders riveted and the rest of us scratching our heads." CBS (Borger) added, "The courtroom testimony so far has provided a rare view inside a White House under fire during the lead up to the war in Iraq. It's not pretty. Top advisors squabbling in the West Wing, leaked secrets, faulty memories. All part of a full-blown damage control operation apparently led by the Vice President himself." Russert testified that his discussion with Libby "was more of a viewer complaint call. Russert said, 'If I had been told that, I would have remembered it.' Vice President Cheney could take the stand in Libby's defense, but he may also need to answer some questions about himself and whether he directly controlled a White House effort to discredit a political enemy."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Apuzzo) reports, "Russert originally told the FBI that he couldn't rule out discussing Wilson with Libby but had no recollection of it, according to an FBI report Wells read in court. Russert said Wednesday he did not believe he said that. Russert also acknowledged that in November 2003, shortly after the investigation began, that he told an FBI agent that he had not discussed Wilson's wife with Libby." The Washington Post (2/8, A4, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) notes that Russert was "the final, and perhaps most critical, prosecution witness," and adds, "In 11 minutes of direct testimony, Russert offered a vivid description of his telephone call with Libby, and said it rapidly 'evolved into a consumer complaint.' Russert said Libby…was upset that 'Hardball' host Chris Matthews had said in two broadcasts that the vice president was responsible for Wilson's mission to Niger for the CIA and had made negative remarks about Libby. 'What the hell is going on with "Hardball"?' Russert quoted Libby as having asked him. 'Damn it. I'm tired of hearing my name over and over again. What is being said is not true.' In addition to testifying that he had not mentioned Plame to Libby, Russert said that Libby did not bring her up, either.

The New York Times (2/8, Lewis, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "Mr. Russert, whose signature technique in interrogating officials on his television program includes confronting them with documents and texts of previous quotes, found the technique used on him. A defense lawyer displayed documents on a large television screen in the courtroom as he challenged Mr. Russert's recollection of events. The cross-examination is expected to conclude on Thursday." Meanwhile, "white-collar criminal defense lawyers" yesterday "said Mr. Fitzgerald's case lacked emotional appeal, but gave the jurors an uncluttered and convincing story of wrongdoing. Defense efforts to trap prosecution witnesses in contradictions and memory lapses had probably helped Mr. Libby, the lawyers said, although they expressed doubt that the effort had jelled into a plausible explanation of Mr. Libby's conduct."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Perez, 2.04M) reports, "Also, yesterday in court, Mr. Libby's taped testimony revealed that in 2003, as controversy ensued over the Wilson criticism, Mr. Cheney ordered Mr. Libby to leak portions of an intelligence report, which said that Iraq 'vigorously' sought to procure uranium for its weapons program, to The Wall Street Journal. Mr. Libby said he asked Paul Wolfowitz, then deputy Defense Secretary, to leak parts of the report to an editor of the paper's opinion page. … A July 17, 2003, Journal editorial criticized Mr. Wilson's claims, citing the intelligence report, which was made public after the editorial was published."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Schmitt, 850K) and Financial Times (2/8, Daniel) also report on Russert's testimony, and the Washington Post (2/8, C1, Kurtz, 690K) reports, "With the perjury trial…hanging in the balance, the 'Meet the Press' inquisitor -- the man who puts all those quotations up on the screen and presses politicians about contradictions and evasions -- found himself on the receiving end of a tough cross-examination. Russert emerged relatively unscathed yesterday, except for a previously acknowledged memory lapse about a phone call unrelated to the Libby case. But it was a long afternoon for someone who much prefers asking the questions."

On Fox News' Special Report With Brit Hume (2/7), Fred Barnes said, "Obviously, the testimony made by Tim Russert was not helpful to the Libby defense," but "there have been any number of other witnesses who have had very, very fuzzy memories. Just this week, we had an FBI agent, Debra Bond, come back and say well, she had mis-testified the week before when she said it was Karl Rove who originally told columnist Robert Novak about Valerie Plame," and "that is, I think, the core of the defense case, 'Look at all these other people, they couldn't remember correctly, either. And why would you expect scooter Libby to?'"

The AP (2/8, Yost) reports, "Russert's much-anticipated version of the July 2003 telephone conversation is important to the case because Libby told the grand jury that his conversation with Russert was the first time the White House aide had heard about Wilson's wife. He later said he had forgotten that Vice President Dick Cheney had told him about Wilson's wife a month earlier." The AP continues, "Defense attorneys want to know who negotiated the agreement to get Russert's testimony and other details, including any interaction with Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan, who oversaw the grand jury that indicted Libby. … In a court filing, prosecutors said that nothing in the government's possession is inconsistent with Russert's statements in the investigation. Prosecutors said they've already provided Libby's lawyers with details of Russert's cooperation." The AP notes, "At the start of the trial, jurors were told that Russert was only questioned for 22 minutes, that he was not required to make a grand jury appearance and that prosecutors failed to ask Russert a number of important questions. … 'You're going to see that Tim Russert had a deal,' the jury was told by the defense during opening statements. … Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald says prosecutors' dealings with Russert had to conform to Justice Department guidelines, which require greater caution when dealing with journalists as opposed to other witnesses."

Bloomberg (2/8, Asseo) reports, "Prosecutors are near completion of their case in Libby's trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton told defense lawyers to be prepared to begin presenting evidence tomorrow. … Potential defense witnesses include Cheney, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward and other journalists." Bloomberg adds, "Wells sought to show that Russert has previously displayed a faulty memory, pointing to a letter he wrote to the Buffalo News acknowledging he forgot that he had called a News columnist to dispute an article about Russert's performance in moderating a debate by presidential candidates in 2000. … Wells also questioned how Russert could have talked to an FBI investigator in November 2003 about his conversation with Libby and later resisted a subpoena to testify before a grand jury. … In speaking to the FBI investigator, 'the focus was on my words, my words, not Mr. Libby's words,' Russert said, adding that he didn't reveal anything Libby said in confidence."

Libby Told Grand Jury Cheney Seemed Surprised By Plame Revelation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Yost) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney seemed surprised in 2003 when told where his chief of staff had learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame. 'From me?' Cheney asked, tilting his head, according to" Libby's grand jury testimony. "Libby's account of the conversation came near the end of nearly eight hours of audiotapes of his 2004 grand jury testimony that prosecutors finished playing at his trial Wednesday. Libby describes finding in his own handwritten notes a reference to Cheney saying in mid-June 2003 that the wife of war critic Joseph Wilson worked at the CIA. The reference by Cheney was more than a month before Plame was outed in a newspaper column."

Conference Panel Addresses Internet Threats To Children. CNET News (2/8, Ogg) reports, "The amount of unwanted sexual material that teens and preteens are exposed to on the Internet has skyrocketed in recent years, yet only a fraction of those children are likely to report it to an adult." CNET continues, "Those were among the concerns voiced Wednesday by members of a panel discussion here at the RSA Security Conference called 'Pandora's Box: Youth and the Internet.' The panel, which featured a journalist, pediatrician, federal law enforcement official and a security expert, threw out similarly scary statistics and invited the tech community to help find a solution to children's exposure to pornography as well as the prevalence of child pornography." CNET adds, "One in seven children between 10 and 17 have received an online sexual solicitation, according to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. In what may be even more disheartening to parents, NCMEC says only 27 percent of kids that received unwanted sexual material online are likely to report it to a parent or guardian. This can include receiving sexually explicit photos or videos, or an invitation to meet someone. … The type of material on the Internet and the threat of child sexual predation is increasingly dangerous, said Drew Oosterbaan, the Department of Justice's chief of the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section. The exploitation of children in the last eight to 10 years has seen 'an amazingly scary escalation of abuse,' Oosterbaan said. A decade ago, the content of child pornography his department worked to eradicate depicted children usually no younger than 13. 'Now there is horrific, tortuous sexual abuse involving babies and toddlers,' he said. … This escalation, he said, is partly due to the Internet's ability to bring communities together. Prior to the explosion of the Internet, pedophiles were relatively isolated. They've now found each other online, and the community's main commodity is child pornography, which if they can't find, they create themselves."

Internet Attacks Highlight Need For Coordination Between Public, Private Sectors. Government Computer News (2/8, Jackson) reports, "Tuesday's denial-of-service attacks against three of the Internet's root DNS servers did not rise to the level of a major cyberincident, but it did highlight the government's efforts to coordinate responses with private-sector infrastructure providers. … 'There was some minor degradation of service,' but no large impact, said Jerry Dixon, head of the Homeland Security Department's National Cyber Security Division." GCN continues, "Dixon was joined Wednesday by Chris Painter of the Justice Department and Mark Hall of the Defense Department, his fellow co-chairmen on the National Cyber Response Coordination Group, at the RSA IT security conference. NCRCG is the government's tool for organizing its response to the most serious cyberattacks, coordinating the efforts of federal departments and agencies with the private sector. … So far, 'we haven't had a real crisis where we've had to stand up,' Painter said." GCN adds, "On a scale of 1 to 10, this week's attacks on top-level Domain Name Service servers only rated about a 3, Dixon said. The NCRCG co-chairs met to discuss the incident and monitor its impact and progress, but hands-on response was coordinated by the US CERT. … The attacks lasted for several hours and directed up to 54Gbps of traffic at the .mil, .info and .bus DNS servers, said US CERT deputy director Michael Witt. The .mil server was the most heavily targeted, he said. … Dixon said investigators are following leads to determine the source of the attacks."

Pennsylvania State Senator Vincent J. Fumo "pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges he defrauded taxpayers and a local nonprofit out of more than $2 million, and surrendered more than 200 firearms as a condition of bail. … The powerful Philadelphia Democrat declined comment during several hours at the federal building, when he was arraigned and processed by the FBI and U.S. marshals." The AP continues, "Fumo appeared confident in court, although his jaw twitched at times, as a clerk spent several minutes reading the 139 criminal counts lodged against him. …. 'Not guilty, your honor,' he said, in answer to the charges." The AP adds, "Fumo, 63, later declined to discuss the cache of guns, which prosecutors said he kept at his Philadelphia mansion, his Harrisburg-area farm and at beach homes in New Jersey and Florida. … Fumo sat in court beside his lead defense attorney, Richard A. Sprague, a legendary 81-year-old former city prosecutor who plans a press conference on the indictment on Thursday." The AP notes, "Co-defendant Ruth Arnao, the longtime Fumo friend who ran the nonprofit, the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also pleaded not guilty to the charges. … She was accompanied in court by her husband, Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission Chairman Mitchell Rubin. Rubin is not charged, but the 267-page indictment states that he joined Fumo on a 2001 trip to Cuba funded by the nonprofit and was paid for Senate contracts that involved little or no work. … The couple also enjoyed a sailing trip with Fumo at Martha's Vineyard on a yacht owned by the Independence Seaport Museum, the indictment charges. … Arnao, 51, of Philadelphia, obstructed the four-year investigation into Citizens' Alliance by helping delete years worth of e-mails, prosecutors said. … She is charged in 45 counts, including two counts of filing a false tax return for allegedly stating that the group did not engage in political activity. According to the indictment, Fumo ordered the charity to fund election polling, a politically motivated lawsuit against a Senate rival and other partisan efforts." The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/8, Shiffman, Lounsberry, 385K) reports on the arraignment, under the headline "Fumo Surrenders To FBI, Pleads Not Guilty," and the Philadelphia Daily News (2/8, Hinkelman, 106K) also reports the story.

Austrian Investigators Uncover International Child Porn Network. USA Today (2/8, 13A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The Austrian government has provided the FBI with more than 200 U.S. Internet addresses identified in a far-reaching international child pornography investigation in which suspects allegedly paid to watch graphic videos of young children being sexually abused. The investigation, which began last summer, has identified 2,361 Internet addresses in at least 77 countries, including the USA, where customers paid about $90 to view the abuse of infants and other children, Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter said Wednesday." USA notes, "It was unclear how many suspects could be traced to the addresses because computer users frequently maintain multiple addresses, FBI and Austrian authorities said. 'This is an ongoing investigation,' FBI spokesman Paul Bresson said. 'The FBI is working closely with the Austrian authorities … to combat the proliferation of online child exploitation. Although the number of subjects may end up being significantly less … it will likely result in the identification of numerous individuals in the U.S.' Platter said no arrests had been made."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Oleksyn) reports, "The children were under the age of 14 and screams could be heard, said Harald Gremel, an Austrian police expert on Internet crime who headed the investigation." Platter "said the FBI was investigating about 600 of the suspects in the United States. German authorities were following leads on another 400 people, France was looking into about 100 others, and at least 23 suspects were Austrians, he said." The New York Times (2/8, Smith, 1.16M) notes, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation announced last year it had assembled an international task force, with officials from Europol, the European Union's law enforcement organization, and 18 countries serving six-month rotations in the United States to help American child-pornography investigators." BBC News (2/7) added, "Twenty-three suspects were being questioned, Austrian officials said, and arrest warrants might soon be issued. Fourteen of them have confessed to downloading the material."

Fox News Live (2/7, 2:07 p.m.), CNN's Live Today (2/7), CNN.com (2/7, Pleitgen), Bloomberg (2/8, Tirone), Canada's CTV.ca (2/7) and Britain's The Sun (2/8, Sturgis) also reported on the Austrian probe, all noting that the FBI is investigating the Internet addresses identified in the US.

Internet Porn Rings Prove Difficult To Track. The AP (2/8, Bergstein) reports, "The numbers behind an international child pornography bust Wednesday were themselves disturbing: Nearly 2,400 suspects from 77 countries allegedly paid to view videos depicting sexual abuse online. But the nature of Internet traffic makes it sadly unsurprising that people would figure they could hide so much hideous material." The AP continues, "Finding and stamping out such content 'is needle-in-a-haystack work,' said Carole Theriault, a security consultant with Sophos PLC in London." The AP adds, '"Austrian authorities said an employee of a Vienna-based Internet file-hosting service approached his national Interior Ministry last July with word that he had noticed the pornographic material during a routine scan. … The videos showed 'the worst kind of child sexual abuse,' said Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter, citing the rape and sexual abuse of girls and boys younger than 14. At times the children could be heard screaming. … Lead investigator Harald Gremel said the videos were online for at most a day before they were discovered. The Austrian Internet service employee blocked access to the videos while recording the computer addresses of people who tried to download the material, and gave the details to authorities. … Within 24 hours, investigators recorded more than 8,000 hits from 2,361 computer addresses in 77 countries around the world, including the United States, according to Gremel. … Why did finding this take what would seem a lucky break by network administrator? Because everything traversing the borderless Internet looks the same while in transit. Whether it's a mundane e-mail or videos as insidious as this, all traffic gets splintered into packets of data that don't identify what they contain. … Consequently, unless a nefarious Web site advertises itself with spam e-mails or shuttles an inordinate amount of traffic, several factors can conspire to keep it in the shadows."

Massachusetts Man Charged With Possession Of Child Pornography. The Hingham (MA) Journal (2/8, Ford) reports, "Philip W. Herzberg, 50, of 243 South St., was arrested in Hingham last Thursday (Feb. 1) on federal charges of receipt and possession of child pornography, the U.S. Attorney's office said." The Journal continues, "Herzberg was one of three Massachusetts men who were the latest to be charged in a Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) nationwide investigation dubbed 'Operation Emissary' targeting a Web site based in New Jersey that offers images and movies of hardcore child pornography. … Herzberg, who was arrested at the Hingham Police Department, is charged with six counts of receipt of child pornography and one count of possession of child pornography. … If convicted, Herzberg could face a minimum of five years in prison for each charge of receipt of child pornography and a maximum of 10 years in prison for possession of child pornography." The Journal adds, "Federal agents had been monitoring Herzberg and others over the Internet for three months at the end of 2005 and 2006. In October 2006, more than 125 people in 22 states were arrested in the first wave of a nationwide sweep. … Lt. Michael Peraino, who is spokesman for the Hingham Police Department, said Hingham police assisted federal agents last September in executing a search warrant at Herzberg's home. They seized Herzberg's computers as a result of the federal investigation."

Delay Seen Likely For Cunningham Co-Conspirator's Hearing. The North County (CA) Times (2/8, Bennett) reports, "The sentencing of Randy Cunningham's co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, will likely be delayed again, as the former defense contractor continues to cooperate with federal prosecutors in the ongoing investigation into the Cunningham bribery case, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Washington said Wednesday." The Times continues, "Wade pleaded guilty in February 2006 to having bribed the now-imprisoned Cunningham with more than $1 million in a scheme to enrich himself through lucrative defense contracts. Wade faces up to 11 years in prison and remains free pending sentencing. He could have gotten up to 20 years, if not for a plea deal in which he promised to cooperate with prosecutors in their ongoing investigation. … In August, the U.S. attorney's office in Washington announced that it was postponing the presentencing hearing until early 2007 due to Wade's ongoing cooperation. And on Wednesday, Washington spokesman Channing Phillips said the hearing is likely to be put off for another six months, for the same reason. … 'If he's going to get the full benefit of his cooperation, it makes no sense (to sentence him) before his cooperation ends,' Phillips said in a Wednesday phone interview from his Washington office. … He said defense counsel and prosecutors generally work with the judge to negotiate decisions on whether to postpone a sentencing hearing."

FTC Reports ID Theft Again Leads Consumer Fraud Complaints. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Rugaber) reports, "Consumers reported over 670,000 cases of fraud and identity theft in 2006 that cost them $1.2 billion in losses, the Federal Trade Commission said in its annual report Wednesday. For the seventh straight year, ID theft was the most common complaint, the FTC said, accounting for 36 percent, or 246,035, of the complaints. ID theft complaints have leveled off after a steep increase earlier this decade. The number of ID theft complaints jumped from almost 162,000 in 2002 to a record 246,882 in 2004, slightly higher than last year's number, the agency said." The AP notes, "The annual report is based on data collected by the FTC and over 115 other organizations, including law enforcement agencies, such as the FBI, and private groups such as the Better Business Bureau."

Consultant Trains Convicts How To Survive In Prison. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/8, Fitzsimmons) reports, "Dr. Prison is a consulting business, based in La Mesa and run by a San Diego man, that coaches men and women who are about to serve sentences in jail or prison. Dr. Prison teaches them how to talk, how to carry themselves, how to make allies and how to avoid making enemies. Really, how to survive. … 'Dr. Prison's mission is to help you avoid being physically hurt, extorted, or possibly killed in prison,' the business says on its Web site, www.drprison.com. … 'Just because you didn't know you shouldn't walk into another person's open cell because you didn't ask permission doesn't mean you should get the crap beaten out of you,' said Steve Scholl, who started Dr. Prison about two years ago." The Union-Tribune continues, "Scholl has never been to prison, but he works with 10 on-call ex-convicts. He carefully selects the right ones to match the client's background and crime. Each client – he sees about two a month – is charged a fee based on the amount of time and attention they need. … 'They will always have directly across the table from them someone who has served time,' Scholl said." The Union-Tribune adds, "Rates start with the phone/e-mail package, at $275 for jail preparation and $375 for prison. The personal visit package runs $375 for jail, $575 for prison, with the client paying for travel expenses; and the video teleconference deal costs $900 for jail and $1,200 for prison. … Dr. Prison also works with families of convicts, advising them how to best support their loved ones as they deal with the sentence from their side of the bars. This month, Scholl and his consultants will start hosting a national, online radio talk show Saturday nights on www.wsRadio.com. Listeners can call in for advice. … Clients contact Dr. Prison on the advice of their lawyers or bail bondsmen. … They aren't gang members, and certainly aren't people who have been in prison before. … Based on interviews he conducted with released convicts, Scholl says a person who doesn't know how to act in prison has a 25 percent to 30 percent chance of getting killed; a 10 percent to 15 percent chance of being raped; a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of getting stabbed; and an 80 percent to 90 percent chance of getting beaten."

Air Traffic Controller Blamed In Airline Crash That Killed Radio Star. The Chicago Tribune (2/8, O'Connor) reports, "An aviation consultant testified Wednesday that an air-traffic controller's negligence led to the midair collision near Waukegan that killed radio star Bob Collins and two other people in 2000. … 'There were a multitude of things he did wrong,' Richard P. Burgess, who spent 32 years at the Federal Aviation Administration, testified at a federal trial into the cause of the crash." The Tribune continues, "Burgess, hired by lawyers for Collins' widow, also said that a 1997 midair collision at Chicago's Meigs Field that killed seven people was 'a wake-up call' that should have prompted the FAA to install radar at the Waukegan Regional Airport in addition to installing it at Meigs. … The Waukegan airfield was busier than Meigs, yet only Meigs was equipped with radar after the midair collision at the lakefront airport, according to testimony. … Radar was installed at the Waukegan field five months after the crash killed Collins, his passenger, Herman Luscher, and student pilot Sharon Hock in the other plane." The Tribune adds, "In testimony Tuesday, Gregory Fowler, the air-traffic controller in question, admitted he had no idea of the precise location of Hock's Cessna when he instructed her to turn toward the Waukegan airport. … Less than two minutes later, Collins' Moravan Z242L rear-ended the Cessna 172P. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, and Hock's plane plummeted to a Zion street. … Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending that the FAA was responsible for the crash even though a private company operated the Waukegan tower. U.S. District Judge John Darrah is to decide the case. … Burgess testified that Fowler erred when he issued certain directives to the two pilots, including clearing Collins to land, even though he had neither plane in sight. … On cross-examination of Burgess, Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, suggested he had a vendetta against the FAA after he had been suspended and reassigned to a nonsupervisory position late in his career. Burgess denied any hard feelings. … Rosa also contended that in the last four years Burgess had found 32 air-traffic controllers at fault in 18 lawsuits in which he testified."

Report On Lynchburg, VA, Police Custody Death To Be Released Today. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (2/8, Lee) reports, "Two more investigations into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr. are complete and the findings will be released at a news conference today." The N&A continues, "Beard, a 46-year-old Lynchburg man, died in police custody last year after a struggle with two Lynchburg police officers. … Today's findings come a little more than three weeks after Lynchburg's top prosecutor said he would not bring criminal charges against officers Michael Eagle and Michael Huntsman." The N&A adds, "Commonwealth's Attorney Mike Doucette's findings were based on a Virginia State Police investigation. His report focused on whether or not the officers committed a criminal act. … Today's report is based on two internal investigations begun and almost immediately shelved by the Lynchburg Police Department after the state police started its outside investigation. … Lynchburg police have said they would release their findings once the state police inquiry wrapped up." The N&A notes, "One of the Lynchburg Police Department's investigations is looking into whether the officers acted legally during their encounter with Beard, while the other is to determine whether they followed department policy. … A state medical examiner's report showed Beard was suffering from advanced coronary artery disease and that there were no drugs in his system when he died. … Civil rights activists have called for the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the incident."

Three Atlanta Officers Expected To Face Murder Charges Following "No-Knock" Search. In a widely reported story, the AP (2/8) reports prosecutors "intend to seek murder charges against three Atlanta police officers involved in the shooting death of a 92-year-old woman in her home, according to a letter sent to an attorney for one of the officers. Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard sent a letter that said he will ask a grand jury on Feb. 26 to deliver a murder indictment against officers Gregg Junnier, J.R. Smith and Arthur Tesler, said Rand Csehy, Junnier's attorney." Kathryn Johnston "died and three officers were wounded in the Nov. 21 shootout when police used a no-knock warrant to search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home. … Narcotics officers said an informant had claimed there was cocaine in the home, but none was found."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/7) reported the three officers "were involved in securing a search warrant on Nov. 21 for the home of…Johnston. Shortly before the raid, Smith told a magistrate he and Tesler had a confidential informant buy $50 worth of crack at 933 Neal Street from a man named 'Sam.' But, according to the proposed indictment, no informant went to the house."

On its Web site, WXIA-TV, Atlanta (2/7) reports the district attorney "has told the officers' attorneys that he plans to take the case to a Grand Jury on February 26. An attorney for…Junnier said the charges the D.A. plans to take to the jury include felony murder, aggravated assault, false imprisonment, burglary, and other charges."

WSB-TV, Atlanta (2/7) reports on its Web site that the "big news is not only the notice of the indictment itself, but also an FBI action indicated to Channel 2's Mark Winne that the action by the Fulton County D.A.'s Office came without any notice to either the FBI or U.S. Attorney's Office. The official suggested the FBI investigation has not been completed and the FBI had not been notified of what he indicated was a unilateral action taken by the District Attorney."

Nashville Council Makes English Its Official Language. The AP (2/8) reports, "Nashville's city council has voted to adopt English as its official language, following similar moves by several smaller cities around the country." The AP continues, "After months of debate, the city's Metro Council voted 23-14 on Tuesday to approve the measure requiring all government communications to be in English, except when multilingual communications are required by federal rules or are needed 'to protect or promote public health, safety or welfare.' … The exceptions were added after the city attorney contended that the bill's original language was unconstitutional. Some supporters and opponents of the measure said the exceptions mean the law would have little effect on city business." The AP adds, "Nashville, a city of more than 600,000, is home to the nation's largest Kurdish community and has been a resettlement site for refugees from Africa and Southeast Asia. The Hispanic immigrant population also has boomed, and researchers say Nashville's foreign-born population has grown 350 percent since 1990. … Gregg Ramos, a Nashville attorney and first-generation American who opposed the measure, said Nashville is the largest city and the only state capital to pass such a law. … Twenty-eight states have adopted English as their official language, including Arizona, where voters approved a law last year, according to U.S. English Inc., a Washington-based advocacy group. … The U.S. Senate's version of last year's failed immigration bill would have made English the national language, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the measure would have been purely symbolic."

Former Nvidia Counsel Sues Firm For Age Discrimination. The California Recorder (2/8, Seyfer) reports, "Stephen Pettigrew built Nvidia Corp.'s legal department from a one-man-show -- himself -- into a full-fledged public-company team. … But when he got too old, executives demoted and fired him. That's what Pettigrew, who was 64 when he left Nvidia, alleges in an age discrimination lawsuit filed last month against the Santa Clara, Calif., graphics-chip company." The Recorder continues, "Pettigrew also accuses the company of retaliating because he voiced his concern that one of the company's top executives may have committed sexual harassment and gender discrimination. … 'Steve Pettigrew is an outstanding attorney who served this company loyally and very skillfully, and he didn't deserve this,' said his attorney, Allen Ruby of San Jose's Ruby & Schofield." The Recorder adds, "The suit is the latest legal shadow cast on the company, which remains the subject of a Securities and Exchange Commission probe into stock-option backdating as well as a Department of Justice antitrust investigation. The DOJ probe is looking into whether the company monopolized the market for two kinds of graphics products."

ACLU Sues For Removal Of Commandments Monument From Florida Courthouse. The AP (2/8) reports from Cross City, FL, "The American Civil Liberties Union is suing to force a conservative Christian county in Florida to remove a hulking Ten Commandments monument from the courthouse steps." The AP continues, "The 5-foot-tall 6-ton black granite monument stands in front of a building for the courthouse, the elections supervisor office, the tax collector and other public offices in Dixie County. The lawsuit filed in federal court Tuesday said the monument heaps on its religious message with the inscription 'Love God and Keep His Commandments' in large capital letters at its base. … The lawsuit says the monument violates two amendments to the U.S. constitution because it is not part of a historical display and because the uniquely Christian message of the Ten Commandments on a government building could intimidate people with different religious beliefs." The AP adds, "The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that religious displays are not inherently unconstitutional and must be considered on a case-by-case basis. Last year, the high court allowed the Ten Commandments to be displayed outside the Texas state Capitol but not inside two Kentucky courthouses, where the justices said the displays promoted a religious message. … The Dixie County Commission approved the monument, donated by a local businessman, in January 2006 and it was placed on the courthouse steps in November. Dixie County, a rural county where churches outnumber traffic lights, is on the Gulf Coast north of Tampa, Florida."

Wal-Mart Bias Suit Highlights Persistent Wage Disparities. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Trumbull) reports, "A lawsuit against America's largest employer is serving as a reminder that concerns about gender discrimination persist, despite four decades of focus on equal workplace rights." The Monitor continues, "Wal-Mart hasn't been found guilty of sex discrimination – and it may never be, in part because class-action cases on this issue are often settled out of court. … But the very fact that such a large case against the retailer has made it this far – with a federal appeals court giving the go-ahead Tuesday for a class-action lawsuit involving more than 1.5 million women – puts the issue back in the national spotlight more than at any other time in recent years." The Monitor adds, "The case revolves around wage issues – equal pay for equal work. But it also alleges that Wal-Mart shortchanged female employees on opportunities for promotion. … It's that issue – the proverbial glass ceiling – that studies find is the most intractable gender inequity in US industries today, despite the gains women have made since the equal-rights era. … The issue matters not just for women but the whole economy, because the underlying question is whether businesses are making the most productive use of the talent available. Gender discrimination represents a failure involving nearly half the workforce."

African-American Success Stories Seen As Overlooked. In a Washington Post op-ed (2/8, A21), Stephanie Robinson, the founding president and chief executive of the Jamestown Project, and Cornel West, professor of religion at Princeton University and a member of the Jamestown Project Advisory Board, say, "To think of America in 2007, it is impossible not to consider the contributions of African Americans -- many of whom have laid the foundation for American culture, democracy, freedom and equality." Amid the "celebrations commemorating the Jamestown anniversary, thousands of African Americans will convene in Hampton this weekend for the annual State of the Black Union. While the stage will be populated by the extraordinarily successful, the purpose of the State of the Black Union is to not only showcase our success but also to discuss the staggering numbers of African American citizens in poverty, those who are incarcerated, undereducated, underemployed and otherwise outside the reach of the American Dream. But, while the factors that conspire to create subcommunities characterized by unemployment and marginal literacy are debated often, and with vigor, rarely do we discuss the factors that led to the successes of millions of African Americans."

Blackstone Wins Battle To Acquire Equity Office Properties Trust. The Washington Post (2/8, D1, Cho) reports, "The battle to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord, came to an end after Vornado Realty Trust dropped out of the bidding yesterday, leaving the private-equity firm Blackstone Group as the all-but-official winner of the biggest buyout deal in history." The Post continues, "Equity Office's board had tried to get Vornado to sweeten its bid throughout the week, but Vornado said that the price had soared beyond its tastes. … 'The company concluded that the premium it would have to pay to top Blackstone's latest bid . . . would not be in its shareholders' interest,' Vornado said in a statement." The Post adds, "The high-stakes bidding war compelled Blackstone to up the ante several times. After initially offering $48.50 per share last fall, Blackstone is to pay $55.50 per share for Equity Office and assume about $16 billion of Equity's debt, bringing the total value of the deal to $39 billion. … Blackstone's offer was approved by shareholders yesterday."

The Financial Times (2/8, Politi, Guerrera) reports, "Blackstone's victory confirmed its status as one of the most powerful actors in global finance. It comes in the same month as Steve Schwarzman, who founded the firm in 1986, will celebrate his 60th birthday by throwing what is already expected to be one of the most glamorous parties in New York history." The Times adds, "By agreeing to a takeover by Blackstone, EOP will join the string of big companies in the US that have chosen to go private in the past few months. These include Clear Channel Communications, the largest US radio station, and Harrah's Entertainment, the biggest US casino owner."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A1, Forsyth, Sender, Frangos) reports, "Blackstone Group's $23 billion buyout of the owner of the biggest portfolio of U.S. office buildings will send ripples through the real-estate world, with a good chance it will raise the ceiling on already-record prices." The Journal continues, "With office buildings in red-hot demand as investment vehicles, Blackstone's control of prime properties likely will put it in position to demand prices on its individual buildings high enough to make the private-equity firm's bid pay off. The deal, approved yesterday by Equity Office Properties Trust after rival bidder Vornado Realty Trust bowed out following weeks of bidding, also cements Blackstone's clout as one of the most powerful investors on Wall Street." The Journal notes, "Losing out was a bitter disappointment for Vornado Chief Executive Steven Roth, who gave up for the second time in six months on his hope of acquiring Equity Office and its coveted office buildings in markets from Manhattan to San Francisco. … And for Equity Office founder and Chairman Sam Zell, who chatted with his longtime friend Mr. Roth after the shareholder vote, the deal represents a big payday. Factoring in stock options and other payments, Mr. Zell stands to make more than $800 million from the sale, according to proxy statements."

The New York Times (2/8, Sorkin, Pristin) reports, "The deal for Equity Office encapsulates two of the hottest trends in deal-making: the wave of capital flooding into commercial real estate and the growing power of private money. … While residential real estate has slowed, commercial real estate, office buildings in particular, looks more attractive as the market finally shakes off the effects of the burst technology bubble in 2000. Many investors expect office vacancy rates to continue to decline in the next couple of years, with a corresponding rise in rents. … And private equity firms like Blackstone have been among some of the most aggressive investors in commercial real estate. These firms have accumulated huge war chests: even now Blackstone is raising a new $10 billion real estate fund. The surge in buyouts — which accounted for a fifth of the record $3.8 trillion in deals last year — shows no sign of slowing."

FTC Settles Antitrust Claims Against Michigan MLS. Inman News (2/8, Roberts) reports, "The U.S. Federal Trade Commission this week announced a settlement with MiRealSource Multiple Listing Service in Michigan over rules that blocked some property listings from the MLS and set restrictions for other property listings based on the type of real estate contracts." Inman continues, "MiRealSource is the sixth MLS to settle similar antitrust allegations brought by the FTC in October -- the federal agency is proceeding with an antitrust lawsuit against Realcomp II Ltd., another Michigan MLS, over its listings policies. … In each of the cases, the federal government charged that the MLSs engaged in anticompetitive activity by placing restrictions on a category of property listings that could ultimately lead to reduced choices for consumers in real estate services." Inman adds, "Representatives for MiRealSource, which is a broker-owned MLS with about 7,000 members, announced in November that the MLS had agreed to settle the FTC complaint, and the agreement was subject to review and approval by members of the FTC. … 'Under the FTC consent order settling the complaint, MiRealSource has agreed to abandon ... collusive conduct and provide its services to all member brokers representing potential home sellers, regardless of the type of listing contract that they choose,' FTC officials announced in a statement Monday." Inman notes, "The FTC complaint against MiRealSource, issued Oct. 10, charged that the MLS violated antitrust law 'by adopting rules or policies that limit the publication and marketing of certain sellers' properties, but not others, based solely on the terms of their listing contracts. Specifically, the FTC alleges that MiRealSource favored exclusive right to sell listings and disfavored exclusive agency listings by, among other things, adopting a rule to exclude the latter entirely from the MLS.'"

Internet Real Estate Firms Shaking Up Industry. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Haddad) reports, "Recent Chicago transplants Pieter and Beth van Es have recovered from their sticker shock and are ready to buy a house in Southern California. Now, the Irvine couple have a new incentive. … When they buy their home through an online broker, they will get a nice chunk of their money back." The Times continues, "The Van Eses are using Seattle-based Redfin, one of several new brokerage services that hope to revolutionize home buying by rebating part of their commissions back to buyers. The challenge is aimed at traditional firms that charge full commissions, which often total tens of thousands of dollars in today's high-priced Southland market. … Although these upstarts have yet to make a major dent in nationwide sales volume, they are raising eyebrows and causing traditional brokerages to worry." The Times adds, "Redfin, which launches today in Southern California, offers rebates because buyers do much of the groundwork of finding homes via the Web. The brokerage handles the paperwork and conducts negotiations, usually over the phone or via e-mail or fax. … Typically, the commission totals 5% to 6% of the sale price, which is then split between the buyer's agent and the seller's agent. The industry is prevented by law from setting commission rates. As a buyer's broker, Redfin rebates more than half of its cut to the buyer. … Cutting customers in on commission fees isn't a trend the brand-name, more established brokerages are exactly cheering about. The industry is mired in a slowdown, and the number of brokerages and agents is expected to shrink as firms consolidate or go out of business." The Times notes, "What's more, after growing fat on fees that totaled more than $60 billion in 2005, the industry finds itself under attack for alleged anti-competitive practices. The Justice Department has sued the National Assn. of Realtors for trying to limit the availability of property-listing data to upstart online firms such as Redfin and others. … Such data are at the core of the burgeoning rebate movement. As consumers access the same information that brokers have long controlled, a growing awareness of the costs of buying and selling a house is taking hold."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Promotes Boost In National Park Funding. ABC World News (2/7, story 10, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush visited Shenandoah National Park in Virginia today, to rally support for his plan to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into National Parks. A key part of the President's plan is a $3 billion ten-year initiative to improve and maintain parks. One-third of that money would come from private donations that would be matched by the government."

The Harrisonburg Daily News Record (2/8, Turner) says Bush and Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne "led a round-table discussion on the president's National Parks Centennial Initiative, which he revealed earlier this week as part of his proposed 2008 budget." The President's visit "began with a few opening remarks on why he's attempting to persuade Congress to support his initiative. Then Bush engaged in a discussion with national parks officials and representatives of organizations with a vested interest in the nation's parks." Said the President, "Our national parks are really one of America's great treasures. … And the fundamental question is, 'Are we wise enough to treat them as such?'"

McClatchy (2/8, Hutcheson) says Bush's proposed boost comes as part of "an otherwise lean domestic budget." For the new funds to be approved, "first Congress must go along, and it's not clear that it will. The plan includes a controversial proposal to leverage federal funds with matching private donations." McClatchy adds, "Insiders see the influence of first lady Laura Bush, an avid hiker who visits a national park with her Texas pals at least once a year. She and the president will travel to Virginia's Shenandoah National Park on Wednesday to promote the parks-improvement plan."

The AP (2/8) notes the First Lady was also present at the round-table discussion. Ron Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association, "said the president's proposal would be a significant step toward solving some of the parks' major problems, including crumbling facilities, growing pollution and lack of staff." But "House Natural Resources Committee Chairman Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., said the new funding is largely the result of shifting money from existing important park programs, such as construction, into a new budget column with a new label."

The Washington Post (2/8, A6, Fletcher, 690K) notes Rahall's criticism, and says "some critics were leery of Bush's idea of relying in part on private donations to fund major improvements in the nation's parks." The Post adds, "As Bush was campaigning for his parks initiative in the Blue Ridge Mountains, press secretary Tony Snow was challenging the notion that the administration's interest in the parks -- and the environment more generally -- marks a change for the president. Snow noted that last year Bush created the largest protected marine reserve in the world when he set aside as a national park an island chain spanning 1,400 miles of the Pacific northwest of Hawaii." Snow also "countered suggestions that Bush had denied that global warming has a large human component. The White House later released an open letter citing statements dating to 2001 in which Bush had said global warming was largely man-made."

The New York Times (2/8, Stolberg, Barringer, 1.16M), in a story titled "The President Shows His Environmentalist Colors," says that "at a time when his policies on global warming are under scrutiny from environmentalists," Bush "this week cloaked himself in another environmental issue: conservation. … Most environmentalists would not say George W. Bush and Theodore Roosevelt in the same sentence, unless making an invidious comparison." Bush, "his detractors say, has let the national parks slide into decline -- until now."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/8) reports Bush's budget "would give the National Park Service its largest-ever funding increase." Bush is quoted saying, "Congress needs to hear loud and clear how important this initiative is. … I hope the citizens groups who are concerned about the parks beat a hasty trail to the Congress and remind the Congress about what we have done, and what we need to do as good stewards of the parks."

The Rocky Mountain News (2/8, Sprengelmeyer) reports the plan "will take shape between now and the end of May, after…Kempthorne, who oversees the park service, leads a series of 'listening sessions' around the country about projects members of the public and would-be donors would like to see." Bush's proposed budget "includes a 17 percent increase for parks, monuments and other sites in Colorado."

The Beacon Journal (2/8, Downing) notes "the Cuyahoga Valley National Park would get a major boost under…Bush's 2008 federal budget, and park visitors would see a big difference with the 10 percent funding increase." The additional $1 million "would enable the park to hire six full-time staffers and 16 seasonal employees and to restore cuts in interpretive, educational programs and services that were made because of tight budgets in recent years, said Superintendent John P. Debo Jr." The additional funds proposed by Bush represent "a huge turnaround in the budget fortunes of the National Park Service,"' Debo said, adding, "We're just delighted."

The President's trip to Shenandoah National Park was extensively covered by local TV stations across the country. WVIR-TV Charlottesville (2/7), late in its 11 o'clock newscast said the President and First Lady "stopped at Shenandoah

National Park to highlight a big dollar boost over the next ten years through the National Parks Centennial Initiative."

KTRV-TV Boise (2/7) reported, "The presidential visit was part of a roundtable discussion with Kempthorne, the National Parks Service director and other park officials."

WBAY-TV Green Bay (2/7, 5:13 pm) added, "The visit was meant to promote the President's plans to boost park spending. … Conservation groups say many parks have suffered years of neglect and a cleanup is long overdue."

More Commentary. John Bridgeland, vice chairman of the Earth Conservation Corps and CEO of Civic Enterprises, and Curt Buchholtz, president of the National Park Friends Alliance and executive director of the Rocky Mountain Nature Association, write in the Washington Times this morning (2/8) that "the president's release of a multibillion-dollar centennial plan will be an important step in determining what national park system we celebrate in 2016. … What we do with our parks over the next decade will affect how our children and grandchildren enjoy and learn from them and how America's evolving story and heritage are safeguarded. Let's hope our generation meets the challenge to preserve this collective consciousness of our nation and has something grand to celebrate at the 100th anniversary of our national park system."

Interior Extends Deadline For Final Decision On Bald Eagle. The New York Times (2/8, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "With a court-ordered deadline looming for removal of the bald eagle from the endangered species list, the Interior Department, rejecting the advice of its staff wildlife biologists, tried to limit a separate set of protections for the majestic bird that has served as a national symbol for centuries. Public reaction, however, to its December proposal was so sharp that the department had sought a reprieve from the deadline, which it received Wednesday." It now "has until June 29 to make its final decision on the eagle's status and the extent of its continuing protections." The Times adds H. Dale Hall, said in an interview yesterday that contrary to published accounts, "I have never been overruled" by top officials at the Interior Department "on the extent of protections. He said he 'stands behind' the December proposal from the department, which gave the eagles less protection."

Investigators Say Lack Of Deepwater Oversight Led To Coast Guard Waste. The Washington Post (2/8, A7, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Even as contractors built patrol boats with buckling hulls and a large new cutter with structural flaws, a US Coast Guard review gave their performance high marks last year, extended their deal for nearly four years and paid them a multimillion-dollar bonus, government investigators said." DHS IG Richard L. Skinner told legislators at a hearing of the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security Tuesday that analysts evaluating the Deepwater program disregarded "defective ships under development by companies led by Northrop Grumman and Lockheed Martin." Skinner said the decision to turn over "to a private 'systems integrator' the main responsibility for planning, designing and producing a fleet to meet" the Coast Guard's needs had resulted in a failure "at times…to protect taxpayers' interests." Skinner and GAO head David M. Walker "called for more aggressive oversight."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Agent Over Discrimination Complaint. As reported on Tuesday by the Minneapolis Star Tribune and in a widely-distributed AP story, the Washington Times (2/8, Seper, 88K) reports, "A Minneapolis civil jury…unanimously held that the FBI illegally retaliated against Jane Turner, a 25-year veteran FBI agent, by downgrading her performance reviews." The Times notes, "Among FBI officials named in court documents as participating in the retaliatory actions were James Burrus, the assistant director of the FBI's criminal division, and James Casey, a high-level official in the FBI's counterterrorism program. The $565,000 judgment is expected to be reduced by Chief U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum, who heard the case, to the statutory limit of $360,000."

ATF Replaces Two Top Officials. USA Today (2/8, 10A, 2.27M) reports the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives "has replaced two of its leaders. Edgar Domenech, the No. 2 official at the agency, has been transferred to head the bureau's field division in Washington, D.C., ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell said. The assistant director, Michael Bouchard, will leave to oversee field operations nationally." Mixell "would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of a Justice Department audit alleging mismanagement and questionable spending decisions at ATF that led to Director Carl Truscott's departure last August."

The AP (2/8, Jordan) reports, "Mixell said the two will be replaced with what she described as veteran special agents who 'bring a combination of leadership experience and great respect from colleagues that is critical to the ATF's success at the executive level.' … Mixell would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of mismanagement allegations and questionable spending decisions that led to the departure last August of Carl J. Truscott as director. … An audit by the Justice Department's inspector general in October found that Truscott ordered his staff to help with his nephew's high school homework, wasting the agency's time and violating ethics rules. The report also concluded that Truscott's leadership, hiring practices and financial decisions were troubling, including his plan to spend $100,000 on gym equipment for the ATF's new headquarters."

Police Chiefs From US, Latin American Seek Anti-Gang Coordination. AFP (2/8, Bustamante) reports, "Police chiefs from Latin America and the United States opened a three-day summit aimed at forming a strategy to crack down on violent crime gangs." AFP continues, "Latino gangs which originated from Los Angeles have been blamed for smuggling drugs and weapons as well as murders, rapes and robberies. … 'Gang violence is a problem of international scope, and we must face it on a international scale,' Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa told reporters. … 'We must coordinate with our international counterparts in a smart and effective way.'" AFP adds, "Delegates from Mexico, Belize, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras attended Wednesday's conference along with several US police chiefs and officials from the FBI and Justice Department. … The conference aims to agree ways of increasing information-sharing among law enforcement agencies and look at how best to fight gangs thought to be responsible for trafficking drugs and illegal weapons. … FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said the conference's focus was to 'fight gang violence in all its forms.'" AFP notes, "Central American nations have seen a sharp uptick in gang-related crimes, Eimiller said. El Salvador, with a population of 6.8 million people, saw an average of 10 homicides a day in 2006 -- about 70 percent committed by gangs. … 'That trend needs to stop before it comes here,' Eimiller said."

Villaraigosa Identifies City's Worst Gangs, Vows Broad Crackdown. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, McGreevy, Winton, 850K) reports, "Launching a counteroffensive against organized street thugs, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and police officials took the unusual step Wednesday of identifying the city's 11 worst gangs, then promising to go after them with teams of police, federal agents, probation officers and prosecutors. … How many local and federal officers will be committed to the anti-gang push remained unclear, however. And given the complexity of what has been a long-standing social problem, some experts questioned whether the plan would be any more effective than past police crackdowns." Meanwhile, California Gang Investigators Association director Wes McBride "said he feared that some gangs would feel slighted if not named and might try to up the ante with more violent crimes. Najee Ali, a community activist and former gang member, said he also was opposed to any ranking system. … 'To the gang members it is a badge of honor.'"

Study Of Latino Gangs Finds Few Connections To Overseas Groups. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Aizenman) reports, "A study of Latino gangs in the Washington area and five Central American nations debunks the popular belief that the gangs are engaged in a systematic, organized effort to spread their influence." The Post continues, "Although the gangs have significant membership, the study found that their crimes are largely limited to petty theft and neighborhood extortion rather than some of those traditionally associated with organized crime -- drug trafficking, prostitution, human smuggling and arms sales. … The report, conducted by Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico and the nonprofit advocacy group Washington Office on Latin America, comes as U.S. and Central American authorities are coordinating intelligence in the belief that the gangs have a networked structure." The Post notes, "Recent testimony in Washington area courtrooms has pointed to occasional cooperation between local gang members and counterparts in other regions. A 19-year-old Hyattsville man pleaded guilty in federal court last week to collecting dues and sending wire transfers to members in Los Angeles as treasurer of a cell of Mara Salvatrucha. And in an earlier trial, a Salvadoran police officer testified that gang leaders in El Salvador instructed Maryland gang members on how their organization should be run. … But Connie McGuire, who conducted the Washington area component of the study, said her interviews with law enforcement, community groups and 15 former gang members found no sign of transnational coordination among gang members. … 'We shouldn't pretend that gangs aren't a big, scary problem,' Thale said. "But we shouldn't misunderstand what the problem is and misdirect resources for solving it.' … Researchers said the current misconceptions may stem from the transnational nature of the gangs' origins. The two most powerful Central American gangs, 18th Street, also know as Eighteen, and Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, emerged in Los Angeles in the 1980s when Salvadoran, Honduran and Guatemalan immigrants fleeing their region's various civil wars joined Chicano gangs or started gangs to protect themselves from African American gangs in the same neighborhoods."

Civil Rights Lawyer Says Police Crackdown Alone Won't Stop Gangs. In a Los Angeles Times (2/8, 850K) op-ed titled "A 'Surge' On Gangs Alone Won't Help," civil rights lawyer Constance L. Rice writes, "Cheryl Green died Dec. 15 because she was black in the wrong gang-dominated neighborhood," and "L.A. politicians and law enforcement leaders have reacted forcefully to her death." Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "vowed to put the gang out of business. Police Chief William Bratton, Sheriff Lee Baca and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III announced weapons of mass crackdown," and "two days after this display, 204th Street shot another innocent black resident waiting in his car for his daughters." Rice adds, "Let's be clear here: Strategic suppression is essential, a strong response to violent gangs such as 204th Street is necessary, and the effort will need more resources. But it is unclear whether the city has learned that suppression must be coordinated with comprehensive prevention and intervention strategies. And, right now, the prevention and intervention side of the equation is mostly missing. Law enforcement is doing its part; it's the rest of us who are AWOL."

New Jersey "Kingpin" Gets Life Sentence In Drug, Money Laundering Case. In Newark, the New York Times (2/8, Holl) reports a man who prosecutors "said controlled much of the city's heroin trade for years was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to life in prison without parole." Hakeem Curry "was convicted of drug charges and money laundering in July." The Times says Curry's organization "is believed to have supplied nearly 85 percent of the heroin dealt on the streets of Newark and roughly 50 kilograms of cocaine a week for the last several years."

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (2/8) reports Curry, the "notorious kingpin who ran an unparalleled drug empire in Newark for years and kept out of jail by marking those who threatened it with death, was sentenced to life in prison and fined $8 million by a federal judge yesterday. U.S. District Judge Faith Hochberg said she'd never seen a drug organization 'even remotely comparable' to the one Curry ran with 'incredible skill, acumen and intelligence,' but also 'extreme violence.'" The Star-Ledger says according to testimony, Curry "tried to hire a hit man to kill the prosecution's star witness against him. He also ordered the murder of a rival and the execution of another government witness who was supposed to testify in a case against an ally, the testimony showed."

On its Web site, WNBC-TV, New York (2/8) reports prosecutors say the Curry organization "was estimated to supply approximately 85 percent of the heroin in Newark while also supplying 30 to 50 kilograms of cocaine a week through its network of street level distributors. Cooperating witnesses testified that millions of dollars in drug profits were generated by the criminal organization."

Prosecutors Outline Case Against Accused DC Gang "Enforcer." The Washington Post (2/8, B5, Duggan) reports prosecutors say as an "enforcer for a violent drug-dealing crew in Northeast Washington, authorities allege, [Larry Gooch] pulled the trigger in four slayings and aided in a fifth. He sold crack, PCP and Ecstasy, according to an indictment, and tried to shoot a D.C. police officer to prevent a fellow gang member's arrest. … Many of the two dozen or so defendants indicted in the case have been convicted or have pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in exchange for reduced prison terms. The charges followed an 18-month investigation by D.C. police and the FBI." The Post notes that Gooch is on trial alone and "is the only defendant facing a possible death sentence."

Cuba To Deport Reputed Top Boss Of Norte Del Valle Cartel. The AP (2/8) reports Cuba "will deport reputed drug kingpin Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante to Colombia, which plans to extradite him to the United States, a government official told The Associated Press on Wednesday. The Colombian official said Gomez was expected to arrive in Bogota on Thursday and would be held at its heavily fortified chief prosecutor's office compound before being extradited to the United States. … Gomez, an alleged top boss of Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel known by his alias 'Rasguno,' is wanted on a U.S. indictment in New York on drug trafficking, racketeering and money-laundering charges. … The Norte del Valle cartel, the most powerful traditional drug organization in Colombia, is believed to account for as much as 60 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. However, many of its top bosses have been captured in recent years and a campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department has frozen many of their assets, including front companies." The AP story was used by the New York Times and Washington Post.

Bush Administration Urged To Rethink Afghanistan Counternarcotics Strategy. The AP (2/7) reported four House Republicans on Wednesday "urged the Bush administration to rethink its policy on opium production in Afghanistan, saying more needs to be done to counter the growing threat of narco-terrorism. The lawmakers, in a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates, said the U.S. must end its dispute with Britain over opium eradication and design a uniform counternarcotics policy with the British and NATO. … 'It is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for al-Qaida,' wrote Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the top Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and Reps. Mike Pence of Indiana and Elton Gallegly and Dana Rohrabacher, both from California." The AP says the four also "suggested a 'ride-along policy' where Drug Enforcement Administration agents could join U.S. and international military forces in unsecured areas where the DEA is targeting illicit drugs and drug kingpins." The AP story was used by ABC News, CBS News, the New York Times, and Washington Post.

Seattle Gun Dealer Questioned In AUSA Murder Indicted On More Charges. The Seattle Times (2/8, Carter, 118K) reports, "A federal grand jury has added another firearms-related felony charge against a Bellevue gun dealer once arrested as a material witness in the 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales. Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan was charged Wednesday with unlawful possession of a short-barreled rifle, which carries a potential prison term of up to 10 years. Kwan earlier had been charged with possession of a machine gun. Kwan has been scrutinized by the FBI and federal prosecutors because of evidence that he purchased two replacement gun barrels for a handgun like the one that was used to kill Wales. Kwan claims he recalls buying only one barrel, which he turned over to the federal agents. However, his attorney and court documents say he failed a FBI polygraph about the second barrel. Agents with a task force investigating Wales' slaying say they do not think Kwan killed Wales. They are trying to determine whether he gave the second gun barrel to the person who did."

IMMIGRATION:

Commission Criticizes Lack Of Change On US Asylum Procedures. The AP (2/7, Gamboa) reported a report released Thursday by the US Commission on International Religious Freedom says the Department of Homeland Security "is failing to protect asylum seekers from being wrongly deported or treated like criminals. … The commission said few of the changes it had recommended to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have been made. 'Despite the passage of two years and a personal meeting with Secretary Chertoff and our expectation he would establish a system that both protects our borders and asylum, we are disappointed and dismayed,' said Felice Gaer, the commission's chairwoman. Stewart Baker, assistant secretary for policy at DHS, said several of the recommendations have been carried out but many 'were not entirely realistic and very difficult to implement.'" He "said building separate facilities only for asylum seekers and flying them to a better facility would be expensive and might serve as incentive for people to claim asylum."

The New York Times (2/8, Swarns, 1.16M) reports the commission "warned" that "in its zeal to secure the nation's borders and stem the tide of illegal immigrants," the Bush administration "may be leaving asylum seekers vulnerable to deportation and harsh treatment." The Times adds that Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman "said he planned to introduce legislation by March to require the Department of Homeland Security to adopt several of the commission's main recommendations." The Times runs quotes from Baker similar to those in the AP article and adds that he "said the department looked forward to working with Mr. Lieberman and would review his measure after it had been introduced."

Online Hunters Seek Fugitive Nazis. USA Today (2/8, Dorell) reports, "Bill Gray was working as a student intern at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem when he decided to use the Internet to find fugitive Nazis. … Within a few hours he found five, all living in the USA. … 'To think of the horrible crimes that these people committed,' said Gray, 24, a Harvard student from Munster, Ind. 'And to think that they were living in the United States for so long, so happily.'" USA continues, The Nazis whom Gray found were already known to the Justice Department. Some had been deemed too ill to prosecute, and Justice is taking a second look at the others, the center said. … Gray's use of Internet-based search engines and databases such as voting records comes at an important time. The Wiesenthal Center is making an intense push, known as 'Operation: Last Chance,' to find fugitives of the Holocaust and bring them to justice before they die. The center, renowned for finding scores of ex-Nazis, is also seeking collaborators, camp guards and leaders of paramilitary groups who helped round up and kill Jews and others during the Holocaust." USA adds, "The effort has rolled across Europe and collected hundreds of allegations and names from Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Romania, Austria, Hungary and Germany. This year the program will expand to Argentina, Brazil and Chile. … The suspects are all older than 80, so any time saved by using the Internet is critical. … 'It helps make my job easier,' says the world's chief Nazi hunter, Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Center's Jerusalem office. 'It helps me get up-to-date whereabouts on the current suspects.'" USA notes, "That's what happened when Zuroff gave Gray, then a new volunteer, a list of people he had been searching for. Zuroff had compiled the list by cross-checking World War II-era U.S. refugee records with names of suspected war criminals. But Zuroff could find nothing on what happened to the people."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Conrad: Budget Talks Off Over Cheney's Stated Opposition To Any Tax Hikes. The New York Times (2/8, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "A leading Democratic senator said Wednesday that previously undisclosed behind-the-scenes bipartisan budget talks with the administration had collapsed because of comments by Vice President Dick Cheney and others in the administration." Sen. Kent Conrad, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, also "accused the administration of undercutting the possibility of talks by refusing to signal a willingness to compromise on taxes to save Social Security and Medicare or to balance the budget in the years ahead." Conrad "made his comments at a hearing with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, who defended the $2.9

trillion plan that the Bush administration submitted on Monday." At the "root" of the current flap is "a Democratic strategy of saying tax increases, or rescinding tax cuts, are essential to solving many fiscal problems, but demonstrating reluctance to be first to offer a specific proposal. More specifically, Democrats fear that if they propose, and pass, tax increases, they will be vetoed and Republicans will club them over taxes for the next two years." Democrats "say tax increases might come out of bipartisan talks like those under Presidents Bill Clinton and the first George Bush." Conrad, in a telephone interview, "said that "back-channel communications" with Mr. Portman and Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. had made headway but that Mr. Cheney undercut progress by saying last month that the administration still opposed tax increases."

Meanwhile, Roll Call (2/8, Pierce) reports House Budget Chairman John Spratt "is quietly and methodically laying the groundwork to build support across the Democratic Caucus for a 2008 budget resolution that he hasn't even written yet." Spratt "said he already has engaged Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) in his plan to convince the diverse Caucus to help him pass a five-year balanced budget plan this spring." Spratt "acknowledged that Democrats, and himself in particular, are going to have a tough time balancing the budget with relatively limited funds."

Commenting on the upcoming debate, the Financial Times (2/8, Callan) notes Democrats "said the president's budget was filled with 'debt and deception' and 'disconnected from reality," but they "will almost undoubtedly mimic these alleged sleights of hand to conceal cracks in the US fiscal outlook when they present their own budget proposals next month. Party strategists said their proposals were still taking shape and would not be agreed until key committee chairmen met to work out the details by March 15. The plans would again be overhauled after that to produce a budget for next year in time for the real work of appropriating spending that gets under way in June." But "the budget priorities emerging at this early stage in the process suggest the party will postpone tackling many of the most divisive fiscal dilemmas facing policymakers – including changes to costly entitlement programmes and the president's $1,700bn (£867bn) tax cuts."

Budget Would Raise Agencies' IT Funding By 2.6 Percent. Under the headline, "Budget Keeps Tabs on Computer Security Risks," the Washington Post's (2/8, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column examines the work of Karen Evans, administrator of e-government and information technology for OMB who, when "the president releases a new budget," finds "herself in demand. She draws a crowd because, as the government's high-tech policy chief, she oversees big money for computer systems and other information technology investments. The fiscal 2008 budget proposes spending $65.5 billion on technology -- a handsome chunk of change by almost any standard." The Post adds, "Overall, fiscal 2008 spending on information technology in the government is increasing 2.6 percent from what Bush sought in fiscal 2007." The Post adds, "Under the president's budget," Evans said, "the government would spend about $46 billion this year on maintaining technology systems that support agency missions, and about $20 billion on projects to modernize or develop computer systems."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush Budget Plan. Under the headline "Mr. Bush's Improbable Budget," the New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) editorializes, "The budget is based on a series of improbable, if not dishonest, assumptions. To make it appear as if the tax cuts are affordable in the near term, it assumes that the Pentagon will not spend a single penny on Iraq or Afghanistan after 2009. It also assumes there will be no costs for fixing the alternative minimum tax after this year, even though Mr. Bush and virtually every politician in America is committed to such relief." The plan "has Bush's new budget has a few worthwhile nuggets, like a proposed increase in Pell grants for low-income college students and a jump in the funds for AIDS treatment worldwide. In drafting a real budget, Congress can take those items from the president's version, and jettison the rest."

Bush Budget Strategy Seen As Similar To Approach To Iraq. In the Wall Street Journal (2/8, 2.04M), David Wessel writes, "William Gale of the Brookings Institution think tank -- populated by deficit-fearing Democratic wonks who have been trying to find common ground with deficit-fearing Republican wonks -- has been thinking a lot lately about the parallels between Mr. Bush on Iraq and Mr. Bush on the budget." He argues, "The Bush administration's two signature policies have been the war in Iraq and consistent pressure for tax cuts. … On the surface, they look quite different and were advocated by different parts of the administration. Look a little deeper and some common patterns emerge -- so maybe this says something about the principles or management style of the Bush administration." Bush, says Gale, "took the US into Iraq with 'falsely rosy scenarios' about the post-Saddam landscape there, he says. Mr. Bush built his tax cuts in 2001 on a similarly unrealistic hope that the budget surplus was large enough to cut taxes without creating deficits."

GOP Fiscal Conservatives Ask Bush To Block CR Earmarks. Roll Call (2/8, Stanton) reports Senate Republican budget hawks "are urging President Bush to use an executive order or presidential signing statement to block some of their fellow lawmakers from adding earmarks or pet projects to the fiscal 2007 continuing resolution." The Senators' "call for help from the Bush administration comes as Senators, House Members and K Street lobbyists have begun pushing agencies to ensure funding for earmarks included in appropriations bills passed by the two chambers last year but never sent to the president." In a Feb. 7 letter to Bush, "the group of fiscal conservatives led by GOP Sens. Jim DeMint (S.C.) and Tom Coburn (Okla.) urged Bush to make good on his State of the Union pledge to oppose earmarks."

House Democrats Readying Tax Breaks To Accompany Minimum Wage Measure. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A3, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "House Democrats are preparing a $1 billion package of small-business tax breaks to be paired with an increase in the federal minimum wage, hoping to break a stalemate with the Senate over one of their top legislative priorities. In doing so, the House is likely to avoid many of the revenue increases passed by the Senate in its small-business tax package, increases that have caused heartburn for business groups and lawmakers in both parties." The House package "is far smaller than the $8 billion, 10-year package of tax breaks the Senate approved last week as part of its minimum-wage-increase package. Still, it represents a nod by the House to the Senate's insistence that tax breaks are needed to get Republican support sufficient to enact a phased-in, $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage."

McConnell Says Democrats Reversed Course On Medicare Drug Benefit. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/8, A14), Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell writes, "The Medicare drug benefit that Congress passed in 2003 and which took effect last January has exceeded every expectation. Not only is the program more popular than we imagined, it is also more flexible and less expensive." Four "out of five enrolled say they are satisfied, and why wouldn't they be? Monthly premiums, expected to cost $37, average $22. Part D is honored at 55,000 neighborhood pharmacies nationwide. Those who prefer home delivery can arrange for that, too. And critically, it covers nearly every drug approved by the FDA." But "some in Congress want to make over Part D to resemble the drug benefit program of the Veterans Administration, where the government sets a price on drugs that it can get at the cheapest rate and limits access to those it can't. As a result, the VA benefit excludes three out of four drugs available through Part D, including some of the most innovative treatments for arthritis, high cholesterol, breast cancer and other ailments." Both parties "used to oppose rationing." The "sudden reversal" by Democrats "is a mystery. Are Democrats unaware of their history on the issue? Are they unaware of the facts?"

SMU Faculty Rejects Faculty Referendum Over Bush Library. The New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) reports, "The Faculty Senate at Southern Methodist University in Dallas rejected a proposal yesterday for a faculty referendum on plans for an independent policy institute on campus that would accompany President Bush's future library and museum." The university notes "more than 170 faculty members, about a quarter of the full-time professors on campus, signed a petition calling for a referendum because the proposed institute would be controlled by the Bush Foundation, not the university. … Other faculty members and many students have expressed support for the institute and library."

Pelosi Draws Fire For Seeking Use Of Large Military Aircraft. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's effort to arrange for a secure military airplane, first noted skeptically in the conservative Washington Times, has begun to attract critical attention even from mainstream media outlets.

The CBS Evening News reported the story "has Washington buzzing tonight. At a time when they're cracking down on congressional perks, the new Speaker of the House is apparently asking for a big travel upgrade." CBS (Attkisson) added, "Ever since 9/11, a small military jet like this has been made available to transport the speaker of the House for security reasons. The speaker is second in the line of succession to the presidency. Back then, it was Republican Dennis Hastert. Now it's Democrat Nancy Pelosi, but she may be getting a little more leg room. Speaker Pelosi is reportedly asking for a much bigger jet, a government version of the Boeing 757 that can make the trip between Washington and her San Francisco home without stopping to refuel. The Speaker's critics have dubbed it 'Pelosi One.' Military officials are said to be grumbling about it and the Speaker finds herself on the defensive. Today she insisted size doesn't really matter." Speaker Pelosi: "It's not a question of size, it's a question of distance. We want an aircraft that can reach California." Attkisson: "But an aircraft like that can comfortably seat 50 and Republican leader Roy Blunt is among those questioning how all those extra seats might get filled." Rep. Blunt: "If you can say to your supporters, 'Do you want to fly with me from San Francisco this week, spend a week in New York and then fly with me back in,' that's an incredible perk, an incredible fund-raising tool." Attkisson: "Pelosi's office told us she'll follow all the appropriate guidelines. The problem is there aren't any yet. Because of the flak, the Department is said to be quickly writing rules for the speaker's plane, everything from size to who can go along for the ride."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Fiore, Barnes, 850K) reports Pelosi's "people say she just wants to get home to California now and then and would like to do it in a plane that can make it all the way without stopping to refuel." But Pelosi's "conservative critics say the San Francisco Democrat is abusing the perks of power by attempting to commandeer a fancy jumbo-size military jet with a 'distinguished visitor compartment with sleep accommodations.'" The "flap over how the House speaker gets around has been circling over Washington since last week, but was largely ignored until Wednesday when, as things tend to do on a slow news day in the nation's capital, it exploded." Pelosi supporters "charge that the controversy is being fueled by GOP opponents who are still burning over an election loss that stemmed from Pelosi's charges of a 'culture of corruption' in Congress."

McClatchy (2/8, Talev) reports, "Republicans charge that she's trying to abuse the privileges of office. Pelosi, a California Democrat, denies doing anything wrong and says such slurs could be coming only from the White House." Still, "it's a potential image problem for the first female speaker - already caricatured for her wealth, love of designer clothes and chocolate obsession - to be portrayed as thinking she deserves her own Air Force Three." Republican "complaints about Pelosi's jet draw on recent articles in The Washington Times, a conservative newspaper in the nation's capital, that cited unnamed sources."

Defense Department Sets Limits On Pelosi Plane Use. The Washington Times (2/8, Hurt, Scarborough, 88K) reports the Department of Defense "sent a letter to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that puts limits on the size of the plane she may use to travel across the country and restricts the guests she can bring, The Washington Times has learned." A congressional source "who read the letter signed by Assistant Secretary of Defense Robert Wilkie said it essentially limits her to the commuter plane used by former Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, which requires refueling to travel from Washington to Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district. A second source, in the Bush administration, confirmed the contents of the letter." The letter "leaves open the possibility that Mrs. Pelosi may get a larger plane that does not require refueling if one happens to be available in the 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force Base. But, generally, the larger military passenger jets are in high demand, especially due to the Iraq war."

Indicted New Jersey Attorney Was Guest At White House Holiday Party. Bloomberg (2/8, Voreacos, Glovin) reports, "President George W. Bush invited an indicted New Jersey lawyer to a White House holiday party less than two months after the attorney was charged with immigration fraud, court records show." Bloomberg continues, "Jonathan Saint-Preux was indicted on Oct. 5 with his wife, Michele, and another man on federal charges that they submitted fraudulent documents to help hundreds of undocumented immigrants stay in the U.S. Saint-Preux, who pleaded innocent, attended the White House party on Nov. 30, said his attorney, Patrick Toscano. … U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden in Newark, New Jersey, signed an order granting permission for Saint-Preux 'to travel to Washington DC to attend a function at the White House at the request of President and Mrs. Bush.' A Justice Department prosecutor consented to the trip, court records show. … 'He was at a Christmas party,' Michele Saint-Preux said in an interview yesterday at her husband's office in Irvington, New Jersey, where she is the manager. 'He's been doing political work with the White House for years.' … Michele Saint-Preux said her husband also did political work to support former President Bill Clinton." Bloomberg adds, "White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore didn't have details on why Saint-Preux was invited to the party. 'Thousands of people attend the White House holiday parties,' she said. … 'I doubt very highly that if the president was aware that Mr. Saint-Preux was having legal problems here in New Jersey, he would have been invited,' Toscano said in an interview yesterday. … Toscano and Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Lurie signed a consent order that allowed Saint-Preux to take the trip. Hayden approved that order on Dec. 1. Saint-Preux is free on $250,000 bail and is not supposed to leave New Jersey without a judge's authorization. It wasn't clear why Hayden signed the order on Dec. 1, the day after the party. … 'This is the sort of request that we get routinely from defense lawyers wanting to relax the bail restrictions because of business, family, or social reasons,' said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie in Newark. … According to the indictment, Saint-Preux, his wife, and a man who recruited clients for him, Naranjan Patel, lied on immigration documents. They claimed the immigrants had lived continuously in the U.S. from before 1982 until at least May 1987, prosecutors said. Prosecutors claim the ruse was intended to help immigrants qualify for legal residency under a U.S. amnesty program."

Miller Denies Corruption Allegations At Closed-Door GOP Caucus Meeting. The Hill (2/8, Crabtree) reports California Rep. Gary Miller (R) "passionately pleaded his innocence before GOP colleagues at a closed-door conference meeting Tuesday, nearly a week after several media outlets reported that the FBI is looking into his land deals. Miller told colleagues that the press and Democrats had launched a smear campaign against him, singling out The Hill and the Los Angeles Times as perpetrators, as well as a former Democratic mayor of the Southern California city of Monrovia, Lara Larramendi Blakely, who now works for Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), according to GOP sources." The Hill notes Minority Leader John Boehner "tried to reassure members at the conference meeting Tuesday with regard to the FBI review of Miller's land deals, as well as an ongoing FBI probe of Rep. Jerry Lewis's (R-Calif.) relationship to a lobbying firm and its contracts. … Boehner told the conference that he believed that the legal precept of innocent until proven guilty should prevail."

House Panel To Probe SBA. The New York Times (2/8, Nixon, 1.16M) reports, "A House committee is holding the first of several hearings today to discuss the Small Business Administration, an agency that has come under criticism for its disaster relief program in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, as well as its operating, lending and contracting practices." Rep. Nydia M. Velásquez, chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, "said that the hearings would look into other issues, including recent disclosures that federal investigators have accused a lender in an S.B.A. program of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years." The administrator, Steven C. Preston, "is scheduled to appear at today's hearing, which will also address budget and staffing issues. An internal memo prepared by the agency's chief financial officer in January said that the S.B.A. had dropped below its minimal staffing levels because of budget shortfalls."

Frank Legislation Would Increase Control Over Foreign-Led Transactions In US. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Hitt, 2.04M) reports, "Senior House members signaled intention to push forward with legislation tightening US scrutiny of foreign-led transactions, despite Bush administration concerns over a potential chilling effect on the nation's investment climate." In testimony before the House Financial Services Committee, Clay Lowery, the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for international affairs, "said the efforts on Capitol Hill are being closely watched abroad, especially in the wake of last year's tumult over a Dubai company's bid to take control of several American port operations." House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank "said he intends to move legislation, which has wide, bipartisan support, through his committee next week, and to the House floor soon after. He suggested action could calm concern in the business community over the issue and bring certainty to the marketplace by clarifying how deals would be reviewed."

Norwood To Receive Hospice Care For Lung, Liver Cancer. USA Today (2/8, 10A, 2.27M) reports Republican Rep. Charles Norwood "is going home to Augusta for hospice care, forgoing further treatment for lung cancer that has spread to his liver, spokesman John Stone said." Stone said Norwood is not resigning, adding, "He said, 'Let me go back home, stop all the treatments and just see how I can do there.'"

Roll Call (2/8, Whittington) reports Rep. Norwood, "who has been hospitalized as he battles complications from a debilitating lung disease and lung cancer, has decided to forgo further medical treatment in Washington, D.C., and will return to his Augusta home for hospice care." Norwood had "been receiving chemotherapy treatments since last fall that have caused him to become extremely ill." While those "close to Norwood continue to dismiss any talk that he might resign, the Congressman's ailing health has led to subtle, and not so subtle, speculation back in his Northeastern Georgia district about who is interested in succeeding Norwood should he not seek another term in 2008." Republican state Reps. Barry Fleming and Ben Harbin and former state Sen. Brian Kemp (R) "are mentioned as possible candidates to succeed Norwood."

Congress' Work Week Extended, But Not Strenuous. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (2/8, A2), Dana Milbank says, "Is there no rest for the weary lawmaker? 'Members Resist Five-Day Workweek,' one of the Capitol Hill newspapers proclaimed on its front page yesterday. Senators were 'ready to revolt' and House members were 'simmering' over their legislative demands." The new Congress "has a problem. The just-empowered Democrats have declared that lawmakers will work five-day weeks like most other Americans. But, at this early date, there isn't much legislation ready for passage -- so what little there is has to be stretched out to fill the week." The House, "which will hold its Iraq war debate next week, will extend that discussion by giving five minutes of floor time to all 435 members. And in the Senate, the pace is so lethargic that Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) told colleagues late Tuesday that he would give them an extra week of vacation if they would take up the legislation he wants."

Bushes Attend Farewell Reception For White House Chief Of Protocol. The Washington Post (2/8, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "George and Laura Bush walked (walked!) across the street to Blair House last night and actually mingled with more than 100 guests at the farewell reception for Chief of Protocol Donald Ensenat and his wife, Taylor."

Productivity Growth Up In 4th Quarter, But May Be Slowing Overall. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A7, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "US productivity growth rebounded in the fourth quarter of 2006 but still appears to be slowing overall, clouding the outlook for economic growth, inflation and corporate profits in the months ahead. Nonfarm labor productivity -- a measure of the average worker's output per hour -- rose at an annual rate of 3% in the fourth quarter, bouncing back from an unusual decline of 0.1% in the previous quarter, the Labor Department reported." Growth in labor costs "per each unit of output, meanwhile, slowed to an annual rate of 1.7% in the quarter from the third quarter's 3.2%. … So far, slowing productivity growth and rising labor costs haven't crimped corporate profits, but that seems likely to change."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 6, :10 Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today the blue chips managed to skip out a tiny gain. The Dow finishing the day up about half a point [to close at 12,666.87]. Nadsaq gained 19 points [to close at 2,490.50] on today's trading." USA Today (2/8, 5B, 2.27M) and Wall Street Journal (2/8, C1, Browning, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers.

Emerging Markets Expected To Challenge US Dominance. USA Today (2/8, 1B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that "emerging markets, once known dismissively as the Third World, are now central to Americans' lives. Not long ago, these countries were of interest only to the Peace Corps. Now, everything from the financial lifeline that makes possible the modern American lifestyle to the identity of your next boss, customer, competitor or cultural trendsetter likely can be found in the developing world." USA Today adds, "The new prominence of emerging markets represents a sharp departure from the flurry of financial crises that tore through Mexico, Asia and Russia in the 1990s. … China alone sits atop a $1 trillion mountain of cash. Russia, Mexico, India and South Korea also are swiftly building their cash hoards, according to Treasury Department data." Developing nations "have gone from beggar to banker. The US must borrow enormous sums each day to finance the gap between its anemic national savings rate and its consumption. Increasingly, those funds -- largely raised by selling Treasury securities -- come from poorer nations."

Wal-Mart, Unions Press For Affordable Healthcare. A coalition including Wal-Mart, the Service Employees International Union, AT&T, Intel, Kelly Services Inc., and the Communications Workers of America called for affordable health insurance Wednesday. Reports in major papers, including the New York Times (2/8, Barbaro, Pear, 1.16M), USA Today (2/8, 2B, Appleby, 2.27M), the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Maher, 2.04M), and the Washington Post (2/8, D1, Mui, Russakoff, 690K), emphasize that the groups traditionally oppose each other on major issues. For example, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Maher, 2.04M) reports, "Yesterday's announcement in Washington united Wal-Mart Chief Executive H. Lee Scott and Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, who has criticized the Bentonville, Ark., retailer's pay and benefit policies. The inclusion of Wal-Mart, the nation's largest private employer and an industry bellwether, in any push to overhaul health care is significant." The New York Times (2/8, Barbaro, Pear, 1.16M) reports that the "extraordinary" meeting "could be the beginning, however tentative, of a détente between the nation's largest employer and its labor critics," but says "[t]he agreement is unlikely to end the rancor between Wal-Mart and unions, largely because the retailer's fiercest critic is the United Food and Commercial Workers, the union behind WakeUpWalMart.com."

USA Today (2/8, 2B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "The groups did not offer details of how to change the system, laying out instead four broad principles: Every person must have insurance; businesses, government and individuals must help pay for it; people have a responsibility to maintain their health; and the health system must become more efficient."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Maher, 2.04M) adds, "While there is interest in doing something about the uninsured, consensus is lacking on what should be done, how much money to spend and how many Americans to try to cover. The new partnership offers no solution, only general goals, such as that individuals, business and government 'all should contribute to managing and financing a new American health- care system.' Wal-Mart remained noncommittal yesterday as to who should take the lead."

Criticism Of Wal-Mart Noted. The Washington Post (2/8, D1, Mui, Russakoff, 690K) reports, "Wal-Mart used to be noticeable for its absence from business coalitions calling for government help with the health-care crisis. As the rising cost of employee medical care staggered other large companies, Wal-Mart, which did not provide health coverage for the majority of its employees, was silent. But during a national crisis over the growing ranks of uninsured workers, Wal-Mart quickly became a target. … Change began in 2005 after Wal-Mart created a health-care plan with premiums of $11 per month. In a speech to the National Governors Association a year ago, Scott announced other major concessions, including reducing the eligibility requirement for part-time employees from two years to one and adding coverage for their children. But he also wanted help from government leaders and other groups to make substantive changes to the country's health policies. The speech caught Stern's attention. He was also impressed by Wal-Mart's efforts in environmental sustainability, in which it had worked with activist groups such as the Rocky Mountain Institute and TransFair USA."

The AP (2/8, Caterinicchia) reports, "Stern said the SEIU would continue to fund its Wal-Mart Watch campaign, which as recently as last month said Wal-Mart's health plans were a raw deal for employees. Stern said he expects to be criticized for teaming up with Wal-Mart, but that he felt it was in the best interest of workers who lack coverage, and their families."

In GOP Race For President, McCain Drops, While Giuliani Climbs. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Feldmann, 59K) reports that while polls have long shown Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) and ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) as the frontrunners in the '08 GOP race for president, "pundits have tended to discount Mr. Giuliani's chances, given his liberal stands on social issues such as abortion and gay rights. Now, a combination of factors is forcing a new look at both Senator McCain's vulnerabilities, particularly over his steadfast support for an unpopular Iraq war, and Giuliani's potential to overcome weaknesses. For the first time since October 1999, McCain's favorability rating among American voters has dropped below 50 percent. A Gallup poll taken last month showed him at 48 percent, down 6 points from November." Giuliani, meanwhile, "has held above 60 percent favorability in Gallup polls, most recently at 62 percent." The Monitor notes, "For Giuliani, winning over enough of the conservative Republican base to secure the nomination has long been seen as a potentially insurmountable task. But now, analysts say, it's possible that Republican-leaning independents could make the difference in the early GOP primaries." New Hampshire-based pollster Dick Bennett of ARG said that McCain's problem "is that he has lost some of his luster as the 'maverick.' … That is hurting him in particular among independents, says Mr. Bennett. The problem is Iraq. 'They view McCain and Bush in the Iraq situation together,' he says."

Mormon Romney Confident His Religion Won't Undermine Presidential Hopes. The New York Times (2/8, Nagourney, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports that ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), a presidential hopeful, "is facing a threshold issue: Will his" Mormon religion "be a big obstacle to winning the White House? Polls show a substantial number of Americans will not vote for a Mormon for president. The religion is viewed with suspicion by Christian conservatives." While "Romney's advisers acknowledged that popular misconceptions about Mormonism…could give his opponents ammunition in the" GOP battle "to become the consensus candidate of social conservatives," Romney, in an interview "last week, expressed confidence that he could quell concerns about his faith, pointing to his own experience winning in Massachusetts. … 'People have interest early on in your religion and any similar element of your background,' he said. 'But as soon as they begin to watch you on TV and see the debates and hear you talking about issues, they are overwhelmingly concerned with your vision of the future and the leadership skills that you can bring to bear.'" That said, Romney "has set up a meeting this month in Florida with 100 ministers and religious broadcasters. That gathering follows what was by all accounts a successful meeting at his home last fall with evangelical leaders, including the Rev. Jerry Falwell" and "the Rev. Franklin Graham." Romney also "said he was giving strong consideration to a public address about his faith and political views, modeled after the one John F. Kennedy gave in 1960 in the face of a wave of concern about his being a Roman Catholic."

With Criticism Of Campaign-Finance Reform, Romney Reverses Field. The Hill (2/8, Bolton) reports that Romney, "who strongly criticized campaign-finance regulations in a private meeting with House conservatives last week, once touted dramatic restructuring measures such as taxing political contributions and placing spending limits on federal campaigns. Romney's past positions on campaign-finance regulation, anathema to many social conservatives who believe such rules place unconstitutional limits on free speech, could complicate his ongoing efforts to court conservative leaders." The Hill relates, "At a private meeting with conservative House Republicans in Baltimore Friday, Romney "specifically criticized the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act sponsored by his rival for the GOP presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). 'Referring to the bill, [Romney] called it 'one of the worst things in my lifetime,'' one conservative Republican said. 'The place erupted. That was by far the biggest applause line.'" The Hill notes, however, "A review of Romney's public statements from his 1994 senatorial and 2002 gubernatorial campaigns reveal that he once touted stringent campaign-finance modifications." For example, "a Boston Globe article from July 1994 reported that Romney publicly advocated placing spending limits on congressional campaigns and abolishing political action committees (PACs)," and "the Quincy Patriot Ledger and the Worcester Telegram & Gazette reported in the fall of 2002 that Romney proposed taxing political contributions to finance publicly funded campaigns."

Obama Wants To Preserve Public Financing Option. The AP (2/8, Pickler) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama is "asking whether he can take money from donors who want him to be president, then give it back later. The Federal Election Commission said Wednesday that it will look into the novel question." Obama is "indicating that he wants to at least keep the option of using the public financing system for his presidential campaign if he becomes the Democratic nominee. To do so, the Illinois senator could not spend any money from contributors for political purposes, but instead use federal funding that is expected to total about $85 million for next year's general election." Obama has "decided to raise unlimited private contributions for the primary and general campaigns, following the lead of chief Democratic rivals Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards." But Obama's lawyer, Robert Bauer, "suggested in an advisory opinion request to the FEC that Obama may want to participate in the public financing system for the general election if he's nominated and the Republican candidate agreed to do the same."

The New York Times (2/8, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports if Obama "won the Democratic nomination, he could then strike a deal with the Republican nominee to return their private donations and use only public money for the general election. For 2008, that would limit each general election campaign to about $85 million." It is "unclear how plausible such a truce might be. A candidate with a much bigger bank account at the start of the general election would be reluctant to relinquish that advantage." Obama's filing "raises delicate questions for some of his rivals. Three of them — Mrs. Clinton and John Edwards among the Democrats, and Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona — have begun raising private contributions outside the public financing system. All three have said they value the public financing system and support updating it to keep it alive."

The Washington Post (2/8, A9, Cillizza, Mosk, 690K) reports Dan Pfeiffer, "a spokesman for Obama, said the senator's filing is intended to 'preserve the public financing option for the party's nominees.' Other aides explained that the request is aimed at defining what Obama can and cannot do in a murky area of campaign finance law." Until now, candidates "have accepted that once they start to raise a separate pool of money for the general election, they have committed to running without federal matching funds. Obama's filing questions that assumption."

McConnell Urges Scrapping Public Finance System. In a USA Today op-ed (2/8, 14A), Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell says, "The recent decision by a number of presidential aspirants not to dip into the public trough for campaign funds is a clear sign of just how expensive national elections have become. It's also a sign that the current system of public funding for private campaigns is on its way out. This is as it should be." Congress should follow the candidates' "lead — and that of nearly every American taxpayer— and do away with the current public financing system once and for all."

USA Today Praises Public Finance For Campaigns. USA Today (2/8, 14A, 2.27M) says in an editorial, "Seven states (Arizona, Connecticut, Maine, North Carolina, New Jersey, New Mexico and Vermont)and two cities (Albuquerque and Portland, Ore.) are using or preparing to use public funding for some or all races. Politicians who accept public funds must agree not to raise more money and to abide by strict spending limits. Opponents of this practice — incumbents, lobbyists, others seeking power — make hay deriding this as 'welfare for politicians.' Hardly. Candidates can spend more time with voters, and those who win office don't have to check with moneyed interests before taking action."

Seton Hall Law Professor To Serve As Policy Director For Obama Campaign. The Hill (2/8, Youngman) profiles Seton Hall law professor Mark Alexander, who "is signing on to Obama's 2008 presidential campaign as policy director." Alexander, a "Yale graduate and friend of Obama's for 10 to 12 years," said "he takes issue with those who might question Obama's depth of policy knowledge. 'I don't think he's short on substance at all,' Alexander said." Alexander "worked as issues director for then-Sen. Bill Bradley's (D-N.J.) 2000 presidential campaign," and "for Sen. Edward Kennedy's (D-Mass.) 1988 reelection campaign, and most recently served as general counsel to new Newark Mayor Cory Booker's campaign. His primary areas of study lie in First Amendment free-speech issues, election law and campaign finance reform." The Hill notes, "With a crowded field that includes" New York Sen. Hillary Clinton(D) and ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D), "as well as hefty-résumé-wielding candidates such as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Obama needs to avoid any early policy missteps lest his critics and opponents successfully paint him as too inexperienced for the job, according to political analyst Charlie Cook. 'When you've got a presidential candidate who has to dispel notions of inexperience…having a strong policy director that avoids mistakes and avoids painting the candidate into a corner is incredibly important,' Cook said. 'Obama can't afford any serious policy mistakes.'"

WPost Calls On Hillary Clinton To Identify "Bundlers." The Washington Post (2/8, A20, 690K) says in an editorial, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had a party at her house the other night for an elite group: about 70 fundraisers who agreed to raise at least $250,000 -- and some as much as $1 million -- for her presidential campaign. That soiree and a meeting for lower-level fundraisers ($25,000 and up) prompts us to raise again the question that we couldn't get the Clinton campaign to answer the other day. What are the candidate's plans to release the names of her big bundlers? Will she meet the standard of disclosure set by President Bush and every 2004 Democratic presidential contender except John Edwards and make the fundraisers' identities available? So far -- though we've been putting this question to the Clinton campaign since last Friday by telephone and by e-mail -- we haven't gotten an answer."

LATimes Urges Pelosi To Back Bundling Disclosure. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, 850K) says in an editorial, "Unlike their other activities, bundling by lobbyists is not a matter of public record." It "would be public under the Senate ethics bill and a similar House proposal by Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Martin Meehan (D-Mass.)." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has promised that the 110th Congress would be 'the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history.' She can make good on that pledge by steeling her colleagues to resist the importuning of lobbyists — and their own worse instincts — and join the Senate in shining light on bundling."

Democratic Leaders Support Edwards' Plan To Boost Taxes. The Washington Times (2/8, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic state chairmen yesterday said they support former Sen. John Edwards' plan to increase taxes on upper-income Americans if he wins the presidency in 2008, a plan backed by the party's House and Senate leaders. Those who responded to a survey of Democratic chairmen across the country said they approved of the plan presented Sunday by" Edwards "on NBC's 'Meet the Press' to raise the top tax rates on salaries of more than $200,000 and possibly other tax levies as well. But many state party leaders don't want to step into the politically charged issue of raising taxes, at least at this early juncture in the presidential-election cycle -- even if their party's congressional leadership has embraced the idea." For example, Louisiana Democratic Chairman Chris Wittington said, "Raising taxes is a really tough decision, but I think Edwards is just being realistic, considering the Iraq war costs and the war debt we've got. … If he's starting at $200,000, there aren't many of those people at that level in Louisiana who would be affected by it." However, Wittington "cautioned that just talking generally about raising taxes was politically risky. 'He's got to define his message to make sure he's clear about who will be affected,'" he said.

Anti-Poverty Message Seen As Contrasting With Edwards' Lavish Home. The AP (2/8, Baker) reports, "Two homes, two images, one candidate. Democrat John Edwards, who has made an anti-poverty message the theme of his 2008 presidential campaign, is taking heat for the lavish home he has constructed in Orange County, N.C. In December, Edwards chose the modest backyard of a New Orleans woman who had lost her home to Hurricane Katrina as the image that best underscored his campaign theme. Now voters are seeing another, sharply contrasting image of Edwards: his own home. Sitting on 102 secluded acres -- surrounded by trees and defended by no-trespassing signs -- the 28,000-square-foot estate that Edwards and his family call home has presidential privacy." The AP notes, "With a current building value of $4.3 million, the unfinished Edwards estate is already about $1 million more expensive than any other house in the county, according to tax records. It sits on land worth about $1.1 million." Edwards "has faced criticism regarding the estate. It also has become the subject of late-night jokes. 'Well, I think we know which America he's living in,' Jay Leno quipped on NBC's 'Tonight Show,' a riff of Edwards' frequent mention of the 'two Americas' -- one for the wealthy and one for the poor."

An Angry Matthews Says It's Time For A President Who Doesn't Own A Ranch. The Washington Times (2/8, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "MSNBC's Chris Matthews has 'lurched even further off the deep end,' said Rich Noyes of the Media Research Center who chronicled Mr. Matthews' appearance yesterday on 'Imus in the Morning.'" Matthews, "who appeared by phone, went on a rant declaring how he's 'sick of Southern guys with ranches running this country.' Losing control, Matthews dropped the F-bomb on national television: 'I want a guy to run for president who doesn't have a [expletive] I'm sorry, a ranch.' As host Don Imus began to snicker, Matthews plowed ahead with his Democratic talking points: 'Wouldn't that be good, Don, a guy who wasn't on the ranch during Katrina, he was on the street corner answering questions?'"

New York Police Gave RNC Protestors Additional Scrutiny. The New York Times (2/8, Dwyer, 1.16M) reports that when "more than a thousand people were swept up in mass arrests during the 2004 Republican National Convention, defense lawyers complained in court that the protesters had to wait much longer to see a judge than those accused of far more serious crimes like robbery or assault." Newly released "city records not only put precise numbers to those claims, but also show the special scrutiny the New York Police Department gave to people arrested in or near the convention protests." Donna Lieberman of the New York Civil Liberties Union said, "We found out that the Police Department had a special set of rules in place for the R.N.C., and they didn't necessarily comport with the law."

Theft By Campaign Treasurers Not Uncommon. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, A1, Cummings, 2.04M) reports Florida Republican Nancy Detert "had two days to register her candidacy for Congress last April when she got a disturbing email from her secretary: Ms. Detert's campaign treasurer was missing." Court records "show that Randolph Maddox, the treasurer, had transferred $94,000 from the Detert campaign's Wachovia Bank account in Venice, Fla., to a Bank of America account he controlled in another county. Then he withdrew the money in cash, stuffed it into two carry-on bags and flew to Buenos Aires." What "happened to Ms. Detert isn't uncommon in campaigns because candidates trust friends to handle their money and often don't look too carefully at their work. Thanks to the Detert case, the Federal Election Commission is poised to pass new guidelines to strengthen campaign fund-raising operations. But even those changes will amount to 'bake-sale level oversight,' says FEC Vice Chairman David Mason."

Railroad Industry Hiring Relatives Of Lawmakers, Staff. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Williamson, 690K) reports the railroad industry "is hiring relatives of Capitol Hill lawmakers and staff members as it faces tighter federal safety legislation, employing a tactic untouched by the Democrats' new ethics proposals: lobbying by congressional family members." The new Democratic Congress "is working on the first overhaul of railroad-safety laws in 13 years. Long attuned to Republican control, railroad companies are now working to keep their GOP allies but also hiring Democratic lobbyists." Days "after Jennifer Esposito became majority staff director of the House transportation panel's subcommittee on railroads, her father, Sante Esposito, and brother Michael Esposito signed up as railway lobbyists." Rep. Daniel Lipinski (D-Ill.) has "just taken a seat on the subcommittee, and in the coming weeks, the railroad industry trade association said, his father and predecessor in Congress, William O. Lipinski (D-Ill.), will register as a railroad lobbyist, too."

New Ethics Rules Seen As Burden To Charities. The Washington Post (2/8, A19, Romano, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Anxiety over the new House ethics rules ratcheted up this week as lawmakers' spouses demanded clarification of whether the rules apply to them, and eight House members backed out of a fundraising gala for a major theatrical company when ethics lawyers stated that they could not attend as guests." At a "packed ethics briefing for congressional spouses last weekend, a number of wives struggled to understand whether the complicated rules would prevent them from accepting free tickets to bona fide charity events -- particularly those in which they were involved or served as chairmen." Ethics lawyers "and Hill staffers tried to dispel the uncertainty by explaining that spouses must adhere to the same rules, unless they are invited to an event by virtue of their own stature or job." Hill employees, spouses and "charity organizers complained this week that the new rule on gifts is an exceptional burden to charities -- which are known as 501(c)3s under the federal tax law and are tax-exempt -- because they depend mightily on House members' celebrity to sell tickets and raise money."

Cuban Americans Planning For Life After Castro. The Washington Times (2/8, Gentile, 88K) reports several rumors of Fidel Castro's death "have swept through Miami since Mr. Castro fell ill in July, only to be dashed with the release of videos showing a frail but indisputably living Cuban leader, most recently receiving a visit from Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez." That has "not deterred Miami's Cuban-Americans from planning and preparing for the dictator's death. Some say they intend to return to the island, while others anticipate that thousands of Cuban refugees will stream into southern Florida." Others are "preparing more pragmatically for the post-Castro Cuba. Business and legal leaders say they have already started working on ways to address a tangle of property-rights issues dating from the start of the Cuban revolution, when the communists seized and redistributed private land."

Kennedy Allegedly Offered To Aid Soviet Public Relations In US. In a Washington Times op-ed (2/8), a retired CIA analyst writing under the pseudonym John Smith says, "In 1983, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy offered to help the Soviets mount a public-relations offensive in the United States. This propaganda attack would target President Reagan and his policies. These are the same policies that eventually ended the Cold War and reduced the possibility of nuclear annihilation. This charge was made by Paul Kengor in his book 'The Crusader: Ronald Reagan and the Fall of Communism.'" The "bottom line is that if there is any shred of truth in these documented stories, the senator from Massachusetts, as well as any other compromised politicians, should resign or be kicked out of the Senate or Congress."

Daley's Lease Of City Assets Examined. In his Washington Post column (2/8, A21), George Will says Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley has "become an accomplished practitioner of today's new wrinkle in public finance." Chicago "became the first city to sell a toll road. Actually, it has leased the road for 99 years, which is much the same as selling it. The 7.8-mile, six-lane Skyway goes from the Indiana Toll Road (which the state of Indiana last year leased for 75 years to a Spanish-Australian group for $3.85 billion) to Chicago's Dan Ryan Expressway." Skyway was "still a sufficiently attractive investment to have drawn $1.83 billion from the same consortium that leased the Indiana Toll Road." By "selling future revenue streams, Daley believes, the city can ignite a virtuous cycle: Buying improvements 'as quickly as possible' in education and infrastructure can lure people back to the city, thereby improving the city's tax base and cultural vibrancy, which enables further improvements that attract still more residents."

Rice Says Military Must Fill Civilian Jobs In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/8, A18, DeYoung, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told Congress yesterday "that more than 40 percent of nearly 300 State Department positions to be added in Iraq as part of President Bush's new strategy will have to be filled by military personnel." During testimony before the House Foreign Relations Committee yesterday morning, Rice said, "Frankly, the agencies of the US government cannot fill that many posts" as quickly as necessary, noting that "our agreement with the Department of Defense was that for a period of time...we would actually use reservists to fill those positions." In a Senate hearing Tuesday, Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said that he shares the concerns raised by senior military officers over a Rice memo detailing the request." State Department officials "expressed surprise" yesterday at Gates's remarks. However, Rice "insisted there is no controversy."

Under the headline "Few Veteran Diplomats Accept Mission To Iraq," the New York Times (2/8, A12, Cooper, 1.16M) reports, "While the diplomats and Foreign Service employees of the State Department have always been expected to staff 'hardship' postings, those jobs have not usually required that they wear flak jackets with their pinstriped suits." But now with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the White House "is calling for more American civilians to head not only to those countries, but also to some of their most hostile regions -- including Iraq's volatile Anbar Province -- to try to establish democratic institutions and help in reconstruction. That plan is provoking unease and apprehension at the State Department and at other federal agencies." While Secretary Rice said Wednesday that State Department employees were "volunteering in large numbers" for difficult posts, including Iraq, "several department employees said that those who had signed up tended to be younger, more entry-level types, and not experienced, seasoned diplomats." The reluctance "highlights a problem with the administration's new strategy for Iraq, which calls on American diplomats to take challenges on a scale unmatched anywhere else in the world, when the lack of security on the ground outside the Green Zone makes it one of the last places people, particularly those with families, want to go."

Rice Pressed For Evidence On Iran. AFP (2/8) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "faced a blistering challenge in Congress over the administration's failure to provide evidence to back up allegations Iran is building nuclear weapons and fueling attacks on US forces in Iraq." Rep. Ron Paul (R-TX) said, "Unproven charges against Iran's nuclear intentions are eerily reminiscent of the false charges made against Iraq before we invaded that country." He also warned that "unproven accusations of Iranian support for the Iraqi insurgency" were also serving as a pretext for "escalating our sharp rhetoric toward Iran." However, Rice rejected suggestions the Administration is "planning or intending an attack on Iran." Instead, she insisted the Administration is "responding to a number of Iranian policies both in Iran and around the world that are actually quite dangerous for our national security." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, meanwhile, said the Administration would reveal its evidence of Iranian involvement in Iraq "on our own timeline."

Rice Disputes Claim Of Iranian Overture. The AP (2/8, Gearan) reports Rice "disputed claims Wednesday that the Bush administration bungled a diplomatic overture from Iran that offered a broad dialogue" with the United States in 2003. Rice told Congress she "does not remember seeing the 2003 Iranian proposal, which suggested Iran was ready to discuss its disputed nuclear program, support for militant groups that the United States labels terrorists and the acceptance of Israel." During House testimony, Rice said, "We had people who said the Iranians went to talk to you… But I think I would have noticed if the Iranians had said, 'We're ready to recognize Israel.'"

The Washington Post (2/8, A18, Kessler, 690K) adds "former administration officials have said the proposal was discussed and ultimately rejected by top U.S. officials," including "Rice, who was then national security adviser." The Post says Rice's comments "add a new level of complexity to an issue that has generated debate among foreign policy experts: Did the Bush administration forgo a chance to pursue a dialogue with Iran shortly after the fall of Baghdad, when US power seemed at its height?"

US Reiterates Calls For Europe To Tighten Iran Sanctions. The Financial Times (2/8, Fidler) reports Washington on Wednesday "voiced its growing frustration over the failure of European governments to toughen financial sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program." Differences over the sanctions between Washington and European governments "threaten to open a new transatlantic division" over how to deal with Tehran's nuclear program. US Ambassador to the IAEA, Gregory Schulte, "went public with Washington's complaints, saying the Europeans should do more," saying during an address in Munich, "Faced by the defiance of Iran's leadership, the European Union and European countries can do more -- and should do more -- to bolster our common diplomacy. Why, for example, are European governments using export credits to subsidise exports to Iran? Why, for example, are European governments not taking more measures to discourage investment and financial transactions?" The ambassador said Europe should use "the full range of non- military measures at its disposal" to put pressure on Iran's leadership.

Iranians "Uneasy" With Ahmadinejad's Nuclear Diplomacy. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Murphy, 850K) reports, "Iran's leadership is facing mounting public unease and the seeds of mutiny in the parliament over the combative nature of its nuclear diplomacy." For the "first time," there is "broad, open criticism" of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiance of the Bush administration and United Nations Security Council. Warnings have "emerged that the public may not be prepared to support the Islamic regime through a war." The "mounting dissent, however, does not appear to have chipped away at Iran's determination to maintain an active nuclear program, according to politicians, diplomats and political analysts" in Tehran. But those observers say it "opens the door to a face-saving compromise and signals that a broad range of Iranians hope to avoid an all-out confrontation."

Webb Says Deployment Of Carrier Raises Tensions. In an interview with MSNBC's Hardball (2/7, Matthews), Sen. Jim Webb said, "When I was Secretary of the Navy and until very recently, we never operated aircraft carriers inside the Persian Gulf" in part because "the chance of accidentally bumping into something that would start a diplomatic situation was pretty high. We now have been doing that, and with the tensions as high as they are, I'm very worried that we might accidentally set something off in there and we need, as a Congress, to get ahead of the ball game here."

More Commentary On Iran. In a New York Times (2/8, 1.16M) op-ed, Iranian ambassador to the UN Javad Zarif writes, "The United States administration is -- unfortunately -- reaping the expected bitter fruits of its ill-conceived adventurism" in Iraq, "taking the region and the world with it to the brink of further hostility. … The United States administration is trying to sell an escalated version of the same failed policy. It does this by trying to make Iran its scapegoat and fabricating evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq. … Forging imaginary new threats, as the United States administration is now doing with Iran, may provide some temporary domestic cover for the failure of the administration's Iraq policy, but it can hardly resolve problems that -- as widely suggested -- require prudence, dialogue and a genuine search for solutions."

In a Washington Post (2/8, A21, 690K) op-ed, Vali Nasr of the Naval Postgraduate School and Ray Takeyh of the Council on Foreign Relations write, "As Iran crosses successive nuclear demarcations and mischievously intervenes in Iraq, the question of how to address the Islamic republic is once more preoccupying Washington." The US "would do better to shelve its containment strategy and embark on a policy of unconditional dialogue and sanctions relief. A reduced American threat would deprive the hard-liners of the conflict they need to justify their concentration of power. In the meantime, as Iran became assimilated into the global economy, the regime's influence would inevitably yield to the private sector, with its demands for accountability and reform."

In his Wall Street Journal (2/8, A15, 2.04M) column, James Taranto writes, "Confrontation with Iran is very unpopular among the Democratic antiwar base. Last week Ezra Klein of The American Prospect, a left-liberal magazine, confronted" John Edwards about a recent speech on Iran, "and the candidate waffled. Although allowing that 'it would be foolish for any American president to ever take any option off the table,' he offered this criticism of President Bush: 'When he uses this kind of language "options are on the table," he does it in a very threatening kind of way.' Does Mr. Edwards mean to be docile? … Perhaps voters next year, chastened by Mr. Bush's dangerous boldness, will opt for someone more risk-averse. But if a crisis arises and the president proves unable to lead, they may find themselves longing for Mr. Bush's steadfastness. An excess of caution is itself a form of recklessness."

Hamas, Fatah Vow To Continue Talks Until Agreement Reached. The New York Times (2/8, A6, Fattah, 1.16M) reports the leaders of Hamas and Fatah "ended their first day of an emergency summit meeting on Wednesday promising to stay until they agreed on a new government to end a wave of violence in Gaza and the West Bank and salvage the moribund Israeli-Palestinian peace effort." Disputes reportedly remain between the two groups "on how to divide the ministerial portfolios, especially the security portfolios, and how the new government could meet Western criteria of renouncing violence, recognizing Israel and accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements."

The Financial Times (2/8, Morris) says Ismail Haniyeh "might remain as prime minister in a new multi-party cabinet but, to be accepted by the international community, Hamas would have to bow to demands that it recognize Israel, commit itself to non-violence and accept existing agreements with Israel." The Times says an agreement at Mecca "would set the tone for a trilateral summit in Jerusalem next week" involving Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

WSJournal Says Palestinians Unable To Rule Themselves. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, 2.04M) writes that the recent violence among Palestinian factions negates "the notion that what is mainly needed for an Israeli-Palestinian settlement is a change in Israeli policies." Now as the two sides engage in talks in Saudi Arabia, "For King Abdullah, as for the Palestinians, the main challenge is not simply to midwife an agreement; it's the principles of their prospective statehood. If the experience of Gaza…demonstrates anything, it is that the absence of Israeli occupation is not a sufficient condition for a Palestinian state." The Journal suggests that the "first such condition would be a monopoly on the legitimate use of force," which "doesn't exist today in the Palestinian Authority." In addition, it says "the US must also insist that Mr. Abbas dismantle Hamas as a military entity, by force if necessary." The Journal concludes that "it is now clear that the deepest problems are of Palestinian making. That may not be much comfort to diplomats hungry for the next breakthrough. But no breakthrough will be worth the effort if the result is a state that cannot govern itself."

Rice Urges Release Of Egyptian Dissident. AFP (2/8) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "urged Egypt to release a prominent jailed dissident, shortly before she met with the country's foreign minister." Testifying in Congress, Rice said she had repeatedly raised the case of opposition leader Ayman Nour with Egyptian officials "in the past and would continue to do so." Rice met later Wednesday Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit for talks expected to focus on US and Egyptian efforts to break the stalemate in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Egypt Cracks Down On Muslim Brotherhood. The Financial Times (2/8, Saleh) reports the Egyptian government has "referred the cases of forty members of the illegal Muslim Brotherhood to a military tribunal in a move which signals another escalation of the government's crackdown against the group." The charges, which include money laundering and creating a militia, "arise from actions by Islamist students at Al Azhar university who in December staged a parade in which they wore black hoods and carried out martial arts exercises during a protest against the rigging of student union elections." In recent weeks, the Brotherhood has also "been the target of a new campaign of arrests in which some 260 people have been detained."

US, North Korea May Be Close To Reaching Nuclear Agreement. The AP (2/8, Herman) reports Pyongyang "expressed its readiness Thursday to discuss initial steps of its nuclear disarmament, raising hopes for the first tangible progress" at the six-party talks. On arriving in Beijing for the latest round of talks, North's nuclear envoy Kim Kye Gwan said, "We are prepared to discuss first-stage measures." Japanese media reports Thursday "suggested the North may agree to freeze its main nuclear reactor and allow international inspectors in exchange for energy aid as a starting step to disarm," but Kim said any moves by North Korea would be "based on whether the United States will give up its hostile policy and come out toward peaceful coexistence." Earlier Thursday, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said he sensed "there is a real desire to have progress" by the North Koreans at the talks.

Separately, the AP (2/8) notes the Japanese daily Asahi Shimbun reported Thursday that the US and North Korea "signed a memorandum during talks last month by which Pyongyang would begin closing a nuclear reactor while the US starts providing energy assistance." However, AFP (2/8) reports Assistant Secretary Hill denied the report, saying, "No, we did not sign anything. … Although it was a very useful discussion, we did not sign anything."

In a preview of Thursday's talks, the New York Times (2/8, A13, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "Recently, North Korea has seemed to signal more of a willingness to bargain and to specify its demands." For example, last weekend, "two American envoys returning from Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, said the nation was prepared to disable its main nuclear reactor in Yongbyon in exchange for an energy package of electricity and oil from its neighbors."

The Financial Times (2/8, Fifield) says, "When diplomats sit down" at the talks "they will do so amid a new sense of optimism." If in the past North Korea's nuclear ambition "has been one of the world's most intractable diplomatic challenges, this time the six-party talks appear to have a clear -- and perhaps achievable -- goal, diplomats say." Extensive "behind-the-scenes dealings, increasing pressure on the North Korean regime, and an embattled US administration seeking success in its dealings with one of the 'axes of evil' have helped breathe life into a process long considered terminal," the Times says.

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, A6, Ramstad, 2.04M) says "a deal appears more likely -- despite repeated failures in the past -- because the North's top negotiator has signaled it is willing to compromise and the US has settled on a more conciliatory approach." Meanwhile, in the US, "the election of a Democratic Congress and the departures of John Bolton, the ambassador to the United Nations, and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- both of whom took a hard line against North Korea -- have given moderates in the State Department more leeway to compromise."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, LaFranchi, 59K) reports that despite the optimism, "The spoiler may be that Pyongyang, which toughened its bargaining position by testing a nuclear weapon last October, may demand too high a price for putting its nuclear ambitions on the table."

However, the Washington Times (2/8, Lanfranco, 88K) reports a Chinese analyst warned yesterday that "the United States and its partners in six-party talks have taken steps they knew would prevent progress in halting North Korea's nuclear program." In comments seen as "much more pessimistic than what has been heard from" Hill, Teng Jianqun, deputy secretary-general at the China Arms Control and Disarmament Association, "also warned of the risk of war between the United States and China if the North Korean nuclear issue is mishandled."

French Trial Over Muhammad Cartoons Begins. The New York Times (2/8, A8, Bernard, 1.16M) reports hearings began Wednesday "in a suit brought by two influential French Muslim organizations against a satirical weekly newspaper for printing cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad that had touched off international rioting." The Paris Mosque and the Union of Islamic Organizations of France contend that the newspaper, Charlie Hebdo, and its director, Philippe Val, "are guilty of slander, an offense that carries a possible six-month sentence and a fine of up to 22,500 euros, or about $29,000."

Hu Defends China's Investments In Africa. The Washington Post (2/8, A14, Timberg, 690K) reports Chinese President Hu Jintao Wednesday "sought to reassure Africans that his country's aggressive investments in oil, copper and other natural resources do not amount to a new wave of colonialism," saying China would "not do anything harmful to the interests of Africa and its people." Hu's comments, made in Pretoria on the sixth stop of an eight-country tour of the continent, "came amid rising anxiety that China's economic power is strangling African manufacturing while locking up vital resources for years." Although China has "long-standing relationships with many countries in Africa," among Africans "concerns about rising Chinese clout are more often economic."

Poll Finds Religion Surging Among Chinese. The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Cody, 690K) reports a new government-sponsored survey on spirituality in China "has found that the number of religious believers among the country's 1.3 billion people is far higher than generally known, amounting to as many as 300 million." The findings, "based on a poll of 4,500 people conducted by professors at East China Normal University in Shanghai, supported growing indications that many Chinese are searching for new value systems to replace the communist doctrine that has been jettisoned in favor of market economics and a race for prosperity."

US Assures Russia On Kosovo Position. The Washington Times (2/8, Kralev, 88K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday said the US "has assured Russia that Washington's support for Kosovo's eventual independence from Serbia does not mean it will back the breakaway aspirations of Russian autonomous regions in the Caucasus." In congressional testimony yesterday, Rice said she has told Russian officials that "Kosovo is a precedent for nothing," but warned that delayed action on Kosovo's status could cause "a breakdown in order in Kosovo itself." Russia has been "reluctant to join American and European endorsements of a plan proposed by U.N. envoy Martti Ahtisaari that would lead to independence for Kosovo in all but name."

WPost Condemns New Charges Against Russians. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/8, A20, 690K) writes, "We won't accuse Russian President Vladimir Putin of being subtle this week. On Monday, Russian prosecutors leveled charges against a pair of Mr. Putin's one-time political enemies that are beyond implausible. … Precisely why Mr. Putin wants to keep these two men in jail for another 15 years or so is still up for speculation. Observers of Russian energy politics see it as a way to assist the Kremlin in grabbing the remaining bits of Yukos's assets inside and outside the country." Regardless of his reasons, the Post says Putin "has systematically dismantled the institutions of democracy inside Russia while bullying his neighbors and jailing his opponents." After the new charges were announced, the Post notes that a State Department spokesman said that the proceedings "raise questions about Russia's commitment to the responsibilities which all democratic, free market countries embrace," and that American policymakers will discuss the issue with the Kremlin "at an appropriate time and at the appropriate level." However, "We doubt that Mr. Putin will lose much sleep over that prospect."

US, Brazil Discuss Partnership To Promote Ethanol Use. The Washington Post (2/8, A14, Reel, 690K) reports the US and Brazil "are meeting this week to discuss a new energy partnership that they hope will encourage ethanol use throughout Latin America and that US officials hope will diminish the regional influence of oil-rich Venezuela. US officials said they expect to sign accords within a year that would promote technology-sharing with Brazil and encourage more Latin American neighbors to become biofuel producers and consumers." The US and Brazil "together produce about 70 percent of the world's ethanol, a fuel that President Bush has called a cornerstone in reducing US dependence on oil." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, who led discussions with Brazilian officials, Wednesday "declared that biofuel is now the 'symbolic centerpiece' of US relations with Brazil, a country that US officials have long hoped could counteract Venezuela's regional anti-American influence."

Venezuelan Oil Company Struggling As Chavez Squeezes Profits. The Washington Times (2/8, A1, Hill, 88K) reports on its front page, "Venezuela's national oil company is buckling under the burden of financing President Hugo Chavez's more than $9 billion a year in social and political ventures. Production at Petroleos de Venezuela is declining, and any major drop in oil prices or failure to reverse declining investment and production could lead to bankruptcy of the goose that lays the golden egg for Venezuela, Moody's Investors Service warned yesterday." The "well-tuned Venezuelan network of production facilities, Caribbean and U.S. Gulf Coast refineries and U.S. gas stations operated by Citgo has begun to falter after six years of Chavez rule, and the outlook for the once-thriving oil company looks bleak in light of the president's announced agenda to further squeeze profits from the oil sector."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Tours Argentine Jewish Center (AP)

By Bill Cormier, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 8, 2007

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Wednesday toured a Jewish cultural center bombed in 1994 and said the United States supports Argentina's efforts to seek justice for its worst terrorist attack.

Eight Iranians are wanted in Argentina in connection with the bombing, including the president, foreign minister and intelligence chief at the time.

"Civilized nations cannot easily forget the pain that we share when terrorist attacks occur," Gonzales said after laying flowers and meeting with Jewish leaders and relatives of victims of the attack. "Whether 1994 in Argentina, 2001 in the United States or 2004 in Spain, these moments bind us together in our grief."

Eight-five people were killed and 200 wounded when a van packed with explosives blew up outside the seven-story center on July 18, 1994. The center, known as the AMIA, has since been rebuilt.

Gonzales did not take questions from journalists on Wednesday.

He also did not say where the United States stands on Argentina's request for help from Interpol, which must decide in the coming weeks whether to issue global alerts for the arrests.

Iran has denied any involvement and has said it does not recognize the validity of the warrants. It said it would oppose any attempt to detain former President Hashemi Rafsanjani or other Iranian citizens.

Gonzales called the attack a "vicious act of hate."

"We will never give up the fight for justice ... just as we are bound together in our memories of the terrorist attacks, so too, we must be bound together in our resolve," he said. "Argentina has steadfastly pursued the perpetrators of the AMIA attacks ... the memory of what happened here, like our September 11th, is a touchstone for us."

Riordan Roett, director of the Latin American Studies Program at Johns Hopkins University, said Gonzales' visit was intended as a political jab against Tehran.

"The Gonzales trip is clearly related to an effort to pressure Iran," Roett said. Although, he said, "There's not much the U.S. can really do, given the fact that the Iranians are in Iran and will not be extradited by the authorities."

Verizon Urges Judge To Grant Justice Department Request (AP)

By Francis X. Quinn, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 8, 2007

AUGUSTA, Maine --Verizon is backing the U.S. government's attempt to stop a contempt hearing for the telecommunications giant that's scheduled for Friday by the Maine Public Utilities Commission.

Federal officials say the hearing could compromise national security.

"The MPUC seeks, under threat of sanction, to compel Verizon to provide information in state proceedings concerning its alleged cooperation with an alleged national security program despite the fact that the United States has specifically instructed Verizon that providing such a response would violate federal law," lawyers for Verizon wrote in a legal brief.

U.S. District Judge John Woodcock is expected to hear arguments in Bangor on Thursday.

A multi-customer complaint filed with the PUC last May effectively seeks to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. The complaint followed reports about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency.

The PUC has challenged the adequacy of Verizon responses to date.

On Tuesday, the Justice Department asked Woodcock to bar the PUC from going ahead with a contempt hearing at this time.

The Justice Department also asked the judge to block Verizon from responding to PUC demands for an affirmation of previous statements "because of the substantial risk of direct or inadvertent disclosure of information that would tend to confirm or deny the existence of foreign intelligence activities."

Verizon supports the federal government's request for a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction.

DOJ_NMG_0129272

"The MPUC's action unfairly puts Verizon squarely in the middle of this dispute between the United States and Maine over the state's authority to investigate, and potentially interfere with, an alleged federal national security program," lawyers for Verizon said.

The federal government's position drew new criticism Wednesday from the Maine Civil Liberties Union.

"It is the PUC's job to ensure that all of Maine's utilities companies are acting within the law," Zachary Heiden, a staff attorney for the Maine Civil Liberties Union, said in a statement. "The Department of Justice has no business trying to keep Maine's PUC from simply doing its job."

"The contempt hearings on Friday are simply meant to find out why Verizon ignored an order from the PUC," Heiden said. "There is nothing secret at issue here."

A multi-district litigation panel has been considering whether to consolidate a number of similar cases in which the federal government has sued state officials.

New Generation Of Terrorists Cyber-inspired, -trained (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, February 8, 2007

COLOGNE, Germany - Sitting on a platform bench in Cologne's cavernous main station watching his alleged co-conspirator step onto a train, the young Lebanese who's accused of plotting the deadliest terrorist attack in Germany's history finished his orange juice, stood up to throw the container in a recycling bin and rolled a heavy case toward Platform 4.

His junior partner, Jihad Hamad, 19, had just stowed a suitcase that contained enough explosives to rip a train car to shreds on the regional train, which was headed to the Rhine valley tourist haven of Koblenz.

Now it was Youssef Mohammed el Hajdib's turn. The 21-year-old weaved through the crowded station and boarded the double-decker North Rhine-Westfalia Express, bound for the industrial center of Dortmund to the north. Video cameras captured both men boarding with the bags.

To cause maximum damage, the bomb-makers had diverted slightly from the instructions they'd obtained from a Web site that police said had al-Qaida connections. They'd crammed both suitcases with explosives and stuffed any empty space with plastic bags of food starch, which they thought would cover survivors of the blast with a burning, oily coat.

That, police later said, was a "beginner's mistake." In their attempt to increase the destruction from the bombs, they'd made the charges "too fat." By not leaving any space for air, they'd suffocated their bombs.

The two Lebanese disembarked before the timers ignited the fuses, which failed to ignite the charges.

Railway employees discovered the suitcases later that evening and turned them in to lost-and-found offices. Each case contained 3 } gallons of propane in metal canisters, a little more than a gallon of gasoline in plastic mineral-water bottles and a small alarm clock, timed to detonate at 2:30 p.m. as the crowded trains neared Koblenz and Dortmund.

German police think that 400 passengers would have died if the bombs had detonated, making it the deadliest terrorist attack in German history.

Terrorism investigators around Europe see a lesson in this failed attempt at mass murder and in other failed or thwarted terrorist plots in recent years. While U.S. and British intelligence officials think that al-Qaida has regrouped in the mountains of Pakistan and is again capable of and intent on launching mass attacks around the globe, investigators in Britain, Germany and France are convinced that there's a broader terrorist threat against Europe. They're tracking thousands of suspected terrorists whom they say are planning mass murder.

Unlike the Sept. 11 plotters, the new wave of terrorists - the so-called third generation terrorists - are dreaming up, planning, funding and attempting attacks on their own, without international support.

The first generation of al-Qaida terrorists were Osama bin Laden and other veterans of the jihad in Afghanistan against Soviet occupiers during the 1980s. After the Soviet Union withdrew its troops, they turned their attention to the West, which they believed was corrupting and bullying the Islamic world.

The hijackers who flew passenger jets into the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington were typical of the second generation: professional, educated men, chosen and directed by Osama bin Laden, trained in the Afghanistan camps and financed by the al-Qaida network.

But the third generation has learned its hatred from television and its tactics from the Web, according to the experts. Its only connections to al-Qaida are Web sites and a shared anti-West philosophy. Its practitioners go online to find inspiration as well as practical advice, such as how to build a bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0129273

The result has been a number of duds. "The new generation is not professional. They build bombs that don't explode," said Rolf Tophoven, one of Germany's most respected terrorism experts and the co-director of the Institute for Terrorism Research and Security Policy in Essen.

Still, he noted, studies of bombings in the Palestinian territories indicate that a "completely professional suicide bomber" - able to construct a bomb and conduct an attack - "can be created in three weeks."

He added that he expects the number of attacks to be high in the coming years, and over time he expects this generation to learn from the mistakes now being made.

Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director general of Britain's MI6 Security Service, said in November that Britain was tracking 1,600 individuals and more than 200 groups thought to be involved in terrorism. Germany is investigating 200 suspected terrorist plots.

The two London commuter attacks in July 2005 are a prime example. The attackers were local; most were second-generation residents, products of British schools and middle-class homes, though with family links to Pakistan. In the first attack, on July 7, four suicide bombs killed 52 morning commuters. In the second, two weeks later, four young men stood on subways and a bus, shouted praise to Allah and attempted to detonate backpack bombs, which fizzled.

Last summer, British police arrested two dozen men - mostly British Muslims of Pakistani background - accused of plotting to blow up 10 trans-Atlantic jets en route to the United States. The alleged plotters, most of whom lived in the London area, are suspected of planning to sneak liquid explosives onto the planes and build bombs during the flights. Police said that as many as 4,000 people could have died if the plot had succeeded.

In northern Europe, few cases have had more impact than one on Nov. 2, 2004. A previously unknown Muslim Dutch citizen shot filmmaker Theo van Gogh, the great-grand-nephew of artist Vincent van Gogh, from his bicycle during his morning commute. The killer, Muhammad Bouyeri, 27, claimed that van Gogh's film "Submission," about violence against Muslim women, made him an enemy of Islam.

After knocking him to the sidewalk on a Dutch street, Bouyeri - raised in Amsterdam, but proud of his Moroccan heritage - slit van Gogh's throat with a knife, then put a page of Quranic verses on the knife and plunged the blade into van Gogh's chest. Police think that Bouyeri radicalized online, then joined Al Tahweed Mosque in Amsterdam, where he helped form the Hofstad Network, a Dutch terrorist group.

There have been many others. Magnus Ranstorp, an anti-terrorism expert at the Swedish Defense College, estimates that "about 40 serious plots" have been broken up in Europe since September 2001.

Last November, Norwegian police bugged the car of a 29-year-old Pakistani-Norwegian whom they suspected of having fired shots at an Oslo synagogue. They said they heard three other men and him - all of whom had criminal records - discussing plans to bomb the U.S. and Israeli embassies. The men - all younger than 30, two of Pakistani backgrounds, one of Turkish background and one Norwegian - were arrested, though it wasn't known whether they were close to carrying out the plot.

Police also have reported breaking up terrorist plots in Denmark, Italy, Spain, France, Turkey and Greece.

Tophoven said the plotters were European citizens or residents, usually Muslim and children of immigrants, and generally young.

Herbert Landolin Mueller, who's considered the top expert on Islamic terrorist organizations with the German equivalent of the National Security Agency, thinks that governments are overly focused on highly organized, international terrorism.

"People want to believe that there are terror cells, awaiting awakening, all within a central terrorist organization," he said. "But the Islamic movement is simply people who want to belong, people from the wealthy, middle class and lower classes. All attempts to define them are futile. Again, look at the attempted train bombing in Germany."

In that bombing attempt, investigators said that the two Lebanese men - both in Germany on student visas, one about to start a combined computer-electronics engineering program in Kiel, the other not yet enrolled at a college - told them that their plot was motivated by the Danish cartoon controversy that started in autumn 2005 over a collection of cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad, which were reprinted in Germany. The two hadn't attracted any suspicion before the attempt, police said. They're now in jail awaiting trial on terrorism charges.

Mueller thinks that many citizens would feel more comfortable if attacks emanated from a centralized terrorist organization, because that implies that the terrorists have been identified and the threat can be managed. Mueller thinks that the terrorism threat is as great as ever, but far more diverse and impossible to track. He considers the successful bombings in London and Madrid, Spain, as examples of the danger of homegrown, cyber-motivated and cyber-trained terrorists.

Bob Ayers, a former chief of the U.S. Department of Defense Information Systems Agency who's now an expert on security matters with Chatham House, a London research center, warned against dismissing the idea of central control.

"Al-Qaida is the spiritual head, the moral base of the movement," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0129274

"Do not make the mistake and believe that these are stupid people. They are not. In the West, too often people want to see them as backwards, uneducated, living in caves and filled with nothing but hatred."

His view has support among U.S. and British intelligence experts. But many say that the nature of the terrorism threat is not either/or - either under central direction or self-radicalized. It can be both, with a central organization influencing untrained people online and through mosques that are friendly to their views. Ayers thinks that's what's happening.

"Remember, the people lighting the fuse on the suicide bomb are always foot soldiers, highly expendable," he said. "The real concerns are those convincing the foot soldiers it's a good idea to kill themselves carrying out an attack."

Third wave terrorists will improve their professionalism, experts agree. Jean-Louis Bruguiere, who heads France's anti-terrorism efforts, said that while many were flying under investigative radar, others were becoming bold. His biggest worry is residents who've attached themselves to Islamic jihadism, and have gone to Iraq to learn more about how to run an insurgency.

Generally, the numbers of those who are leaving Europe for Iraq aren't thought to be large; experts think that five to 10 from Germany have made the trip, for example. And most of those who go are expected to die in fighting. But if even a few return, the experts worry about their impact.

"We have found a few returning, not many," Bruguiere said recently. "More than 10, fewer than 20. We know of as many as 100 who have left for Iraq."

They're particularly dangerous because not only will they bring back know-how but they'll also have hero status to young recruits, Bruguiere said.

That, Germany's Mueller thinks, is bad news for Europe.

"There will be future attacks, in many, many places," he said. "And those who carry out these attacks will not be known to law enforcement before the attack, but will have been leading very innocent lives."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anthrax Hoax Adds To Sentence (AP)

AP, February 8, 2007

Inmate mailed threat and a white powder to the person who prosecuted him

A federal inmate has been sentenced to more than 27 years in prison for mailing what a letter claimed was anthrax to an assistant U.S. attorney who had prosecuted him.

Charles E. Fuller, 39, pleaded guilty to one count of mailing a threatening communication and one count of threatening the use of a weapon of mass destruction before he was sentenced, prosecutors said Friday.

Fuller was indicted on those charges after the U.S. attorney's office in Indianapolis received an envelope, addressed to the attorney who prosecuted him on another case, which contained a white powdery substance that a letter claimed was anthrax.

The letter threatened to kill members of the prosecutor's family and demanded $250,000 in cash and a letter from her admitting the use of false information in order to convict Fuller.

Authorities determined that the substance in the envelope, received in June 2004, was not anthrax.

Fingerprint and handwriting analysis showed the envelope and letter had been written and sent by Fuller, prosecutors said.

Fuller already is serving a 77-month sentence for attacking an inmate at the federal prison in Pekin, Ill., with an ice pick, prosecutors said.

He was convicted in 2004 on a charge of threatening the president's life.

Bush Issues Medical Emergency Directive (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

The AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush issued orders Wednesday for how federal medical personnel should respond to a nuclear, radiological, biological or chemical attack, saying authorities should focus on threats that can be dealt with medically.

An attack using any one of those weapons "could cause mass casualties, compromise critical infrastructure, adversely affect our economy, and inflict social and psychological damage," according to the order.

The directive points out that the primary goal is to prevent such an attack, "but we must be fully prepared to respond to and recover from an attack if one occurs."

DOJ_NMG_0129275

It says it is not feasible to stockpile medicine and equipment against every possible threat. However, it says the priority must be on threats with a potential for a catastrophic impact on public health that have the greatest potential to be handled medically.

"We are moving heaven and earth to prevent" an attack, Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said. He called the directive a playbook for how the federal government will respond and coordinate in providing medical treatment in case prevention fails.

Under the plan, authorities will focus on acquiring medicines and equipment that already exist and are proven approaches, and on pursuing long-term research to "get ahead of the curve," said Knocke.

Of all the possible threats, the biological agents offer the greatest opportunity for medical treatment and care.

Meanwhile, a report from the Homeland Security Department's internal watchdog criticized the effectiveness of its "BioWatch" program _ hundreds of air-sniffing sensors in at least 30 metropolitan areas intended to provide early warning of a chemical or biological attack.

The inspector general found that the department had not properly enforced or monitored the Environmental Protection Agency and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which are also involved in the program. But it noted that Homeland Security had taken action to resolve the issues, and "we consider the recommendations resolved and closed."

Problems with filters, laboratories and fieldwork might cause cross-contamination of samples, which could jeopardize the department's ability "to protect the populace of the United States or to prosecute suspected perpetrators," the report said.

In some cities, the devices test the air 24 hours a day for traces of anthrax, smallpox and other deadly germs. New York, Boston and Washington have installed the monitors in major train and subway stations to sample the air for chemical poisons or explosive gases.

Environmental agencies also have been given portable air sensors that can be driven around in vans or carried by hand, though the sensors test only for about 20 different microbes and toxins.

In January 2003, the department rolled out the $129 million BioWatch program, relying on the Environmental Protection Agency and other agencies to run it. It was created out of concern that terrorists might aerosolize a biological agent and spread deadly biological pathogens.

Changes Made To Bioterror Warning Program (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — An early-warning program in more than 30 cities aimed at detecting biological weapons was bungled by the Homeland Security Department and has since undergone a revamping, according to a federal watchdog.

Homeland Security Inspector General Richard Skinner released a report Wednesday citing a series of problems in the BioWatch program, which costs $1 million a year per city. Among the issues was sloppy handling and storage of sensors designed to give early warnings of a bioterrorism attack.

Such problems "could jeopardize (the department's) ability to detect biological agents and protect the populace of the United States," the report says.

Jeff Stiefel, BioWatch's program manager, says the problems cropped up because the program was created quickly in 2003 in response to concerns that terrorists could spread deadly biological agents in densely populated areas.

Homeland Security officials say they have "taken action to resolve the issues," the report says. Stiefel says that "without question, those issues (raised by the report) are resolved."

BioWatch allows government scientists to test the air daily in high-risk cities to see whether anthrax, smallpox or other biological agents have been released. In many cases, existing air pollution monitoring machines were fitted with filters that are removed several times a day and taken to state health labs for testing.

Locations of sensors and the list of cities in the monitoring program are classified for security reasons, but Stiefel confirmed that the list includes New York City and Washington.

The number of sensors per city also is secret. But in some cities, Stiefel says, 40 sensors were added over the past year, indicating there are at least dozens — and maybe hundreds — in place in each city. Most are outdoors, Stiefel says, but some are being added in airport terminals and other places indoors where crowds gather.

The program is run by and paid for by the Homeland Security Department. The Environmental Protection Agency and the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention also play a role in placing and maintaining the machines and overseeing the lab tests.

DOJ_NMG_0129276

Last March, the EPA's own inspector general criticized the agency for improperly placing and monitoring some of the machines.

Wednesday's report cited a host of problems but said all had been resolved to the inspector general's satisfaction. Among the problems:

•At 84% of the labs, exposed filters were not transferred properly from the field.

•At 74% of the labs, bags holding the filters weren't properly decontaminated.

•In 65% of the cities checked, procedural errors were made during handoffs from field workers to lab technicians.

"You won't find those issues prevalent today," Stiefel says.

He says the program has successfully run 3 million tests without any false positives. In three years, there have been 15 positive hits for one of the six agents — but all were attributed to naturally occurring bacteria.

Report Concludes Convicted Agents Lied, Covered Up Shooting (AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Suzanne Gamboa

The AP, February 7, 2007

A federal report released Wednesday on the shooting of a suspected drug smuggler by Border Patrol agents concurs with prosecutors that the men committed obstruction of justice by failing to report the shooting, destroying evidence and lying to investigators.

Conservative members of Congress have criticized the case against the former agents, who were fired after their convictions, saying the men were doing their job when they injured Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila in 2005 near El Paso.

The U.S. Department of Homeland Security report on the investigation was drafted in 2006 after Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean were convicted and each was sentenced to more than a decade in federal prison. The 77-page report was made public Wednesday and offered few, if any, new details on the case.

The report, which is heavily redacted of names and some specific details, primarily outlines what Aldrete said happened on Feb. 17, 2005, as he tried to run from Border Patrol agents after trying to elude them in a van loaded with marijuana.

According to the report, Aldrete, who was given immunity and has filed a multimillion dollar claim against the federal government, told investigators he was unarmed and shot as he ran away from Compean and other agents. He said he tried to surrender and ran again after Compean slipped while trying to hit him with the butt of a shotgun.

The report also notes that other agents on the scene that day could not confirm whether Aldrete was armed and initially lied about whether they were aware of the shooting. They later cooperated with authorities. Those agents, whose names were removed from the report, were not prosecuted.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, whose office prosecuted the case and who has been widely criticized for pursing the agents and not the drug dealer shot, declined to comment.

Lawyers for Ramos and Compean did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said the report only bolsters the congressman's support of the agents.

"The OIG report has just emboldened our position because there is nothing in there that indicates these agents were not justified in shooting this individual," said Tara Setmayer. "This finally sheds some light on what these agents were thinking."

She pointed to Compean's written statement which she said reflects that he "clearly believed the drug smuggler had a weapon and feared for his life."

Two Texas congressmen said the office of inspector general for Homeland Security told them the report would say that the agents planned to "go out and shoot Mexicans" on that day.

"The congressman is absolutely unequivocally not happy about the fact that what he was told was in the report, is not in the report," said Jack Hirschfield, a spokesman for Rep. Michael McCaul, an Austin Republican.

"So far it looks to me like Agents Ramos and Compean may not have followed proper procedure following the shooting, which at most should have resulted in their suspension from the force, but not criminal procedure," Rep. John Culberson, D-Houston, said in a statement issued Wednesday afternoon.

Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif., also asked Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., to pursue a Senate probe of the prosecution and sentencing.

A spokeswoman for Leahy said the charirman would support Feinstein's request and suggested if an inquiry is held, Feinstein should lead it.

Rohrabacher and others also criticized President Bush Wednesday for not pardoning the agents.

Ramos and Compean were sentenced in October and reported to prison in January. Reports were released Tuesday that Ramos was attacked in prison in Mississippi on Saturday night after the airing of an episode of America's Most Wanted that highlighted his case.

Compean is jailed at a federal prison in Northern Ohio.

Report Confirms Agents' Cover-up (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

A Department of Homeland Security investigation of the 2005 shooting of a drug-smuggling suspect by two U.S. Border Patrol agents yesterday said the agents covered up the incident and tried to assault the alien, but the report fails to substantiate earlier accusations that they wanted to "shoot a Mexican."

The long-awaited and heavily redacted report by the department's Office of Inspector General was billed as a substantiation of the government's conviction of Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who were sentenced to 11- and 12-year terms, respectively, for shooting a Mexican national in the buttocks after he abandoned a marijuana-laden van and fled across the border.

Although the 77-page report concludes that the agents covered up the shooting, tried to assault Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila with the butt of a shotgun as he fled to Mexico and failed to report the incident to their supervisors, it falls short of statements by the Inspector General's Office in September to a House subcommittee.

The office had told lawmakers that the officers confessed to knowingly shooting at an unarmed suspect and that they did not think he was a threat, they wanted to shoot a Mexican and they lied to investigators.

Rep. John Culberson, Texas Republican, yesterday said Inspector General Richard L. Skinner has "admitted under oath" his office gave false information to Congress "painting Border Patrol Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Compean as rogue cops who were not in fear for their lives and who were 'out to shoot Mexicans.' "

Mr. Culberson called for Mr. Skinner's resignation because "he lied to us."

"In my opinion, this false information was given to members of Congress to throw us off the scent and cover up what appears to be an unjust criminal prosecution of two U.S. law-enforcement officers whose job was protecting our country's borders from criminals and terrorists," Mr. Culberson said.

Mr. Culberson also said that although Ramos and Compean may not have followed proper procedure after the shooting, at most it "should have resulted in their suspension from the force, but not criminal prosecution."

"At a time when Homeland Security has left our borders largely undefended and deployed National Guardsman whose standard operating procedure is to retreat when confronted with armed criminals, the unjust prosecution of Agents Ramos and Compean weakens border security by discouraging all U.S. law-enforcement officers from drawing their weapons in self-defense or in the defense of our nation," he said.

Ramos, 37, and Compean, 28, were convicted on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in a crime of violence and a civil rights violation in their attempted arrest of Mr. Aldrete-Davila.

Their lengthy sentences have drawn widespread criticism, including from some members of Congress. Petitions with more than 260,000 signatures have been presented to President Bush calling for pardons. Seventy members of Congress are co-sponsors of a bill by Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, calling for a congressional pardon.

The government brought the charges after Mr. Aldrete-Davila agreed with Homeland Security investigators to testify against the agents in exchange for immunity, protecting him from facing drug charges in this country.

The report relies heavily on Mr. Aldrete-Davila's statements, who admitted to IG investigators he was paid $1,500 to smuggle 743 pounds of marijuana into the United States. It said he sought the money to pay the medical bills of an unidentified relative.

It also said that at least three other Border Patrol agents knew about the shooting, did not report it to supervisors, destroyed evidence or made false statements to IG investigators. The agents agreed to cooperate in the probe after getting letters from federal prosecutors noting their cooperation.

At least six other agents knew about the shooting, the report noted. None of the nine agents was identified.

The IG's report noted that after Ramos and Compean spotted Mr. Aldrete-Davila's van along the border with Mexico and attempted to stop him, the Mexican national fled first in the van and then on foot. It said Compean confronted the man and "tried to hit him in the head with the butt of his shotgun."

DOJ_NMG_0129278

It said Mr. Aldrete-Davila then ran south and both Ramos and Compean fired shots at him, Ramos hitting him once in the buttocks. The report said the agents did not report the shooting as required and, instead, "covered up the crime scene by removing the spent shell casings that were ejected from their pistols during the shooting."

The report also noted that Mr. Aldrete-Davila, during a meeting with IG investigators at the U.S. Consulate office in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, took drugs across the U.S. border to earn money to pay for the medical bills of a relative. It also said he denied saying he was putting together "a hunting party" to shoot Border Patrol agents in revenge for him being shot.

The Border Patrol considered the threat sufficient enough at the time to issue an alert to all law-enforcement agencies along the border to be on the lookout for Mexican gangs looking to kill federal agents.

Compean denied trying to hit Mr. Aldrete-Davila with his shotgun, the report said. It noted that the agent said when the Mexican national ignored his orders in Spanish to stop and put his hands in the air, Mr. Aldrete-Davila ran at him and he used the butt of the weapon to "push him away from me."

The report said Compean and Mr. Aldrete-Davila "confronted" each other at the ditch and the agent fell into the water as the Mexican national continued to flee.

"I got some dirt in my eyes and he got up and started running south, he was pointing something shiny with his left hand. It looked like a gun. That is when I started shooting," Compean told investigators. "I did not report the shooting because I did not think anything happened to the guy."

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was picked up by a waiting vehicle after he crossed the river into Mexico.

The report's delivery comes five months after it had been requested by Rep. Michael McCaul, Texas Republican and former chairman of the Homeland Security subcommittee on management, investigations and oversight.

Expressing "deep concern over the fate of these agents," Mr. McCaul asked his Texas colleagues last month in a letter to join with him in urging Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to order the report's release, saying he had "relentlessly" sought the document without success.

Anger Grows In Congress Over Border Agents' Case (HC)

Some in House dismiss Homeland official's apology, say punish staff for misstatements

WASHINGTON — Republican congressmen's outrage over the imprisonment of two Border Patrol agents from Texas intensified Wednesday as the top Homeland Security investigative official apologized for his aides' misleading statements to lawmakers about the case.

The agents, sent to federal prison for wounding a fleeing Mexican drug trafficker and hiding evidence, never told investigators that they went on patrol intending to "shoot a Mexican," admitted Richard Skinner, the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general, under questioning during a House Homeland Security Committee hearing.

The misstatements occurred when aides briefed four Texas congressmen in September about the 2005 shooting near Fabens, southeast of El Paso.

"It was an unfortunate mischaracterization," Skinner told Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, whose district stretches to Harris County. "I apologize on behalf of our staff, and I just want to make perfectly clear this was not intentional."

But McCaul and several other House members from the Houston area who are involved in the Border Patrol agents' case said the misstatements never would have come to light had they not forced Skinner's office to release an investigative report on the shooting.

The report, released Wednesday with some sections deleted, does not substantiate what McCaul said were some of the more inflammatory claims made by the inspector general's office last fall. The claims included the alleged "shoot a Mexican" comment and an assertion that agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos had no fear for their lives when they fired 15 rounds at the trafficker as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a van with 743 pounds of marijuana.

"Those representations became misrepresentations if not downright false statements to members of Congress," McCaul said, later suggesting that Skinner should consider disciplining or firing the staffers.

In an interview, Skinner questioned the push to punish his office for "an innocent, unintended characterization."

Calls for pardon increaseOther Republicans on Capitol Hill went further than McCaul in what has mushroomed into a growing political liability for President Bush and his administration — a vulnerability all the greater because some of the president's staunchest conservative allies have turned against him on this issue.

Reps. John Culberson of Houston and Sam Johnson of Plano said Skinner and his top aides should be forced to resign.

DOJ_NMG_0129279

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., demanded that the Bureau of Prisons chief, Harley Lappin, be fired after Saturday's beating of Ramos by six inmates at a Mississippi prison.

The prisoners recognized Ramos and assaulted him after a TV segment about his case aired on America's Most Wanted, lawmakers said.

'Impeachment talk'Bush faces increasing demands from House Republicans and others that he pardon Ramos and Compean, who were sentenced in October to 11 and 12 years, respectively, after being convicted of violating the trafficker's civil rights and tampering with evidence for picking up their shell casings and not reporting the shooting.

"The president has lost my respect because he will not step forward and do what's right," said Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., went a step further, saying Bush would face dire consequences if Compean or Ramos is killed while in prison. If that happens, he said, "There's going to be some kind of impeachment talk on Capitol Hill."

Last month, Bush said in response to passions about the case and the pardon request that he would take a hard look at the case.

Prison protections soughtBureau of Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said Ramos sustained minor bruises and abrasions and has since been removed from the general prison population at the Yazoo City prison. Compean, incarcerated in Ohio, has never been in the general population.

Hunter and Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, wrote President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, respectively, on Wednesday, demanding protections in prison for the ex-agents.

Bipartisan requestSenate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., granted a request Wednesday by Cornyn and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., for a committee investigation and hearing into the case. McCaul is asking the House Homeland Security Committee to conduct a hearing as well.

And Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, demanded a Justice Department investigation into the faulty statements made to lawmakers by the inspector general's staff last fall.

"It was a fabrication," Poe said flatly of the investigators' claims. Poe wouldn't hazard a guess as to why the investigators misspoke. But Culberson offered an opinion.

"There is no chance this was an innocent mistake," Culberson said. "Those statements made to us were designed to throw us off the scent and cover up what is obviously an unjust criminal prosecution of two officers who were protecting our borders from criminals and terrorists sneaking in."

Punishment criticizedCompean and Ramos have become a popular cause among immigration-enforcement proponents in and out of Congress, hailed as heroes wrongly prosecuted by the government. Federal prosecutors, for their part, claim they were rogue agents who fired on an unarmed man who posed no danger to them, destroyed evidence, and lied to superiors and investigators.

Even if the agents were guilty, their defenders suggest the punishment has far outweighed the wrongdoing.

"At worst, these two agents should have been suspended or fired from their jobs for failing to properly report the shooting and picking up the shell casings," Culberson said.

Distrust Hinders FBI In Outreach To Muslims (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

LOS ANGELES -- The FBI's worst fears that hidden homegrown terrorist groups could take root in this country were fanned here in the summer of 2005, when four young Muslim men were charged with conspiring "to levy war against the United States" via deadly attacks on military installations and synagogues in Southern California.

The men belonged to what Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called a "radical Islamic organization" named Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh (JIS), or Assembly of True Islam. They were discovered before they could carry out their alleged plans.

Although Gonzales claimed an intelligence victory, the FBI had only stumbled upon JIS. Numbers on a cellphone dropped during a gas-station holdup led local police to an apartment and a computer with documents that authorities said outlined a terrorism spree.

None of the four -- three U.S.-born citizens and one Pakistani immigrant -- fit a terrorist profile. They had no ties to foreign extremists or radical imams, and their public behavior had drawn no attention. JIS was also news to officials at the California state prison where a man accused of founding the group was serving a lengthy sentence for robbery and allegedly was directing JIS operations from his cell.

The discovery was an ominous surprise to federal law enforcement, whose senior officials now regularly refer to the case in speeches warning of the homegrown threat.

But the high-profile indictments, announced at news conferences in Los Angeles and Washington, were unsettling to Southern California's half-million-strong Muslim community for a different reason.

"They're not Muslims," declared Shakeel Syed, head of the 75-mosque Islamic Shura Council of Southern California and a government-approved chaplain who has visited the four men in jail, where they await trial this year. "They don't know anything about Islam."

Self-styled converts with the apple-pie surnames of Patterson, Washington and James, the Americans are "gangbangers, basically," Syed said dismissively, "petty criminals" incapable of responding even to his standard Islamic greetings. The Pakistani, described by Syed as a clueless 21-year-old, "I felt sorry for."

"If this is to be characterized as Islam, the faith of millions of people in this country," he said, "it is a great injustice and disservice." Labeling JIS "Islamic" just because it said it puts the religion unfairly in the spotlight again, Syed and other Muslim leaders argued.

The JIS affair is one of many incidents that have regularly challenged the fragile cooperation that law enforcement and Muslims nationwide are struggling to create after years of mutual suspicion. Without that cooperation, the FBI, sheriffs and police chiefs believe they will never penetrate the world of homegrown Islamic extremists and potential terrorists the officials are convinced is out there.

Muslim leaders say they are eager to help. Yet for both sides, the effort remains a steep uphill climb with frequent detours into resentment, suspicion and misunderstanding.

Virtually all 56 FBI field offices and many local police departments have invited Muslim leaders to join multicultural advisory boards and to teach classes in the basics of Islam to agents and police. At community meetings, the FBI listens to Muslim complaints and asks for assistance in finding potential terrorists in their own communities.

"We're spending more money on outreach . . . so we can say: 'Please help us. Please look for people who are turning away from institutions to extremism. Please be our eyes and ears,' " said Philip Mudd, deputy director of the bureau's national security branch.

But many FBI officers have grown impatient with what they see as Muslim resistance. The Muslims are "in denial" over the threat in their midst, one senior officer said, adding: "All they say is 'There is no problem. Stop picking on us.' "

Muslim leaders have frustrations of their own, ranging far beyond incidents such as the JIS case. Immigration sweeps following the Sept. 11, 2001, al-Qaeda attacks and mandatory registrations long ago convinced them that the FBI sees Muslims as suspects rather than partners.

"How much cooperation can we give . . . at the same time we ourselves are part of the problem in [their] eyes?" asked Sadullah Khan, director of the Islamic Center of Irvine, a city between Los Angeles and San Diego.

Hundreds gathered at a meeting last summer to angrily confront FBI officials after an agent's public comment, quickly contradicted by headquarters, that the bureau was "monitoring" Muslim student groups at the University of California at Irvine.

J. Stephen Tidwell, the assistant director in charge of the FBI's Los Angeles field office, is the bureau's point man for relations with a Muslim community spread across seven Southern California counties. He spends many Fridays attending services at mosques.

How is the outreach effort going? "As with any, and I'll use the word 'family,' there are family disagreements," Tidwell said. "There are times when we agree to disagree. I would say that overall, they feel comfortable enough with the relationship that if they've got a problem they'll call me."

Most days, his phone is ringing off the hook.Constant Vigilance

After Sept. 11, federal officials warned of terrorist "sleeper cells" -- groups of al-Qaeda operatives who, like the hijackers who flew planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, had blended into cities and towns and were awaiting orders to launch new attacks.

Beyond sleepers, the FBI was on the lookout in this country for foreign Islamic "radicals" trying to recruit domestic Muslims to terrorist causes.

The White House has focused on combating the danger from without -- sealing borders, tapping overseas telephone calls and fighting terrorists "over there" so they do not have to be fought "here." But federal counterterrorism and law enforcement officials have issued increasingly dire warnings of a threat from within.

Homegrown or "self-starting" terrorism has become a reality in Europe. The 2004 bombing of commuter trains outside Madrid, attacks on British buses and subways in 2005, and last summer's discovery of plans to blow up U.S.-bound commercial airliners were all tied to young men "inspired" by al-Qaeda but with no tangible connections to it or any other known terrorist groups. Most of the alleged perpetrators are young men of Middle Eastern, South Asian or North African parentage who had spent all or most of their lives in secular Europe.

"They were middle-class, educated and had people who loved them," a U.S. intelligence official said of the transit bombers in England. "How do you get from being a moderate Muslim to being a suicide bomber? What is that road?"

Compared with Europe, there has been little evidence of such activity in this country. The FBI acknowledges that the JIS indictments are the only case so far of genuine "self-starters" -- individuals who moved from radical thought to terrorist plans with no overseas involvement and without the aid of radical imams, undercover officers or paid informants.

Mudd, a career CIA official before he joined the FBI last year, said that although the growth of homegrown cells is "slower than in Europe," it is "inevitable."

Counterterrorism officials say they are less worried about traditional recruitment "gateways" such as prisons and mosques than about young Muslims, influenced by one another and what they see on the Internet, who find reasons to turn to extremism. Uncovering them, the intelligence official said, raises a number of troublesome issues, including "privacy, respect for religion, and not wanting to be seen as targeting."

The FBI's definition of homegrown extremists as "U.S. persons who appear to have assimilated, but reject the cultural values, beliefs and environment of the United States" could apply to disaffected young people of any era, regardless of faith.

"Youth are vulnerable," Mudd said, whether it is the Goths of the 1980s or the anti-establishment culture of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Understanding and reversing individual transitions to extremism stretches both the bureau's skills and its legal mandate. Most FBI agents acknowledge that they have little understanding of the subterranean lives of youths, the Internet world or Islam. Differentiating between those who pose a threat and those who are pious or angry or both, who exercise their rights to protest against their government and visit their preferred Internet sites, is a dicey business for law enforcement.

When Muslims ask "What should we look for?" Mudd advises them to "think of every 15-to-26-year-old ostracized from the congregation," saying, "I need you to tell me when you see this."

But Hussam Ayloush, head of the Southern California branch of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, warned that Muslim youths already feel singled out in this country. "I don't think the looks, how many times a person prays, how strong their political views are should indicate anything. The red line for me, when I start noticing, is when someone starts justifying terrorism . . . when they say the West is killing Muslims" and that's the only way they could respond.

U.S. military involvement in the Middle East and what American Muslim youths perceive as challenges at home to their religion and patriotism have placed them, far more than their parents, in "a real identity crisis," Ayloush said. Increased radicalization "is possible," he added. "Now, it's not real, but I see it on the horizon."Two Constituencies

After a recent Friday afternoon sermon at the Irvine Islamic Center on the flexible and peaceful nature of Islam, Khan jostled his way through hallway greetings and embraces. But as he retreated behind the closed door of his tiny office for a conversation about Muslim relations with the FBI, his demeanor changed from calm reflection to irritation. He and countless friends and colleagues, he told a visitor, had been treated badly for no reason other than being Muslim.

He has hosted two meetings with bureau agents, Khan said, including the public one with Tidwell on the student "monitoring" question. "Basically, they gave us 'FBI 101.' How they don't harm people, they don't spy on anybody." An earlier session, he said, was far more memorable in terms of what he saw as typical disrespect and unnecessary brusqueness.

When two agents came to his office, one "refused to shake my hand and blocked the doorway. As if I were going to run away! They were recording everything, asking me about some guy I don't even know." He said it reminded him of officials' visits in his native South Africa during apartheid.

Khan said indignantly that he is a prominent Southern Californian who teaches at universities across the region. "I have a congregation of 1,500 people. If you treat me with this kind of doubt and suspicion," he asked, "do you think I'm going to be convincing telling people, 'Don't worry, the FBI is okay'?"

For immigrants, even the most innocuous official visit can be a source of deep anxiety. "We have many people who come from Arab backgrounds. Their historical experience is that the FBI is satan with a small 's' -- the mukhabarat," said the Shura Council's Syed, using the Arabic word for intelligence services. "When I introduce Tidwell in my community, if I say he is my friend, they're going to beat me up after he leaves. And if I don't say he is my friend, the FBI is going to beat me up after they leave."The Local Go-Between

In his 2 1/2 years as chief of the Anaheim Police Department in Orange County, John Welter has seen no evidence of homegrown terrorism. He is uncertain but hopeful, he said, that it is "not because we're not uncovering it, but because it doesn't exist" in Anaheim.

As the FBI and Muslims wrestle toward accommodation, local law enforcement officials have come to occupy a safe middle ground for both. The FBI readily acknowledges that it will never know what goes on in a community as well as the local cops do;

DOJ_NMG_0129282

Muslims say they feel more comfortable among faces they see every day. Welter is widely viewed as a chief who is equally attuned to the demands of counterterrorism and the needs of Anaheim's diverse population.

But achieving that status has been hard work. Welter was greeted on arrival here in 2004 with a formal complaint of police harassment by Muslim owners of restaurants and bookstores clustered along a portion of Brookhurst Street known locally as "Little Arabia."

Anaheim officers, they charged, were barging in -- often through the back door -- to demand information about possible terrorists. When the indignant businessmen replied that they did not know any terrorists and had not seen anything suspicious, police cruisers parked outside their stores and restaurants. Officers took down license-plate numbers and advised arriving customers that the proprietors were not cooperating with terrorism investigations.

"My guys were doing what they felt was expected of them, by the FBI and the chief," Welter recalled. "No police officer wants to be responsible for not knowing what's happening in their community. No one wants to be responsible for the next 9/11."

But, he said, "the methods that some of our intelligence officers were using were offending people rather than gathering support and important information."

After an internal department investigation and an assessment by the state attorney general's office, Welter reassigned part of his 12-officer intelligence division and "we changed the whole way we did a lot of our work." To the irritation of many, the entire force of 700 was made to attend cultural training sessions taught by the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

"Most people are very ignorant of what the Muslim faith is about, including me," Welter said. "I've got a book on Muslims for dummies; I can't be an expert on all the religions and cults and cultures in the world. But what I can do is be an expert in behavior that terrorists engage in prior to an attack."

U.S. Asks To Arm Pilots Abroad (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 8, 2007

For the first time, the U.S. government is asking foreign countries to allow pilots to carry guns in the cockpit when they fly overseas.

The Homeland Security Department, working with the State Department, is trying to expand a 4-year-old program that allows thousands of pilots to carry guns on domestic flights.

"It's obvious that there's a threat internationally," said Conan Bruce, spokesman for the Federal Air Marshals Service, which runs the armed-pilots program. "We want to work toward having (armed pilots) be able to perform their duties on international flights."

Some countries may block U.S. efforts because they don't want guns on airplanes, even if they're carried by trained pilots who have been sworn as law officers.

"Sweden would rather not see any weapons aboard airplanes," said Michael Mohr, homeland security liaison at the Swedish Embassy in Washington. "There's a concern about arms and very sensitive equipment inside airplanes."

Nations can prohibit armed air marshals on U.S. flights to their countries. Some, including Sweden, have resisted U.S. efforts to have them put their own armed officers on U.S.-bound flights. Thousands of U.S. air marshals fly as passengers on domestic and international flights.

Armed pilots, known as flight deck officers, carry guns only in the cockpit. No pilot has fired a gun in a plane, Bruce said. The Transportation Security Administration allows handguns of varied calibers, including .357, .40 and .45, and 9mm.

The effort to expand the armed-pilots program comes amid criticism that it is falling short of its potential. A Homeland Security report released last month said the program needs improvement, and some policies "may have dissuaded pilots from participating."

"More needs to be accomplished to maximize the use of" armed pilots, the report concludes.

Congress cut $11.5 million from the last two budget requests for armed pilots because the program didn't spend all its money. Bruce said costs have fluctuated depending on pilot availability for one week of training.

Federal Flight Deck Officers Association Chairman Jim Krauss said the U.S. push for guns on international flights will help enlist more pilots in the program. "We certainly would see a lot more participation," he said.

About 8% of flights originating in the USA are to international destinations.

Members of Congress have proposed numerous bills since 2004 that would require the administration to work with countries to allow armed pilots, and to take other steps to improve the program.

David Mackett, president of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, which advocates for armed pilots, said his group wants to see lifted a policy requiring them to keep guns in a lockbox except when they're in a cockpit. "We have thousands of pilots who are routinely riding in the cabin (as passengers) and could serve as the last line of defense," Mackett said. He said other law enforcement officers carry guns on board planes.

Bruce said improvements are planned in response to pilot concerns. Armed pilots will get badges this year to replace ID cards. Regional training sites will open to make pilot recertification more convenient.

Aviation security consultant Rich Roth said some pilots "feel better" carrying guns, but he doubts they could thwart a hijacker. "If you're sitting in the flight deck and they get through, you have no time to do anything with a weapon," Roth said.

Airport Screeners To Get AMBER Alerts (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 8, 2007

The nation's 43,000 airport security screeners will get notices and photos of abducted children as part of the AMBER Alert network's quest to find missing people, the Transportation Security Administration said Wednesday.

Screeners will be looking to stop abductors from taking children on planes. AMBER Alerts are abduction notices sent to authorities and to media outlets, asking for help in locating a missing child. Airports are going to start receiving the bulletins starting today.

"This can be tremendously effective," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, which helps disseminate the alerts. "You're talking about 43,000 TSA officers around the country."

TSA screeners check 2 million people a day at about 450 commercial airports around the USA.

"The goal is to get that (alert) to TSA officers within minutes," said Gale Rossides, a TSA associate administrator. Screeners "meet so many children every day, they may actually notice something that's out of character with a child."

The Justice Department says the AMBER Alert system has helped save more than 200 children since it began in 1996 after 9-year-old Amber Hagerman was kidnapped near Dallas and murdered.

Many abductors are non-custodial parents who try to get children out of their home neighborhood quickly and often use commercial airplanes, Allen said. "Time is the enemy in these cases," he said. Search efforts are typically focused in the child's home community.

The TSA effort is the first time AMBER Alerts will go directly to airports, Allen said.

TSA airport security directors will receive the notices and distribute photos and written descriptions of the child and potential abductor to airport and airline officials, as well as to the airport's screeners.

"The entire airport community will be on the lookout for the child and the abductor," Allen said.

Don Thomas, a screener at Orlando International Airport, said the alerts could help security overall by encouraging screeners to look more closely at passengers. "Sometimes we get complacent," said Thomas, who is president of a small screeners' union. "This will put us more on alert."

Federal air marshals have been receiving AMBER Alerts for a couple of years on their personal digital assistants, or PDAs.

The alerts are issued when authorities believe a child is in danger of being seriously hurt or killed and when the victim and abductor can be described.

Security Debate Centers On Tougher Standards For Inspections Of Air Cargo (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — The suitcases loaded onto a Seattle-bound flight at Dulles International Airport each went through an electronic device that can sniff out explosives. But the plane's belly also held bins filled with cargo — as varied as decorative plates and computer supplies — most of which got no such scrutiny.

This disparity in how aviation security officials scan air cargo has set off an intense debate in Congress. House Democrats are pushing for a requirement that, within three years, all air cargo be inspected at a level equal to that of checked baggage, at an estimated cost to the federal government of $600 million per year.

Those Democrats argue that, despite the billions of dollars the nation has already spent on aviation security, it would still be far too easy to slip a bomb aboard and blow up a passenger plane.

"Here is a backdoor way into planes," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has been leading the drive for 100 percent inspection of air cargo placed on passenger jets, compared with the current level of about 30 percent.

But officials at the Transportation Security Administration said the security measures already in place for air cargo — while very different from the passenger-baggage inspection system — were sufficient to prevent a bomb from getting aboard.

Mandating physical inspection of all air cargo could actually reduce safety, said Kip Hawley, the security administration's director, because the high cost would require other security measures to be curtailed. "History is full of examples of invincible secure systems failing, like the Titanic," Mr. Hawley said. "If you put all of your resources into making something invulnerable, you end up ironically with less security."

The debate has implications not only for air safety, but also for the financial health of the nation's airlines. Twenty-two percent of domestic air cargo travels on passenger aircraft, or about 2.8 million tons a year, producing $4.7 billion a year in revenue for the airlines.

And this steady stream of air cargo — most of it promised for delivery in one or two days — is often what makes the difference between a profitable route and one that loses money. Industry officials fear that tougher standards may force cargo off passenger planes and onto flights reserved just for cargo, or cause huge delays.

"Imagine automotive manufacturing facilities idled due to the lack of airbags or other parts, restaurants closed because seafood did not arrive or flower shops without flowers on Mother's Day and other holidays," the Air Transport Association said in reply to Mr. Markey's plan. "These are very real concerns."

At major airports across the United States, there are few similarities between security systems for cargo and passenger baggage even though both end up on the same plane.

For passenger baggage, almost the entire security system is focused on one moment: when the bag is handed off, as passengers arrive at the airport. Every bag is electronically scanned or examined by a second device that swabs it to check for traces of explosives. In unusual circumstances, physical or canine searches are substituted.

The security effort is not nearly so intense for air cargo at any one point. Instead, transportation officials have tried to build a security zone surrounding the cargo packages during their journey from the manufacturing plant to the plane.

Much of the cargo system is based on a belief that the government can be confident of cargo security if it has a record of who is sending the package and has completed background checks on the freight forwarding and air cargo employees who have access to the shipments.

Part of the rationale is also that whereas a passenger can be assured that his suitcase is going on a specific flight, when a package is sent through a freight forwarder, the sender has no idea whether it will be sent on a cargo or a passenger jet.

Some aviation security officials said this program, called Known Shipper, was fundamentally flawed.

"It is something that could be easily defeated by somebody with patience," said Jim Hall, who was chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board during the Clinton administration.

About a third of the cargo shipments destined for passenger planes are inspected at the airport warehouse or the freight forwarder. About 400 bomb-detection dogs, trained by the Transportation Security Administration, are working nationwide at 80 airports, where they spend about a quarter of their time checking cargo.

But there is huge variability in the intensity and quality of the work, said Fred Roder, a former explosives detection program manager at the Homeland Security Department.

The inspections are done by the airlines or freight forwarders, not security administration officers, who undergo much more intense background checks. Transportation officials also do not specify whether the inspections should be done by opening a box, using a screening machine or a dog, or other means, leaving the airlines to decide.

In addition, the security administration has been slow to approve a new generation of machines that can screen oversized cargo shipments. It has also not finished work on a long-promised computer program that is supposed to identify the highest risk shipments automatically — based on the identity of the shipper, the cargo contents and other factors — so the searches can be more specific.

The result is that most air cargo inspections are done by simply opening the box and looking for tampering or other possible hints of a bomb, Mr. Roder said.

Christopher White, a spokesman for the security administration, said the agency had recently enhanced the requirements for open-box inspections, although he would not say how. The agency also has its own staff of 300 auditors, who check on the work that the airlines and freight forwarders do, through visits and covert testing.

Mr. Hawley, the T.S.A. director, said: "The best way to do any security is in layers. Our system is based on flexibility and unpredictability."

Representative Markey said this system, while better than what existed before 2001, was not sufficient. "It is just like saying it is O.K. to screen one-third of the passengers going on a plane because they have secured the cockpit door," he said.

The House bill, which was part of a much larger antiterrorism package that passed last month, would require that within three years, all air cargo going onto passenger planes be inspected with a system of "equipment, technology, procedures and personnel" that together "provide a level of security equivalent" to checked baggage screening.

A Senate version, introduced this week, would eliminate requiring that all cargo destined for a passenger plane be physically inspected, mandating instead that all cargo be "screened," which might simply mean evaluating the contents, sender and destination of packages and doing inspections on just high-risk cargo, similar to what now occurs.

To improve the existing process, the Senate bill, which has bipartisan backing, calls for speeding installation of more automated inspection equipment, and it pushes the security administration to consider mandating use of blast-resistant bins for holding air cargo, a move it has been considering for several years.

Department of Homeland Security officials have implied that might be acceptable, but Mr. Markey said he would fight to prevent the original bill from being watered down.

"They industry argued five years ago it would impossible to inspect all the checked bags," Mr. Markey said. "They were told to do so. And T.S.A. completed the task in two years."

Senators Debate Wireless Network For Safety Workers (WSJ)

By Amol Sharma And Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

Emergency workers have long complained that their communications systems are outdated and underfunded. Now, convinced that the federal government alone can't answer their concerns, public-safety groups are turning to commercial wireless companies for help.

First responders can't always communicate with each other during major disasters because their telecom equipment is incompatible with that of other agencies.

What's more, much of the equipment is both expensive and out of date: In some cases, police agencies are paying $3,500 each for two-way radio devices.

To improve communications among emergency workers, Cyren Call, a McLean, Va., company launched by Nextel Communications founder Morgan O'Brien, has been lobbying feverishly for a plan to involve the private sector in public-safety upgrades.

Under the plan, a slice of the radio spectrum would be reserved for public-safety use and licensed to an entity called a Public Safety Broadband Trust. A private bidder would be selected to manage the creation of a broadband network shared by consumer cellphone users and public-safety workers such as firemen and policemen; in an emergency, public-safety users would take precedence. Small rural operators would pay to build out the infrastructure; in exchange, they would be able to offer services over frequencies they didn't have to pay for.

The new Congress is taking a hard look at the idea. Republican presidential contender Sen. John McCain of Arizona announced plans to introduce legislation that would take a similar approach. Today, the Senate Commerce Committee is planning to hold a hearing to consider it, and Senate staffers say it has support from some top Democrats.

But getting any legislation through a divided Congress this year will be difficult, especially given the controversy the plan is generating in the wireless industry. Critics say it amounts to a corporate giveaway to Cyren Call. There are better ways to go about improving public-safety communications, they say, without setting aside valuable frequencies for public-safety use.

The debate highlights how coveted radio spectrum is in the U.S. wireless industry, which now services more than 230 million cellphone customers. To acquire a license for such spectrum, cellphone companies have to bid in auctions that the government holds from time to time, putting down billions of dollars so they can provide coverage for more users and offer new services such as Web access. They say the O'Brien plan will sap auction revenue for the government.

To counter that argument, Mr. O'Brien proposes that the trust pay the U.S. Treasury $5 billion up front for the spectrum by raising private capital through government-backed loan guarantees. The trust would recoup that cost over time by taking a share of revenue from the commercial wireless operators. The network manager -- Cyren Call, if Mr. O'Brien has his way -- would get a cut of the proceeds.

The large cellphone operators, including Verizon Wireless, a joint venture of Verizon Communications Inc. and Vodafone Group PLC; AT&T Inc.'s wireless unit; and Sprint Nextel Corp. all declined to comment on Mr. O'Brien's proposal but said they support improving public-safety communications. But industry lobbyists, particularly Verizon's, are fighting Cyren Call's plan ferociously, people familiar with the matter say.

Giving the issue urgency is the timetable for the Federal Communications Commission's next major spectrum auction, which could come as soon as August and no later than next January. Unless Congress enacts legislation before the auction along the lines proposed by Sen. McCain, the plan backed by Mr. O'Brien will die, because the sought-after slice of the airwaves will have been licensed to commercial operators.

DOJ_NMG_0129286

Mr. O'Brien's plan fell flat at the FCC, but his lobbying of Congress appears to be paying dividends. Public-safety groups have generally embraced the Cyren Call proposal.

"It provides public safety with the access to the spectrum it needs, but doesn't deny the use for other purposes," says Robert Gurss, lobbyist for the Association of Public-Safety Communications Officials International.

Still, the idea of sidestepping auctions displeases watchdog groups. "We favor the auction process," says Thomas Schatz, president of the nonpartisan Citizens Against Government Waste.

None of the major cellphone companies are testifying at today's hearing. But their trade group, CTIA-The Wireless Association, is sending Steve Largent, its president and chief executive officer. In a statement last week, Jot Carpenter, the group's vice president for government affairs, said public-safety groups have enough spectrum to serve their roughly four million users nationally. "More spectrum is clearly not the answer," he said.

WAR NEWS:

GOP Senators Push Vote On Troop Buildup (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Seven Republican lawmakers threatened Wednesday to tie up Senate business until a resolution opposing President Bush's planned troop buildup gets a vote, saying they will try to attach the measure to future legislation.

"The war in Iraq is the most pressing issue of our time. It urgently deserves the attention of the full Senate," said Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), who sponsored the measure criticizing the White House plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Warner and six other GOP senators sent a letter to Senate leaders of both parties Wednesday evening. Among the signatories was Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who had not previously expressed support for the Warner measure.

The procedural gambit does not guarantee the Senate will vote any time soon on Bush's plan to send more troops into Baghdad to control sectarian violence there. But it may further complicate Senate debate on the war, just as Senate Democratic leaders seemed prepared to let the Democratic majority in the House take up the legislative challenge to the White House.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and her lieutenants have said they plan to consider a resolution like Warner's as early as Monday.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) had been pushing for a vote this week on the Warner resolution.

But Senate Republicans — including Warner — protested Monday that they were not allowed to bring up alternative resolutions and successfully denied Reid the 60 votes he needed to formally bring up the measure.

The GOP demanded votes on two alternative measures. One, by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), expresses support for the mission but lists benchmarks for the Iraqi government to meet to demonstrate its commitment. The other, by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), opposes any cutoff of funds for troops in the field.

After three days of rhetorical brawling in which Democrats portrayed Republicans as obstacles to a war debate, Reid said Wednesday that Democrats were no longer going to seek a vote on the Warner measure, which expresses the sense that the Senate "disagrees" with the buildup.

"I'm terribly disappointed," Reid said on the floor of the Senate.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) countered with expressions of his own distress.

"I'm disappointed, as other members of my party in the Senate are disappointed, we're not having the Iraq debate this week," he said.

If Warner follows through with his threat, the debate may soon be resurrected. He did not indicate when he planned to try to revive his measure.

Such an action would almost certainly be accompanied by another from McConnell and other White House allies to revive the Gregg measure.

Group Of Republican Senators Vows To Force A Vote On Troop Surge (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - Seven Senate Republicans on Wednesday blasted their own leaders and Democrats for stalling the debate on the resolution to oppose President Bush's plans to send more troops to Iraq, and they vowed in a letter to push through a vote one way or another.

DOJ_NMG_0129287

"The current stalemate is unacceptable to us and to the people of this country," said the letter signed by Sens. John Warner of Virginia, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, Gordon Smith of Oregon, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and George Voinovich of Ohio. "We will explore all of our options."

Democrats took notice but weren't convinced that the letter was much more than an attempt by the Republicans to protect their re-election prospects.

The group, led by Warner, a respected military veteran, includes moderates and members who are facing re-election in 2008.

Warner was the driving force behind the bipartisan resolution that Democrats had attempted to debate and vote on this week. The resolution opposes Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, but says that it would be wrong to cut off funding for troops on the ground.

But on Monday, Republican leaders used a procedural vote to block debate on the resolution unless Democrats agreed to also consider a proposal by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H. That proposal opposes cutting off funding for troops but takes no position on the troop increase.

All of the Senate Republicans except for Coleman and Collins voted with their leadership to block the debate.

Democrats refused to consider Gregg's resolution because they saw it as a trap: If they opposed it, election opponents would accuse them of hurting U.S. soldiers. If they supported it and the Warner resolution failed, Gregg's resolution would be the only formal statement from the Senate and it would be silent on the troop increase issue. So the debate deadlocked before it began.

In the letter Wednesday, the senators said their Monday votes "should not be interpreted as any lessening of our resolve" to advocate against a troop increase.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said Reid "gave Senator Warner and the others a chance to vote for their own resolution on Monday, but only two of them chose to do so. Hopefully this letter signifies that the others have had a change of heart and will be willing to vote for their own resolution in the future."

7 GOP Senators Back War Debate (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Senate Republicans who earlier this week helped block deliberations on a resolution opposing President Bush's new troop deployments in Iraq changed course yesterday and vowed to use every tactic at their disposal to ensure a full and open debate.

In a letter distributed yesterday evening to Senate leaders, John W. Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.) and five other GOP supporters of the resolution threatened to attach their measure to any bill sent to the floor in the coming weeks. Noting that the war is the "most pressing issue of our time," the senators declared: "We will explore all of our options under the Senate procedures and practices to ensure a full and open debate."

The letter sent to Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) was not more specific about the Republican senators' strategy for reviving the war debate. But under the chamber's rules, senators have wide latitude in slowing the progress of legislation and in offering amendments, regardless of whether they have anything to do with the bill.

The letter began circulating yesterday evening after it became apparent the Senate was deadlocked over the war resolution and Reid was prepared to move on to other matters. McConnell and many in his party have aggressively defended their decision to block the bipartisan resolution as an issue of fairness because Democrats would not agree to GOP procedural demands.

But some Republicans were uneasy about appearing to have stymied the debate. The letter appeared so suddenly that, although it was addressed to Reid, the Democratic leader had not seen his copy before Warner read the text on the Senate floor.

"Monday's procedural vote should not be interpreted as any lessening of our resolve to go forward advocating the concepts" of the resolution, the letter said. "The current stalemate is unacceptable to us and to the people of this country."

House Democratic leaders are attempting to formulate their own nonbinding expression of disapproval of Bush's decision to send an additional 21,500 troops to battle, and they intend to devote three days next week to debating it.

A top Pentagon leader weighed in yesterday on the war debate and appeared to undercut the argument advanced by the White House and many GOP lawmakers that a congressional debate challenging the Bush plan would hurt troop morale.

"There's no doubt in my mind that the dialogue here in Washington strengthens our democracy. Period," Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified before the House Armed Services Committee. He added that potential enemies may take some comfort from the rancor but said they "don't have a clue how democracy works."

DOJ_NMG_0129288

Congress is grappling with several nonbinding resolutions, each of which addresses Bush's deployment plan, even as public support for the war declines and conditions on the ground grow increasingly perilous. The debate has particularly vexed Republicans, who are reluctant to abandon Bush at a critical moment but who also regard the party's defeat in the November midterm elections as a signal that voters want Congress to challenge White House war policy more aggressively.

The Senate was poised to debate a nonbinding resolution opposing the additional troop deployment and calling for a diplomatic initiative to settle the conflict in Iraq. Republicans refused to allow the resolution to reach the floor, relying on a standard procedural objection.

Five of the seven Senate signatories to yesterday's letter -- including Warner, the bipartisan resolution's chief author -- had voted Monday to block the debate. By showing party solidarity, they had hoped to pressure Democrats into allowing the consideration of other nonbinding measures, namely two that are more supportive of the administration's policy. But Democratic leaders refused to relent, and the long-awaited war debate -- or at least the opening chapter -- ended almost as soon as it began.

The Republican senators attempted in their letter to clear up the apparent contradiction. "Monday's procedural vote should not be interpreted as any lessening of our resolve to go forward," the senators insisted. But they voiced the GOP leadership's view that other resolutions should receive an equal vetting.

"The Senate should be allowed to work its will on our resolution as well as the concepts being brought forward by other senators," the letter stated.

The other Republican senators who signed the letter were Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, Norm Coleman (Minn.), Gordon Smith (Ore.), and George V. Voinovich (Ohio).

Democrats brushed off the Republicans' declaration as too little, too late. Reid spokesman Jim Manley said in a statement: "Senator Reid gave Senator Warner and the others a chance to vote for their own resolution on Monday, but only two of them chose to do so. Hopefully this letter signifies that the others have had a change of heart, and will be willing to vote for their own resolution in the future."

After reading the text on the Senate floor, Warner hurried back to his office, declining to answer questions. He would not specify whether he and his allies would seek to block specific bills, including a huge spending package that the Senate is expected to take up today, to fund government activities for the current fiscal year. Warner did indicate whether he will attempt to amend the funding package with his resolution.

In the letter, the senators said they will offer the resolution "where possible" on bills as they come before the Senate.

House Democrats had hoped for a large bipartisan Senate vote on Warner's resolution to create momentum in the House and to provide maximum pressure on Republicans to go along. But with the Senate at a standstill, House leaders are considering a straightforward resolution that opposes the troop increase, without the multiple provisions that complicated Warner's text. Senior House Democrats predicted that their measure will attract overwhelming party support and possibly as many as 30 GOP votes.

Warner Warns Of New Push On Iraq Resolution (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, February 8, 2007

An exasperated Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) put his colleagues on notice Wednesday that he would look to attach his resolution opposing President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq to any measure moving across the Senate floor.

In a letter to Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.), Warner called the current stalemate "unacceptable" and said he would look to attach the resolution opposing Bush's plan to any other measure considered by the Senate. He was joined on the letter by Republican Sens. Susan Collins (Maine), Gordon Smith (Ore.), George Voinovich (Ohio), Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

Warner's announcement followed a day of angry and increasingly partisan recriminations between Senate Democrats and Republicans over who was to blame for the collapse of a planned debate on Iraq.

Warner had joined McConnell, Lott and 44 other Republicans in filibustering his own resolution in an effort to pressure Reid into allowing a vote on a resolution sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) that would put Members on record as opposing cutting funds for the war. Although Smith, Snowe and Voinovich also voted for the filibuster, Collins and Coleman, both up for re-election next year, did not.

But in their letter, the Senators warn that, "Monday's procedural vote should not be interpreted as any lessening of our resolve to go forward advocating the concepts of [the Warner resolution. We will explore all of our options under the Senate procedures and practices to ensure a full and open debate on the Senate floor."

Senate Republicans have privately expressed concern with McConnell's handling of the Iraq situation thus far, worrying that continued public pressure from Democrats — who have successfully forced the GOP into appearing to defend Bush's policies — could further erode support and end the filibuster.

Republicans also have said they are concerned that Democrats and their allies already have begun using the issue against incumbents up in 2008. MoveOn.org this week unveiled a new ad targeting Republican incumbents who voted for the filibuster, while the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Wednesday circulated an e-mail criticizing Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) for backing the filibuster.

Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), who serves as chairman of the DSCC and Democratic Caucus vice chairman, said Wednesday that despite suggestions to the contrary, Democrats are not motivated in this debate by electoral gains in 2008. But he did acknowledge that he believes his party is winning the debate, and that the war in Iraq will continue to dog vulnerable Republicans seeking re-election.

Who Won In The Senate? (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Listening to Minority Leader Mitch McConnell boast last weekend that he had the votes to prevent closing off Senate debate on Iraq, Republicans opposing President Bush's troop surge feared the worst. The new Republican leader sounded as though he wanted to prevent passage of an anti-surge resolution at the cost of making his party look obstructionist. That's exactly what happened.

The result of McConnell's tactics is that no resolution will be passed by the Senate anytime soon. The White House was overjoyed. But Tuesday's headlines indicated a public relations fiasco for Republicans: " GOP Stalls Debate on Troop Increase" (The Post), " In Senate, GOP Blocks a Debate Over Iraq Policy" (New York Times), " Vote on Iraq is blocked by GOP" (USA Today). Considering that outcome after a tactical victory, the Republicans might have been better off with a strategic defeat. It is unclear who won in the Senate this week.

McConnell's maiden voyage as party floor leader showed that he may be too much into process. Seldom has the Republican case been presented more poorly than it was Monday. But in his first big test as majority leader, Sen. Harry Reid overreached while trying to control the action. The developments also showed less than full control of his own Democratic caucus.

From the start, there has been a clear Senate bipartisan majority opposed to the 21,500-troop reinforcement. But nothing is that simple in the U.S. Senate. On Jan. 24, Sen. Joseph Biden pushed a harshly worded resolution through the Foreign Relations Committee, largely on party lines. It was obvious that the resolution could not collect the 60 votes needed to cut off debate, a prerequisite in today's Senate.

The prestigious Republican Sen. John Warner drafted a more conciliatory anti-surge resolution, with substantial Democratic support. On Jan. 25, Warner wrote Biden to say that he would not negotiate. That left Reid the choice of pressuring Democratic defectors or embracing Warner. He took the latter course, after making cosmetic changes.

But the White House and McConnell lobbied against Warner and pushed a unique new approach: Republican Sen. Judd Gregg's resolution, which ignored the surge and said Congress "should not . . . endanger United States military forces in the field" by "elimination or reduction of funds." That is the funding question that most Democrats in Congress desperately want to avoid.

Next, Reid stretched his authority in a way that I have not seen in a half-century of Senate-watching. He decreed that, besides the Warner resolution (now co-sponsored by Sen. Carl Levin, his Democratic successor as Armed Services Committee chairman), the Senate would vote on one Republican resolution. What made this unique was that Reid dictated that it would be not Gregg's but Sen. John McCain's, which endorsed the surge and could not command close to 60 votes. The Gregg amendment probably would have gotten 70.

McConnell convinced Republicans that they could not let the Democratic leader pick their amendment. Reid got only 49 votes (including just two Republicans, Susan Collins and Norm Coleman) on Monday for imposing cloture. Warner and Sen. Chuck Hagel, the toughest Republican critic of the surge, voted no on cloture. The Democratic caucus informed Reid on Tuesday that it would not accept a compromise putting both the Warner and Gregg resolutions before the Senate. Reid set aside the issue rather than permit a vote that would divide and embarrass Democrats.

"Mitch McConnell is a master behind the scenes, but he has a lot to learn about going public," said a Senate Republican insider who did not want his name used. Appalled by the headlines, Republicans regrouped Tuesday by delivering a substantive message. McCain was particularly vigorous, antagonizing Reid and other Democrats by contending that anti-surge resolutions say to U.S. troops that "we think they are going to fail, and this is a vote of no confidence."

DOJ_NMG_0129290

Democratic senators, given their message of the day, trooped onto the Senate floor to claim that Republicans had blocked debate over Iraq. That claim might seem peculiar to C-SPAN watchers who listened to hours of debate this week over the war. The true Democratic complaint was that Republicans prevented Harry Reid from ordering the parameters of that debate. The minority in the Senate, unlike in the House, has rights it exercises, even if Republicans characteristically have trouble explaining this to the public.

Specter Wants Changes To Rules For Debate (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 8, 2007

Frustrated with Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) efforts to control floor debates, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said Wednesday he is drafting a rules change that would guarantee the minority the right to offer amendments to legislation on the Senate floor. Specter acknowledged that his proposal stands virtually no chance of achieving the two-thirds majority required to change Senate rules. But he said he wanted to bring attention to what he described as a growing problem with the way Reid is running the floor.

Specter said Democrats successfully have painted GOP Senators as opposed to debating a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's Iraq War policies because the American people do not understand that Republicans simply are trying to ensure that they are given ample opportunity to offer amendments during the debate.

"Democrats are winning the public relations battle," Specter said on the floor. "Most people think that what is going on, because we are opposing ending debate [on the Iraq resolution] ... that we do not want to have the debate. That we do not want to have a vote, and that is not factually correct. ... But it is my hope that there will yet be a recognition of really what is going on."

Indeed, Senate Republicans have been smarting this week following criticism — from Democrats and the media — of their decision to oppose Reid's efforts to begin debate on an Iraq resolution sponsored by Sens. John Warner (R-Va.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.). On Monday, all but two Republicans voted against closing debate, or invoking cloture, on Reid's motion to proceed to the Iraq resolution. Without agreement on a motion to proceed, the Senate cannot formally begin debating a measure.

"Sen. Warner voted against cloture, and he's the principal proponent of disagreeing with the president's [Iraq] plan," explained Specter. "Senators who are critics of the president's plan have voted against cutting off debate because it is a big issue that ought to be debated and because what is going on behind the scenes — under the surface — is an effort to have agreement on how many votes there will be to have a fair airing of the subject matter and to have an opportunity for Senators to vote on a variety of resolutions and amendments."

Specter said Reid's implicit threat to use a procedural tool known as "filling the amendment tree" on bills ranging from the Iraq resolution to the fiscal 2007 joint funding resolution is at the heart of Republican concerns over whether they will have the opportunity to offer alternative proposals. Filling the tree, a tool Senate Majority Leaders have often used by virtue of their right to be recognized first and offer amendments first on the Senate floor, precludes other Senators from offering amendments to bills.

"What is happening today is that the charges are being leveled on all sides — an awful lot of finger-pointing — with most of the Democrats saying the Republicans are obstructing a vote [on Iraq]," Specter said. "And Republicans are saying ... 'We are insisting on our right to debate the motion to proceed.'"

Specter acknowledged that most people, even some of his own staff, don't understand the procedural maneuvering that has gone into the Iraq debate.

"If you ask virtually anybody, 'What's filling the tree?' you'd think about an orchard," Specter said. "They're not going to think about Senate procedure."

When a Majority Leader uses his power to fill the amendment tree, he essentially brings up a bill, proposes a first-degree amendment that is virtually identical to the underlying bill and then proposes a second-degree amendment that also is virtually identical to the bill. Unless there is a vote on the amendments or the Majority Leader agrees to set the amendments aside, no other amendments can be brought forward.

Specter's proposal, which he said still was being developed, would prevent one political party from offering both a first-degree and second-degree amendment in rapid succession. If a first-degree amendment were pending, the only second-degree amendment that would be in order would be one offered by the opposing party.

Specter acknowledged that his plan could preclude Senators from making even routine technical changes to their own amendments, but he said that problem could be overcome by requesting unanimous consent to waive the rule.

Still, Specter apparently has reason to be pessimistic about his plan's chances. Senate Democrats largely laughed off the proposed rules change.

DOJ_NMG_0129291

Said one Senate Democratic aide, "As long as Sen. Specter is around, there's no threat to long-winded debate in the United States Senate."

Allied With Democrats, Lieberman Easily Aligns With Republicans (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 — It came as little surprise that when Senate Republicans blocked debate Monday on a resolution that would have opposed President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, erstwhile Democrat, sided with them.

But Mr. Lieberman also went further, accusing Democrats of giving strength to the enemy and abandoning the troops, and arguing that an alternative resolution that he and many Republicans backed was "a statement of support to our troops."

That was too much even for one Republican member, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, a sponsor of the bipartisan resolution against the president's policy.

"I forcefully argue that ours is in support of the troops," Mr. Warner said tersely. "And there is no suggestion that one is less patriotic than the other."

Defeated last year in the Democratic senatorial primary in Connecticut but then elected as an independent to a fourth term, Mr. Lieberman has kept a promise to caucus with the Democrats, giving them a majority of only 51 to 49 and earning for him a designation as "the most influential man in the Senate."

But on Iraq, the issue that made the last year the most difficult of his political life, he has moved farther and farther from the party, winding up to the right of many Republicans who now embrace what six months ago was almost solely a Democratic position on the war.

Mr. Lieberman's enthusiasm for the troop increase has become a talking point for Republicans trying to shore up support for the president's plan. It infuriates the bloggers who first tried to defeat him. Some of his best friends on either side of the aisle take issue with him publicly. But given his importance as the lawmaker who ensures Democratic control of the Senate, members of the majority say there is little they can do.

Joe Lieberman, independent, sees himself as Joe Lieberman unchained.

"I feel liberated, free somehow," he said during an interview in his office.

"As I look back," he said, "I have always tried to do what I thought was right, regardless of where a majority of members of my party are. But there's always pressure on you. I just feel free of that pressure. And I think my Democratic colleagues know that I'm not going to do — on this, of all questions which I think is so important to our country's future, to our success in the war on terrorism — I'm not going to do anything here just to be a good member of the team."

His forays across the aisle have begun to extend past the Iraq debate. When he was asked on Fox News recently which Democrat he would support in 2008, Mr. Lieberman, the party's vice-presidential nominee in 2000, offered instead that he might vote for a Republican.

"I would not have said that three years ago," Mr. Lieberman said. "No chance."

Even Democrats who have come to expect his siding with the president on the war thought this was going a bit far. "Did you see that?" one Democratic senator asked, incredulous. But he, like others, criticized only privately. "The bottom line," the senator said, "is we need him."

To those who supported Ned Lamont, the victor over Mr. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, this is an "I told you so" moment.

"He was re-elected because he fooled enough people into believing he really was against the war and not for an escalation, but I think this is his true colors," said David Sirota, a Lamont consultant who recalled that during the campaign, Mr. Lieberman said he wanted to bring the troops home "as fast as anyone."

"It's everything Ned Lamont was saying: that you can't listen to this guy's words, you have to watch his actions," Mr. Sirota said. "I think it shows a disdain for the public. It's like the public to him is just a nuisance, an obstacle for him doing what he wants to do."

Mr. Lieberman's talk of supporting a Republican in 2008, Mr. Sirota said, suggests that he is still toying with the idea of switching to the Senate Republican Caucus.

Mr. Lieberman could always prove to be an unpredictable ally for the Republicans, too, as when he suggested last Thursday a "war on terrorism tax" to make Americans understand the sacrifice that he said the fight demanded.

Still, Republicans have missed few opportunities to embrace his support. Mr. Bush said in a recent speech that he was acting on "the good advice of Senator Joe Lieberman" in proposing a bipartisan Congressional working group on Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0129292

(Democrats scoffed that the president had already had plenty of ways to consult with Congress and had never shown much interest in doing so.) The president and Vice President Dick Cheney also quote Mr. Lieberman in arguing the White House's view on the troop increase, and the Senate Republican leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, repeatedly notes how happy the minority is to have Mr. Lieberman's backing.

"I wish I were being quoted by some Democrats, too," Mr. Lieberman said.

But he does not seem very worried about appearing cozy with the other side. When one Republican, Senator John McCain of Arizona, squabbled with Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, at a hearing about the troop increase, Mr. Levin abruptly walked out. Mr. Lieberman walked over and chuckled with Mr. McCain, patting him on the back.

At hearings on Iraq, Mr. Lieberman frequently leads witnesses to testimony in support of the president. Isn't it true, he asked Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the departing commander of American forces there, that over all, the policy in Iraq has been a success? Doesn't Mr. Bush's strategy offer "a higher probability of working than any other plan?"

Such arguments have prompted friends like Senator Susan Collins, a Maine Republican who opposes the troop increase, to challenge him publicly. Still, Ms. Collins said in an interview, "the fact that he takes a position that's contrary to the vast majority of the members of his caucus I think speaks to his strong principles."

"I enjoy seeing him in this position of power, given the very difficult political year he's gone through," she said. "I think he's enjoying this."

The midterm election, Mr. Lieberman argues, was a call to bipartisanship, and his mandate is to get Democrats to look beyond party lines.

Yes, he concedes, the election was also a call for a change in Iraq; he just believes the president's plan offers the best chance of that.

"I'm a feisty, happy warrior," he said. "And I'm going to continue to fight for what I think is right for the security of our country."

House Leaders Move Toward Iraq Vote (LVS/AP)

By Anne Flaherty

Las Vegas Sun, February 8, 2007

House Democratic leaders coalesced Wednesday around a stripped-down measure that disapproves of President Bush's decision to send more forces to Iraq and declares support for the troops, according to party aides who said a vote was likely next week.

The vote would be the first on the House floor on the war since Democrats wrestled control of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections. The war, stretching nearly four years and killing more than 3,000 troops, has become widely unpopular among voters.

Democratic officials said they hoped for bipartisan support for the measure, and one Republican leader conceded some members of the GOP rank-and-file would likely break ranks.

"I don't think it'll be a pure party-line vote," said Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Democratic leaders met privately Wednesday to discuss the issue, and they intend to present their proposal to their own rank-and-file Thursday.

Leaders envision each House member getting a chance to speak for five minutes on the issue during a three-day debate. The proposal is expected to circumvent committee review.

Such a measure would indicate House leaders want their own approach to parting company with Bush on the war and are moving away from a version that stalled in the Senate.

That resolution, drafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., stated disagreement to Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. In a bid to attract more GOP support, Warner added a section promising to protect funding for troops in combat - a promise many House Democrats do not want to make.

"The president has left the Congress few alternatives other than to use the power of (the) purse spelled out in Article I, Section 9 of the U.S. Constitution to curtail U.S. military operations in Iraq," wrote California Democratic Reps. Lynn Woolsey and Barbara Lee on behalf of 71 members of the progressive congressional caucus, a liberal group.

Frustrated that Senate leaders could not agree on debate rules for his resolution, Warner and six other Republicans told the leaders in a letter Wednesday that "the current stalemate is unacceptable to us and to the people of this country."

Republicans, on a party-line vote, blocked debate on the resolution earlier this week.

"Despite what has happened earlier this week, we are not going away," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. Collins and Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., sided with Democrats in seeking to move ahead on the measure.

DOJ_NMG_0129293

Five other Republicans who oppose the troop increase and voted to bottle up the measure signed the letter. The five are Sens. Warner, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Olympia Snowe of Maine, Gordon Smith of Oregon and George Voinovich of Ohio.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he hoped the letter signified that the five Republicans "have had a change of heart and will be willing to vote for their own resolution in the future."

As the House moved toward a vote, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told lawmakers they did not think debate in Congress would hurt the morale of troops in combat.

Less than two weeks ago, Gates said a congressional resolution opposing the Iraq strategy undercuts U.S. commanders in Iraq and "emboldens the enemy."

"As long as this Congress continues to do what it has done, which is to provide the resources for the mission, the dialogue will be the dialogue, and the troops will feel supported," Pace told the House Armed Services Committee.

Gates said troops understand members of Congress want to find the best way to win the war. "I think they're sophisticated enough to understand that that's what the debate's really about," he said.

Senate Democrats, outmaneuvered in their efforts to get a vote on a resolution opposing Bush's troop buildup, said they will now try to put pressure on Bush by amending legislation that is likely to reach his desk, daring him to veto.

Reid is expected to meet with Democrats to hash out what amendments to offer to upcoming legislation. The next bill that could serve as a vehicle for Iraq measures is legislation adopting recommendations from the 9-11 Commission.

Finding proposals that have broad Democratic appeal is a different challenge for Reid. Various Senate Democrats have proposed cutting off funding for the new troops, setting a cap on the U.S. military presence in Iraq, and setting a timeline for withdrawal. None have unanimous support within the Democratic caucus.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the House Foreign Affairs Committee that 350 civilians were being recruited for an expansion in reconstruction programs. She said these included engineers, legal experts and soil specialists.

David Satterfield, her senior adviser on Iraq, told reporters that 129 U.S. military reservists would be sent to Iraq for six to nine months along with 19 additional foreign service officers to work on new projects. The reservists would be replaced by contractors after Congress provides the funds needed to hire them, he said.

Democrats Weigh Goals For Resolution On Iraq Policy (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — For more than a year, Rep. Howard Coble, a conservative Republican from North Carolina, has been an outspoken critic of the Iraq war. Even so, he's waiting for specifics before he decides whether he'll back a House resolution opposing President Bush's plans to send more troops to Baghdad.

"His concern is that it's going to turn into an anti-Bush resolution," said Ed McDonald, Coble's chief of staff. "It if turns into Bush-bashing, he may vote against it."

Coble, who urged the president in a Jan. 4 letter not to send more troops to Iraq, represents the dilemma facing House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and other Democratic leaders as they draft the measure that the House is set to debate next week.

There's little doubt about the outcome when the resolution comes up for a vote, which Democrats say could come next Thursday. "It will be virtually impossible for us to defeat it," conceded Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida, the chairman of the House Republican Conference.

The question is how broad a bipartisan majority the resolution will attract. "It totally depends on what the language is," said Putnam, who backs the president's plan.

Democrats have differences of opinion, too. On Tuesday night, senior House Democrats were huddling in an attempt to come up with wording measured enough to attract Republicans such as Coble, but also tough enough to satisfy Democrats who want to issue more than a symbolic protest.

"I came here to do something that really matters," said Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., a member of the Armed Services Committee. "Put members on the spot. Those kids in Iraq are sure on the spot."

Appearing Wednesday with Iraq veterans opposed to the war, Pelosi said the resolution "will have clarity, and it will have concision," but declined to say whether she'd give more weight to making a stronger statement or attracting bipartisan support.

House Democratic leaders had been looking to their Senate colleagues to help them avoid walking such a legislative tightrope by passing a resolution of disapproval drafted by a bipartisan group of senators. Its sponsors included Virginia's John Warner, a senior Republican with credentials likely to attract other members of his party with concerns about the war. That Senate resolution remained tied in procedural knots Wednesday.

However, Warner announced that he intends to resurrect his resolution, blocked this week when most Republican senators — including Warner — voted with Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., against allowing a vote.

Warner and six other Republicans indicated they may change their position in a letter to McConnell and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. The senators urged the debate to begin. "The current stalemate is unacceptable to us," they wrote. Besides Warner, those signing the letter were Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, George Voinovich of Ohio and Gordon Smith of Oregon.

House Sets Path For Iraq Vote, But Must Decide What To Say (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — As the House prepares for three days of debate next week on Iraq, Democratic leaders sought Wednesday to reconcile deep differences within the party in order to shape a symbolic resolution denouncing President Bush's troop buildup plan.

Seventy-one Democratic representatives signed a statement urging Congress to take a stronger stance against the war, including setting a six-month timetable for withdrawing American forces from Iraq.

Democratic leaders have said that they favor a nonbinding resolution simply requiring lawmakers to support or reject the president's policy.

Representative Dennis Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio, expressed the view of those pushing for a weightier resolution, saying, "The nonbinding resolution is like putting your foot on the brake for a moment and a few weeks later, putting your foot on the accelerator." He added: "Congress has a chance to do something real on the war. A nonbinding resolution just doesn't cut it."

In the Senate, an impasse over the Iraq debate intensified as Democrats and Republicans spent the day heaping blame upon one another for failing to agree on how to proceed with an Iraq resolution of their own. But on Wednesday evening, seven Republican senators sent a sharply worded letter to their leaders pressing to resolve the delay, saying: "The current stalemate is unacceptable to us and to the people of this country."

Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican who led the bipartisan resolution against the president's troop buildup plan, went to the Senate floor on Wednesday to read the letter only two days after siding with Republican leaders on a vote that blocked the debate. He declined to specify what he and the other Republicans intended to do but suggested they would make procedural trouble until the bipartisan Iraq resolution received a full hearing.

Mr. Warner was among the handful of Republican senators who have come under intense criticism for playing a role in this week's standoff, even though he wrote the resolution to rebuke the White House over its plan to send more troops to Baghdad.

Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who has been the loudest Republican critic of the president's Iraq policy, also signed the letter after his vote contributed to a delay of the Iraq debate. "People of this country look at us and shake their heads in disgust," he said in an interview Wednesday evening. "The message we're sending to the American people is that we don't have time, we're not mature enough to find a way to deal with the most important issue of our time."

The other Republican senators signing the letter were: Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine; Gordon Smith of Oregon; Norm Coleman of Minnesota; and George V. Voinovich of Ohio.

Of that seven, only Ms. Collins and Mr. Coleman broke ranks with Republican leaders and joined Democrats in voting for the debate over the Iraq resolution to proceed.

Senate Democrats, whose plan to debate the Iraq resolution this week was stymied by the Republican minority, said they planned to move on and express their opposition to the president's troop buildup in other pieces of pending legislation.

A spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, dismissed the message of the letter and said Mr. Warner and the other Republican senators had missed their chance for a full debate on their resolutions.

"Hopefully this letter signifies that the others have had a change of heart and will be willing to vote for their own resolution in the future," said the spokesman, Jim Manley.

Frustrated by the impasse in the Senate, the House is gearing up for a full-fledged debate beginning Tuesday, leading up to the first Iraq-related vote since Democrats won control of Congress in November. Each representative will be allowed five minutes to speak before voting on a resolution devised to send a bipartisan message to the White House opposing the plan to expand the military operation in Iraq.

It remained an open question, though, if House Democratic leaders could keep the debate from fracturing along ideological lines within the party. Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a Democrat of California, has been meeting one on one with lawmakers in her party, urging them to support the bipartisan resolution as a first step.

DOJ_NMG_0129295

House Democrats will meet behind closed doors Thursday in an attempt to agree on language of the Iraq resolution to be debated next week. While many Democrats want to push legislation aimed at blocking financing for the war, a plan that has emerged among the leadership is simply to have representatives cast a vote to support or reject the president's plan.

"If you want to vote for the escalation, you can vote yes," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the House Democratic caucus. "If you want to vote against the escalation, you can vote no."

Dems Seek Clean Iraq Resolution (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 8, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said yesterday that they intend to pass a clean and simple resolution opposing President Bush's troop surge while supporting the soldiers in Iraq.

Pelosi, Hoyer, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and several other senior Democrats yesterday told officials with VoteVets.org, a pressure group of Iraq war veterans opposed to Bush's strategy, that they would prefer to pass a resolution that is "as clean and straightforward as possible," sources in the room said.

The leaders stressed that they did not have complete control over the final version of the legislation because the House Armed Services and International Relations committees would draft the legislation, and other members would give their input as well.

At the same event, Pelosi told reporters that a measure condemning the president's plan to "escalate" the war in Iraq while expressing support for U.S. troops would be Congress's first step in reasserting its role in conducting the war in Iraq.

House Democrats will convene today so that House leaders have a chance to explain what they want to accomplish with the resolution. Their goal is to reassure the more liberal members of the caucus that this is just a "first bite at the apple," and that they will have more chances in the coming weeks and months to force Bush to change course in Iraq, said a senior Democratic leadership aide.

Democrats had wanted to advance the Iraq discussion further on Tuesday, when they gathered for their weekly meeting, but it was cut short because Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) made an appearance to talk about Hurricane Katrina.

For her part, Pelosi expressed confidence there already is strong bipartisan disapproval of the surge, adding that there also would have been "strong support" for the resolution introduced by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) had it passed the Senate.

Just last week, House leaders indicated that they were leaning toward consideration of something like the Warner measure, which disapproved of the troop surge and included some proposals of the Iraq Study Group's report. House Democratic leaders had wanted the Senate to move first to pass a resolution. But Senate Republicans stymied further debate with procedural objections.

Hoyer said Tuesday that the House would allow three days of debate next week, and that the resolution would not be open to amendments. And House Democratic aides are more confident that action in the House will spur the Senate to finish its debate on Iraq. One top Democratic aide said that Democrats could pass a resolution that called for a cap in the number of troops and funding, if they wanted.

There are more than 16 resolutions expressing some form of objection to the Iraq war floating in the House.

The Progressive Caucus, a group of 71 liberal Democrats, has issued a position on Iraq that is in line with the ideas floated by House Democratic leaders. They favor withdrawing troops in six months without cutting off funding, but they would like to have binding votes to stop Bush from increasing troop levels in Iraq.

Meanwhile, the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of more than 40 conservative Democrats, has demanded that the resolution include measures calling for more oversight on reconstruction spending.

Gates Considers Alternatives For Iraq (LVS/AP)

By Anne Flaherty

Las Vegas Sun, February 8, 2007

0205dv-iraq-resolution Defense Secretary Robert Gates told a House panel Wednesday that the U.S. should know in a few months if the Iraqi government is making progress toward peace and whether the United States "is going to have to look at other alternatives and consequences."

In stark contrast to predecessor Donald H. Rumsfeld, Gates also said there was no doubt the Army and Marine Corps needed to be larger if they are to deal with future wars and give troops enough rest between combat tours.

"We need the full range of military capabilities," including ground combat forces to battle large armies and nimble special operations troops to scout out terrorist threats, Gates told the House Armed Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0129296

"We don't know what's going to develop in places like Russia and China, in North Korea, in Iran and elsewhere," he said.

Gates testified alongside Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as the House was gearing up for its first full-fledged debate on the Iraq war since the Nov. 7 elections. House Democrats plan next week to bring to the floor a measure that would flatly oppose President Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Gates had said Tuesday that U.S. forces might be able to start leaving Iraq before the end of the year, if daunting conditions including subdued violence and political reconciliation are met.

Democrats and several Republicans say they oppose the troop buildup and that it is time the Iraqi government stepped up to defend its own country.

Tired of waiting for an opportunity to try to stop the war in Iraq, some Democrats say they want to use legislation approving billions of dollars in war spending to insist that Bush not send more troops or bring troops home by a certain date.

"The longer we delay taking action, the greater the failure in Iraq and the larger the cost in American blood and treasure," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., who supports legislation that would cap the number of troops allowed in Iraq.

Sen. Barack Obama said he would push his legislation ordering troops out of Iraq by March 2008.

"This is not a symbolic vote," Obama, D-Ill., said of his proposal, which is backed by two House Democrats. "This is what I think has the best chance of bringing our troops home."

Sen. John Kerry, who drafted a similar proposal, said Congress' actions will be watched carefully by voters headed to the polls in 2008.

"If the Congress is going to procrastinate, if they refuse to debate the most important issue of our time ... then that is going to be clear issue in the context of '08," said Kerry, D-Mass.

Democratic leaders in both the House and Senate have pledged to their rank-and-file that a vote on a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup would merely be the first attempt to pressure Bush to shift course in the war. Other legislation will be binding, they said.

Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., told reporters he hoped the measure in the House would attract Republican support.

Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, his party's House leader, said in an interview that he hoped the GOP would be permitted to seek a vote on an alternative. If so, he said it would call for a bipartisan committee to oversee the war effort, and lay out a series of benchmarks by which people could judge whether the Iraqi government was living up to its commitments to help quell the violence.

"If you're not for victory in Iraq, you're for failure," Boehner said. "The consequences of failure are immense. I think it destabilizes the entire Middle East, encourages Iran and on top of that it's pretty clear that the terrorists will just follow us home."

War Foes Will Not Hurt Morale (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

The Defense Department's top civilian and its top military officer, undercutting the White House and other senior Republicans yesterday, said Congress doesn't endanger troop morale by voting on nonbinding resolutions opposing President Bush's Iraq reinforcement plan.

"From the standpoint of the troops, I believe that they understand how our legislature works and that they understand that there's going to be this kind of debate," said Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, effectively taking out of play an argument that had been made by Mr. Bush's spokesman and other top Republicans, who had warned resolutions disagreeing with the troop increase plan would send bad signals.

Joining Gen. Pace in testifying to the House Armed Services Committee, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said the troops are "sophisticated enough to understand" that the debate is about a way to move forward in Iraq.

But Gen. Pace said that would all change if today's nonbinding resolutions turned into moves to cut off funding for the war effort -- something some Democrats have proposed.

"They're going to be looking to see whether or not they are supported in the realm of mission given and resources provided," the Marine general said. "As long as this Congress continues to do what it has done, which is to provide the resources for the mission, the dialogue will be the dialogue, and the troops will feel supported."

The two men's comments are in stark contrast to arguments made by Republicans, including the president's spokesman, Tony Snow, that a debate on resolutions could have an effect on the troops.

"Think about what message resolutions would send," Mr. Snow said last month, adding that while he wouldn't judge the effects himself, "It is a question that those who are talking about these resolutions will have to answer to themselves and to the public."

DOJ_NMG_0129297

Arizona Sens. Jon Kyl and John McCain and Utah Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, all Republicans, have raised similar questions -- just yesterday, in the case of Mr. Hatch.

"Our political will is directly related to the morale of our troops," he said on the Senate floor. "Those who seek to, for rhetorical purposes only, assert their support of the troops while communicating their opposition to their mission cannot sever this natural connection between political will and morale."

Mr. McCain last month raised the question about resolutions and morale with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, during a Senate hearing.

"It would not be a beneficial effect," answered Gen. Petraeus.

The division over U.S. troop morale aside, Mr. Gates, Gen. Pace and others all agreed that the debate could send wrong signals to al Qaeda and other enemies the United States is fighting.

The House will begin debating an anti-reinforcements resolution next week, with Democratic leaders hoping to succeed where the Senate failed.

Senate Republicans on Monday foiled that chamber's debate by using procedural means to block a final vote on a resolution that would have said the Senate "disagrees" with the plan to increase troops, but backs Mr. Bush's view that victory in Iraq is a critical objective.

Mr. Bush last month said he would send about 17,500 more soldiers to Baghdad to try to counter Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian violence that threatens Iraq's fledgling government, and deploy an additional 4,000 Marines to Anbar province to combat al Qaeda fighters making a stand there.

The president has claimed the authority as commander in chief to proceed.

Democrats who oppose the troop increase were left with few alternatives: rescind the authorization to go to war, cut off funding for troops, or pass a nonbinding resolution that has no effect but lets members vent their feelings on the way the war is going.

"We have a house that's burning, and we're putting gasoline on it by sending more troops to Iraq when what we need to be doing is trying to put out that fire," Rep. Hank Johnson, Georgia Democrat, told Gen. Pace and Mr. Gates yesterday. "I think that's what the American people want to hear."

Veterans Group Speaks Out On War (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

When Iraq war veteran Jon Soltz accused Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) of "aiding the enemy," the Democratic senators gathered around him yesterday did not wince. Nor did Democrats object when Soltz, the chairman of a group called VoteVets.org, called President Bush and Vice President Cheney "draft dodgers."

In the United States Congress, where decorum usually holds sway, Soltz and his small band of veterans are saying things many Democrats would like to express but can't. And as the politics heat up over the Iraq war, Democratic leaders increasingly are being drawn to Soltz and his angry soldiers.

VoteVets.org appears to be the most active group trying to influence the debate about the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Last month, it dispatched veterans to the home states of Republican senators waffling over resolutions on the war. Next, it ran a stark television ad on Super Bowl Sunday that drew national attention. And this week, group members crisscrossed Capitol Hill, trying to persuade lawmakers and their staffs to oppose the troop increase.

Their efforts are supported by a coalition of liberal groups that blocked the president's 2005 plan to privatize Social Security. But this new campaign could prove more difficult.

The veterans are selling a blunt message: The Bush strategy in Iraq is a failure, and adding troops sends more young men and women to their deaths. If you care about the military, they told lawmakers, vote against the troop increase. Legislators who are stalling debate on the matter are "cowards," they said.

This week marked their third pilgrimage to the Capitol. They met privately with the staffs of 11 senators, mostly Republicans. They talked strategy behind closed doors with the Democrats who run the House and then held a media event with those leaders, including Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who praised them for speaking out.

Soltz, the group's intense 29-year-old co-founder who served in Iraq in 2003, displayed a fiery impatience with the procedural morass that has paralyzed the Senate. "I don't need some fancy Senate talk about why they can't vote," he said in an interview. "We just want a vote. We need a vote that tells the president that his strategy is not working."

DOJ_NMG_0129298

In several news conferences, Soltz accused McConnell of "aiding the enemy" by allowing the Bush administration to build up troops in Iraq at the expense of the hunt for Osama bin Laden. "We are not fighting the war on terrorism, we are in the middle of a civil war," he said, referring to Iraq. "Meanwhile, the guy who attacked this country on 9/11 is living in a cave in Afghanistan."

Soltz called Cheney a "draft dodger," repeating charges he made last month when he disparaged a "president who frankly knows nothing of war and a vice president who knows even less." He said: "Senators on the fence have a choice. They can stand with veterans like us, or they can stand with the draft dodgers down the road."

Democrats said they will not muzzle the veterans. In many ways, the former soldiers and Marines are expressing sentiments the lawmakers want broadcast, and they help inoculate Democrats against Republican claims that opposing the president's plan undermines the troops.

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who appeared with four veterans yesterday morning, said he saw parallels between VoteVets.org and Vietnam Veterans Against the War, the group of protesters he led during Vietnam. He said he recognized the anger he saw in Soltz. "When you come back from fighting the enemy, you are passionate and feel very strongly about duty," Kerry said. "Each one of these folks has earned the right to express their thoughts. Their words ought to stand for themselves. That's exactly how they feel and people ought to listen to them."

In the office of Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.), the chief of staff and several aides listened with rapt attention Tuesday as Brian Van Riper, a 25-year-old former Marine machine gunner, told how he struggled with creeping doubts during his Iraq tour that peaked when he met a 12-year-old Iraqi girl with a scarred face and missing leg. She was a casualty of the initial air bombing of Baghdad, Van Riper said. "That night, I felt a tear down my eye," he said.

Soltz, Van Riper and the others got polite if reserved receptions from Republicans, with one exception. The veterans said they stormed out of a Tuesday meeting with Sen. Larry E. Craig's chief of staff. "He was almost dismissive in his tone," said Joe Kramer, 31, who was in the light infantry in Iraq. "We agreed to disagree. Very loudly."

Dan Whiting, a spokesman for Craig, would say only that the Idaho Republican's chief of staff, Mike Ware, sees things differently.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a decorated Vietnam veteran and likely presidential candidate who supports the addition of troops, dismissed VoteVets.org as a "handful of veterans" not representative of the military.

VoteVets.org has 20,000 members, including 1,000 veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan, said spokesman Eric Schmeltzer. The PAC is part of a coalition of left-leaning groups organized by Americans United for Change that includes labor unions and liberal groups such as MoveOn.org.

The veterans group raised just over $1.3 million in the last election cycle. Some of that money came in large doses, from Wall Street and Hollywood sources. Lynne Wasserman, daughter of the late Hollywood mogul Lew Wasserman, shelled out $25,000. Hedge fund owner Kevin Toner, a generous Democratic contributor, gave $25,000, as did Brian Snyder, another New York investor. Other donors include Phil Donahue, Democratic doyenne Beth Dozoretz, TV producer Norman Lear and architect Frank Gehry. At least $20,000 has come from organized labor and another $5,000 came from Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid's (D-Nev.) Searchlight Leadership Fund. But most donations have been $1,000 or less.

Soltz said the group is pro-military and not a front for the Democrats. "I'm a conservative," said Soltz, who volunteered on Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign. "I don't think 20,000 more troops is Democratic, I don't think 20,000 troops is Republican. I think it's stupid."

Hillary On Iraq (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

One pleasant surprise of Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as New York Senator has been her tough-minded approach on national security. She responded to 9/11 by supporting President Bush's strategy of taking on not just terrorists but the states that harbor them. She also voted for the war in Iraq and has refused to follow much of her party in alleging that Mr. Bush "lied" about weapons of mass destruction.

But as Mrs. Clinton bids to win the Democratic Presidential nomination, she is taking a marked turn to the left. Pressured by other candidates and by her party's left wing, she is walking back her hawkish statements and is now all but part of the antiwar camp. The polls show her to be the favorite to be the next Commander in Chief, so what she really believes, and how firmly she'll stick to it, deserves to be debated. Here's a summary of the arc of Mrs. Clinton's public thinking on Iraq:

- October 10, 2002. Mrs. Clinton addresses the Senate on the use-of-force resolution. "The facts that have brought us to this fateful vote are not in doubt," she declares, citing Saddam's record of using chemical weapons, the invasion of Kuwait, and his history of deceiving U.N. weapons inspectors. "As a result, President Clinton, with the British and others, ordered an intensive four-day air assault, Operation Desert Fox, on known and suspected weapons of mass destruction sites and other military targets," she continues, adding that Saddam "has also given aid, comfort, and sanctuary to terrorists, including al Qaeda members."

While she expresses her preference for working through the U.N. if possible, she adds, "I believe the authority to use force to enforce that mandate is inherent in the original 1991 U.N. resolution, as President Clinton recognized when he launched Operation Desert Fox in 1998."

- December 15, 2003. It is clear by now that no large stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction will be found in Iraq. But Mrs. Clinton tells the Council on Foreign Relations that "Yesterday was a good day. I was thrilled that Saddam Hussein had finally been captured. . . . We owe a great debt of gratitude to our troops, to the President, to our intelligence services, to all who had a hand in apprehending Saddam. Now he will be brought to justice."

She adds, "I was one who supported giving President Bush the authority, if necessary, to use force against Saddam Hussein. I believe that that was the right vote." As for Iraq's prospects, she declares herself "a little optimistic and a little pessimistic . . . We have no option but to stay involved and committed."

- April 20, 2004. Mrs. Clinton tells Larry King: "I don't regret giving the President the authority because at the time it was in the context of weapons of mass destruction, grave threats to the United States, and clearly, Saddam Hussein had been a real problem for the international community for more than a decade." Asked whether she thinks she was "fooled," she replies: "The consensus was the same, from the Clinton Administration to the Bush Administration. It was the same intelligence belief that our allies and friends around the world shared about the weapons of mass destruction."

- October 2005. Antiwar fervor on the left is picking up, and activist Cindy Sheehan compares her to Rush Limbaugh after Mrs. Clinton tells the Village Voice: "My bottom line is that I don't want their sons to die in vain . . . I don't believe it's smart to set a date for withdrawal . . . I don't think it's the right time to withdraw."

- November 2005. Mrs. Clinton posts a letter to constituents that marks her first dovish turn. "If Congress had been asked [to authorize the war], based on what we know now, we never would have agreed," she writes. But invoking retired General Eric Shinseki's estimate of more American troops necessary to pacify Iraq, she demands not withdrawal but a new plan: "It is time for the President to stop serving up platitudes and present us with a plan for finishing this war with success and honor -- not a rigid timetable that terrorists can exploit, but a public plan for winning and concluding the war."

- August 3, 2006. Mrs. Clinton calls for Donald Rumsfeld to resign as Defense Secretary, asking for "new leadership that would give us a fighting chance to turn the situation around before it's too late."

- December 18, 2006. Her march left gains speed. On NBC's "Today" show, Mrs. Clinton renounces her war vote unequivocally for the first time: "I certainly wouldn't have voted that way."

- January 13, 2007. From Baghdad, Mrs. Clinton responds to Mr. Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq to secure Baghdad: "I don't know that the American people or the Congress at this point believe this mission can work. And in the absence of a commitment that is backed up by actions from the Iraqi government, why should we believe it?"

- January 17, 2007. Mrs. Clinton calls for capping the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, saying she will introduce legislation to do so. And while she says she won't block money for the troops, she suggests withholding funds for the Iraqi government. It is precisely such a funds cut-off to the South Vietnamese government in 1975 that led to the final U.S. flight from Saigon.

- January 27, 2007. On the campaign trail in Iowa, Mrs. Clinton demands that President Bush "extricate our country from this before he leaves office." And she promises that, if elected, she will end the war quickly.

All politicians change their minds about something at some point, but what's troubling about Mrs. Clinton's record on Iraq is that it tends to follow, rather than lead, public opinion. When the war was first debated, and she couldn't easily walk away from her husband's record against Saddam, she was a solid, even eloquent, hawk. Then for a time she laid low and avoided the antiwar excesses of John Kerry and others.

But now that the war has proven to be difficult, and her fellow Democrats are outflanking her on the antiwar left, she is steadily, even rapidly, moving in their direction. So in the space of merely 14 months and as the Presidential campaign begins in earnest, Mrs. Clinton has gone from advocating a new plan to "win" the Iraq war, with "honor," to vocally opposing President Bush's new strategy to try to do precisely that. And, oh, yes, she now wants the "surge" to be in Afghanistan instead of Iraq.

The question we'd ask is whether this is the kind of stalwart drift that Mrs. Clinton would bring to the Oval Office?

Private Virtue, Public Vice (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129300

Deep in the bowels of Washington, hidden from public scrutiny and prying cameras, there is an illicit underworld where people are subtle, reasonable and interesting. I have occasionally been admitted to this place, the land of RIP (Reasonable in Private).

I have been in the Senate dining room and heard senators, in whispers and with furtive glances, acknowledge the weaknesses in their own arguments and admit the justice of some of the other side's points. I have seen politicians fess up to their own evasions and acknowledge the trade-offs inevitable in tough decisions.

I have always felt honored when politicians admit me into the realm of RIP, because if it ever got out that these pols were sensible and independent, it would ruin their careers. If it ever got out that they could think for themselves or often had subversive and honest thoughts, they would be branded traitors to their party and uncertain champions for their cause.

For politicians are not permitted to ply their trade in the land of RIP. In our democracy, all public business must be done in the land of SIPB (Self-Important Pathetic Blowhards).

In our democracy, everybody has to line up in party formation for each week's mighty clash, no matter how stupid they think the exercise may be.

In our democracy, lawmakers are compelled to spend their days maneuvering for trivial advantages that nobody will remember by dinnertime.

In our democracy, presidential aspirants spend a few months fighting a general election but two years positioning themselves for the primaries. That means they spend the bulk of their time in transcontinental cattle calls, competing to most assiduously flatter the prejudices of their most febrile supporters. They traffic in pre-approved bromides while searching with their hyperattenuated antennas for their party's maximum sweet spot of approval, love and applause.

In our democracy, top officials lead frantic, overscheduled lives, with almost no time alone and with major decisions made by instinct during rushed limo rides from one forgettable event to another. They spend their days talking, and pretty soon they become human jukeboxes — their snippets of conversation are just chunks of oft-repeated material they have retrieved from the stump speech audio collection in their heads.

In short, our democracy, at least as it has evolved, takes individuals who are reasonable in private and it churns them through a public process that is almost tailor-made to undermine their virtues. The process of perpetually kissing up to the voters destroys the leadership qualities the voters are looking for in the first place: tranquillity of spirit, independence of mind and a sensitivity to the contours and complexity of reality.

The best politicians try to build a fortress around their private lives to protect themselves from the ravages of the process all around them. They try to separate their real belief from their public spin. They stage little rebellions against members of their political base, who would otherwise be their slavemasters. They try not to let the bloated public persona smother the little voice within.

But this week it has become clear what an uphill struggle that is. This week, everyone senses that we have reached a crucial juncture in the Iraq war debate. This week, in private, everyone acknowledges how complex the choices are. Everyone senses that the policy being promoted possibly won't work and could have ruinous consequences. This week, the mood — in private — is sober and anxious.

And yet the politicians have completely failed to institutionalize that sense of sobriety in the public sphere. Instead of having a serious debate, the Senate disgraced itself with mind-bendingly petty partisanship. Meanwhile, the Democratic presidential candidates engaged in an unholy bidding war to get out of Iraq soonest, which had nothing to do with realities in Iraq and everything to do with applause lines in Iowa.

In a week when the private mood was grave, the public action was partisan and shortsighted. Instead of trying to educate public opinion by stressing the realities described in the National Intelligence Estimate, the political class, by and large, publicly ignored those findings. The Republicans maintained near lock-step solidarity even though privately, Republican opinions are all over the place. The Democrats ignored the intelligence community's warning about withdrawal after spending three years blasting the Bush administration for ignoring intelligence.

In private, we have a decent leadership class. In public, it's rotten.

Iraq Security Plan Underway; Crash Of Marine Copter Kills 7 (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 7 -- On the day the U.S. military announced that American and Iraqi forces had begun implementing their long-awaited security plan, a U.S. Marine transport helicopter crashed northwest of Baghdad, the fifth deadly loss of an American helicopter in Iraq in less than three weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0129301

Military officials said all seven crew members and passengers were killed in the crash of the CH-46 Sea Knight on Wednesday in Anbar province. The cause remains under investigation, but officials said the aircraft was having mechanical problems before it went down. The four other helicopters in recent crashes were shot down, the military acknowledged this week.

The U.S. military's chief spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that U.S. and Iraqi forces had begun a joint effort to secure Baghdad and troubled Anbar province.

"The plan is being fully implemented as we speak," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters after being asked when the plan would start. "Not all aspects are in place at this point."

The plan is being led by Iraqi officials and is designed to stop violence in the capital's volatile neighborhoods, Caldwell said. Officials have established nine new security districts in Baghdad and are creating dozens of security stations that Iraqi police and military officers will share with U.S. military personnel.

"The key difference is, this time it's an Iraqi-led plan," Caldwell said. "Not only are they planning it, they are leading."

The announcement was something of a surprise, because officials had lately issued contradictory and vague messages about the scope and timing of the plan. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Tuesday urged his generals to move more quickly to get the plan off the ground.

"We will prove at the start of the Baghdad security plan that the Iraqi army and police can play an effective, courageous role," Maliki told the generals in a televised speech. "We will also disprove to the world that the Iraqi army relies on others and is not qualified to shoulder the responsibility."

Caldwell praised Maliki's leadership and what he described as the prime minister's commitment to keep political and sectarian differences from hindering the plan. Iraqi political leaders, many of whom draw some of their political strength from militias and insurgents, have in the past sought to influence military operations to protect militant groups loyal to them. Caldwell said that Maliki, who has been accused of protecting the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite Muslim militia, is urging his generals to resist such meddling.

"He doesn't want politicians calling and interfering with their mission," Caldwell said.

The rollout of the security plan comes as bombings and other acts of violence, much of it driven by sectarian fighting, continue in the capital.

"We are in a tough, tough situation," Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih said in an interview Wednesday. He said the full implementation of the plan will take time because it involves "the mobilization of a lot of resources and assets, and the hope is that it will lead to a noticeable change in the security in Baghdad."

Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said Wednesday that investigators were questioning four members of the Iraqi armed forces detained Sunday after other members of their group kidnapped an Iranian diplomat in Baghdad. He said the government is pursuing "strong leads" in the abduction.

"There is confusion as to their affiliation" within the armed forces, Zebari said. Iranian officials have alleged that the U.S. government was responsible for the kidnapping, which U.S. officials deny. There has been no further information on the fate of the diplomat.

Two U.S. military officials familiar with the latest helicopter crash investigation said the Marine aircraft apparently experienced equipment malfunction before crashing Wednesday morning. The troops aboard were on a routine mission, the officials said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is underway.

A shop owner who works near the crash site in Garma, an area of orchards in Anbar province, said insurgents with machine guns drove by his store at approximately 10:30 a.m. claiming to have downed the aircraft.

"They told us, 'We just downed a helicopter,' " said Abu Anas, 30, who declined to give his full name. "When we went up to the roof, we saw big black smoke going up into the sky and an unbelievable fire. I have never seen such a fire."

The Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni Muslim insurgent group, asserted responsibility for downing the helicopter in a statement posted on a Web site used by insurgents. The authenticity of the claim could not be verified.

One of the military officials familiar with the investigations of the five helicopter crashes said Wednesday that while none of the probes is complete, officials have identified common characteristics. The four before Wednesday's crash took place in the most heavily traveled air corridor in Iraq, where insurgents have been able to study flight patterns and techniques. One helicopter was being operated by the contracting firm Blackwater USA.

"The enemy in that area is smart and attuned to the air traffic and the fact that there's a big media splash when one goes down," the military official said. "The enemy has been concentrating on these more known routes in an attempt to interdict us. We are looking at ways now to ensure that the helicopter routes are more varied and more circuitous, and flying in a tactical manner to lessen the possibility of these types of tragedies."

Overall, the recent crashes do not present a significant strain on U.S. helicopter capabilities in the region, because there are hundreds of helicopters flying thousands of missions a month in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Brookings Institution has counted 56 downed U.S. military helicopters in Iraq since May 2003 and says enemy fire was responsible for about half of the crashes.

The CH-46, a Vietnam-era aircraft, is one of the oldest in the U.S. military's fleet.

Nearly 5,000 U.S. helicopters were lost in Vietnam -- about 2,075 were shot down and 2,560 were lost in accidents and mechanical malfunctions -- according to "The Vietnam War Almanac" by Harry G. Summers Jr., who served as an Army colonel.

Also Wednesday, the U.S. military said a Marine was killed Tuesday in fighting in Anbar province.

Subject: A case study of how the U.S. got bogged down in Iraq.

Problem: If a cop in Anytown, USA, pulls over a suspect, he checks the person's ID remotely from the squad car. He's linked to databases filled with Who's Who in the world of crime, killing and mayhem. In Iraq, there is nothing like that. When our troops and the Iraqi army enter a town, village or street, what they know about the local bad guys is pretty much in their heads, at best.

Fingerprinting the bad guys.

Solution: Give our troops what our cops have. The Pentagon knows this. For reasons you can imagine, it hasn't happened.

This is a story of can-do in a no-can-do world, a story of how a Marine officer in Iraq, a small network-design company in California, a nonprofit troop-support group, a blogger and other undeterrable folk designed a handheld insurgent-identification device, built it, shipped it and deployed it in Anbar province. They did this in 30 days, from Dec. 15 to Jan. 15. Compared to standard operating procedure for Iraq, this is a nanosecond.

Before fastening our seatbelts, let's check the status quo. As a high Defense Department official told the Journal's editorial page, "We're trying to fight a major war with peacetime procurement rules." The department knows this is awful. Indeed, a program exists, the Automated Biometric Identification System: retina scans, facial matching and the like. The reality: This war is in year four, and the troops don't have it. Beyond Baghdad, the U.S. role has become less about killing insurgents than arresting the worst and isolating them from the population. Obviously it would help to have an electronic database of who the bad guys are, their friends, where they live, tribal affiliation -- in short the insurgency's networks.

The Marine and Army officers who patrol Iraq's dangerous places know they need an identification system similar to cops back home. The troops now write down suspects' names and addresses. Some, like Marine Maj. Owen West in Anbar, have created their own spreadsheets and PowerPoint programs, or use digital cameras to input the details of suspected insurgents. But no Iraq-wide software architecture exists.

Operating around the town of Khalidiya, north of Baghdad, Maj. West has been the leader of a team of nine U.S. soldiers advising an Iraqi brigade. This has been his second tour of duty in Iraq. When not fighting the Iraq war, he's an energy trader for Goldman Sachs in New York City.

It had become clear to him last fall that the Iraqi soldiers were becoming the area's cops. And that they needed modern police surveillance tools. To help the Iraqi army in Khalidiya do its job right, Maj. West needed that technology yesterday: He was scheduled to rotate back stateside in February -- this month.

DOJ_NMG_0129303

Since arriving in Iraq last year, Maj. West had worked with Spirit of America (SoA), the civilian troop-support group founded by Jim Hake. In early December, SoA's project director, Michele Redmond, asked Maj. West if there was any out-of-the-ordinary project they could help him with. And Maj. West said, Why yes, there is. He described to them the basic concept for a mobile, handheld fingerprinting device which Iraqi soldiers would use to assemble an insurgent database. Mr. Hake said his organization would contribute $30,000 to build a prototype and get it to Khalidiya. In New York, Goldman Sachs contributed $14,000 to the project.

Two problems. They needed to find someone who could assemble the device, and the unit had to be in Khalidiya by Jan. 15 to give Maj. West time to field-test it before he left in February.

To build the device, they approached a small California company, Computer Deductions Inc., which makes electronic systems for law-enforcement agencies. Over the Dec. 15 weekend, CDI went to work building a machine for Iraq.

Tom Calabro, a CDI vice president, assembled a team of six technicians. Its basic platform would be a handheld fingerprint workstation called the MV 100, made by Cross Match Technologies, a maker of biometric identity applications. The data collected by the MV 100 would be stored via Bluetooth in a hardened laptop made by GETAC, a California manufacturer. From Knowledge Computing Corp. of Arizona they used the COPLINK program, which creates a linked "map" of events. The laptop would sit in the troops' Humvee and the data sent from there to a laptop at outpost headquarters.

Meanwhile, SoA began to think about how they'd get the package to Maj. West by Jan. 15. They likely would have less than seven days transit time after CDI finished. SoA normally used FedEx to ship time-sensitive equipment into Iraq. But given the unusual nature of the shipment, they were concerned about customs and clearance: This wasn't a case of soccer balls. Jim Hake thought of an alternative: Find someone who would hand-carry it, like a diplomatic courier, on a flight to Kuwait and from there to Taqaddum air base in central Iraq. This meant finding someone who could get into Iraq quickly.

The someone was Bill Roggio. Mr. Roggio is a former army signalman and infantryman who now embeds with the troops and writes about it on his blog, the Fourth Rail, or for the SoA Web site. He was at home in New Jersey, about to celebrate his birthday with his family. He agreed to fly the MV 100 to Iraq as soon as it was ready, in conjunction with an embed trip. With SoA's Michele Redmond, he started working out the logistics for getting to Iraq ASAP.

On Jan. 8, CDI's Tom Calabro emailed the group, including Maj. West in Iraq: "Things are progressing at a furious pace. I may be able to ship by end of day tomorrow. Worst case is Thursday or Friday."

Four days later, a glitch. Mr. Calabro said a vendor mistakenly shipped via the U.S. postal service and a crucial part arrived late, on Jan. 12. "My guys are going to work through the night to finish testing," he said. They shipped the kit via UPS to Bill Roggio for Monday arrival; later that day, he boarded a Lufthansa flight from Newark to Kuwait City. After an overnight hotel stay, he took a C130 military transport to Taqaddum, 45 miles north of Baghdad. Maj. West's Marines drove him to their outpost 15 minutes away.

And so, a month from inception, Bill Roggio handed the electronic identification kit to Maj. West.

On the night of Jan. 20, Maj. West, his Marine squad and the "jundi" (Iraq army soldiers) took the MV 100 and laptop on patrol. Their term of endearment for the insurgents is "snakes." So of course the MV 100 became the Snake Eater. The next day Maj. West emailed the U.S. team digital photos of Iraqi soldiers fingerprinting suspects with the Snake Eater. "It's one night old and the town is abuzz," he said. "I think we have a chance to tip this city over now." A rumor quickly spread that the Iraqi army was implanting GPS chips in insurgents' thumbs.

Over the past 10 days, Maj. West has had chance encounters with two Marine superiors -- Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, who commands the 30,000 joint forces in Anbar, and Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commanding general of operations in Iraq. He showed them the mobile ID database device.

I asked Gen. Neller by email on Tuesday what the status of these technologies is now. He replied that they're receiving advanced biometric equipment, "like the device being employed by Maj. West." He said "in the near future" they will begin to network such devices to share databases more broadly: "Bottom line: The requirement for networking our biometric capability is a priority of this organization."

As he departs, Maj. West reflected on winning at street level: "We're fixated on the enemy, but the enemy is fixated on the people. They know which families are apostates, which houses are safe for the night, which boys are vulnerable to corruption or kidnapping. The enemy's population collection effort far outstrips ours. The Snake Eater will change that, and fast." You have to believe he's got this right. It will only happen, though, if someone above his pay grade blows away the killing habits of peacetime procurement.

Copter Crashes Suggest Change In Iraqi Tactics (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And James Glanz

DOJ_NMG_0129304

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 7 — With two more helicopter crashes near Baghdad, including a Marine transport crash on Wednesday that killed seven people, the number of helicopters that have gone down in Iraq over the past three weeks rose to six. American officials say the streak strongly suggests that insurgents have adapted their tactics and are now putting more effort into shooting down the aircraft.

The number also includes a previously unreported downing of a helicopter operated by a private security firm on Jan. 31.

Some aspects of the recent crashes indicate that insurgents have become smarter about anticipating American flight patterns and finding ways to use old weapons to down helicopters, according to military and witness reports. The aircraft, many of which are equipped with sophisticated antimissile technology, still can be vulnerable to more conventional weapons fired from the ground.

Details about the Marine helicopter, a CH-46 Sea Knight transport that crashed into an open field in an insurgent-heavy region northwest of Baghdad, were still sketchy Wednesday night. Witnesses said the aircraft appeared to have been shot down, but some military officials suggested that the crash might have been caused by a mechanical failure.

The private security helicopter shot down last week was being flown in support of State Department operations and was forced down 10 miles south of the capital after insurgents attacked it with heavy-caliber ground fire as it flew from Hilla to Baghdad, American officials said Wednesday. Another American helicopter quickly swooped in to rescue the passengers and crew.

There have been four other fatal downings of American helicopters since mid-January that killed at least 20 people and that military officials have suggested were all caused by small-arms fire. In some cases, however, witnesses indicated that missiles had been fired from the ground.

American officials emphasize that a new sense of coordinated aggressiveness on the part of insurgents toward attacking aircraft, or even luck, may be playing as large a role in the high pace of crashes as improved skill and tactics among insurgents.

"I do not know whether or not it is the law of averages that caught up with us," said Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, during Senate testimony on Tuesday. Another possibility, he said, was that there had "been a change in tactics, techniques and procedures on the part of the enemy."

Among the troops, helicopters are still seen as a less vulnerable way to travel than the ground convoys that are commonly subject to roadside bombs that can tear through thick vehicular armor.

Historically, improved tactics in shooting down helicopters have proved to be important factors in conflicts in which guerrillas have achieved victories against major powers, including battles in Somalia, Afghanistan and Vietnam.

A senior military official in Washington said Wednesday that, while the episodes were still under investigation, the rash of helicopter shoot-downs appeared to be part of an insurgent strategy to inflict heavier losses on American forces at the start of the new push to secure Baghdad.

"There is certainly the expectation here that insurgents are trying to inflict some losses as we're building up forces as a means to try to discourage the Iraqis and us that this is a futile plan," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Several officials said it was unclear whether the attacks had succeeded because insurgents had adopted new tactics, but judging only by the number of successful attacks, it appeared to be part of a coordinated effort.

Part of the explanation, one official said, may be that fighters are simply firing at low-flying American helicopters. In recent years, there has been relatively little small-arms fire against helicopters, the official said.

One Air Force commander in Baghdad said the recent crashes appeared largely to be a result of old weapons long available in Iraq and not an influx of new hardware or technology. "I haven't seen anything like that," the American commander said.

The Sea Knight, the aircraft that crashed Wednesday, is a large transport helicopter that is easily distinguished by its twin rotors, one mounted near the cockpit and one mounted on a tall tail at the back. It can carry more than two dozen passengers and crew members. The military said all seven people on board died in the crash but did not identify the victims.

Video of the aftermath broadcast by the BBC showed bright red flames and thick black smoke billowing from the burning hulk of the helicopter as the wreckage lay in an open field.

Witnesses said the helicopter appeared to have been attacked from the ground.

"I looked at the sky and saw this big helicopter with double rotors and it was hit in its tail and burning," said one Iraqi who declined to give his name but said he saw the crash while tending to his herd of grazing sheep near Karma, an area heavy with Sunni Arab insurgents between Baghdad and Falluja.

DOJ_NMG_0129305

Another helicopter, with one rotor, was flying just behind the burning aircraft, he said. The twin-rotor helicopter flew for another half mile or so before crashing, he said. “I saw a lot of airplanes after the crash, and I took my herd and left,” he said. “I was afraid there would be shooting after that.”

An Internet message from an insurgent group calling itself the Islamic State of Iraq took responsibility for shooting down the helicopter, the latest in a string of crashes that the group has claimed responsibility for. The message said that the group’s “antiaircraft” battalion downed the aircraft about 10:40 a.m. near Karma, and asserted that the crash was witnessed by hundreds of onlookers shouting “God is great,” according to the SITE Institute, which tracks Internet postings by insurgent groups.

American military officials emphasized that the investigation into the crash was scrutinizing a possible mechanical failure along with other potential causes.

Two American officials said the previously unreported downing of the private helicopter supporting State Department operations last week came after it was subjected to a hail of gunfire from the ground. One official described the gunfire as heavy caliber and said that after the helicopter crash-landed a second aircraft set down and evacuated the stranded passengers and crew.

But the official said that as a quick reaction force rushed to the crash scene, the force was struck by at least one large roadside bomb and suffered several casualties. The force withdrew from the site, and American officials decided to destroy the aircraft rather than risk it falling into insurgent hands.

Before the most recent crashes, at least 57 American military helicopters have crashed or been shot down since May 2003, according to a tally by the Brookings Institution. The highest total for any single month was five aircraft lost in January 2004. The overall tally since 2003 showed that at least 172 American service members had died in helicopter crashes, or about 5.5 percent of the total American troop fatalities.

On Jan. 20, in the deadliest recent crash, attackers appear to have fired from a pickup truck near Baghdad. The first of two Black Hawk helicopters passed over the truck and saw nothing amiss. But a witness said that the second helicopter fired the flares that were used to confuse heat-seeking missiles before bursting into flames and then crashing.

An Apache gunship in the area then pursued the truck and destroyed it. The American military later said that the debris from the truck contained tubes consistent with missile launchers.

U.S. Copter Crash In Iraq Kills 7 (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — A U.S. military helicopter flying over farmland northwest of Baghdad crashed today, military officials said, killing all seven people on board. It was the fifth U.S. helicopter lost in the past three weeks and the second to crash in five days.

Witnesses described hearing loud bangs before the aircraft began swinging wildly in the sky and then plunged in flames.

Military officials in Baghdad said they did not know the cause of the crash. In Washington, a senior Defense Department official told the Associated Press that the military believed mechanical problems were to blame.

In Baghdad, military spokeswoman Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle confirmed that all on board the aircraft were killed.

Hours after the crash, a Sunni Muslim insurgent group linked to Al Qaeda claimed to have shot down the CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter as part of a new anti-U.S. campaign that appears to have picked up steam just as U.S. and Iraqi forces begin to launch a new security plan in Baghdad.

The same group claimed to have shot down a U.S. helicopter north of Baghdad Friday and to have set off a string of car bombs that wreaked havoc in the northern city of Kirkuk the next day.

Today's crash occurred about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad, in Al Anbar province, a region notorious for Sunni insurgent activity.

Ahmed Said, 40, a taxi driver, said he saw the helicopter flying ahead of him and then heard what he thought was machine gun fire.

"I stopped the car and I saw the chopper was on fire and pivoting in the air," he said. When it hit the ground, it made "a big boom sound," he said, an account echoed by others witnesses.

Whether the cause of the crash was enemy fire or mechanical failure, the loss of another helicopter and of more U.S. troops underscored the perils faced by the U.S. military in Iraq, where roadside explosives and car bombs have made air travel the preferred mode of transport.

When asked about the recent rash of helicopter downings during a Senate hearing Tuesday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged the concerns that insurgents may have changed tactics to focus on airborne targets. Four of the last five crashes have been caused by hostile fire, U.S. officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0129306

Military officials today announced two more U.S. troop deaths, bringing the total to at least 3,111 since the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks casualty figures from the war. At least 19 of those deaths have occurred in the past week.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the U.S. military spokesman, said despite the ongoing violence, the new security plan designed to quash insurgent activity was well underway. He acknowledged, however, that only 3,000 of the 21,500 additional U.S. troops promised by President Bush had arrived in Baghdad and that it would take time to fully implement the plan.

"We're kind of rolling into this plan," he said, refusing to say when all 21,500 additional troops were expected in the country. Caldwell also emphasized that Iraqi leaders were in charge of deploying the troops and deciding in which areas to focus the security sweeps.

At a news conference earlier, Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari announced that four Iraqi military officers were being held in the apparent abduction of an Iranian diplomat in Baghdad. Zebari said it was not yet clear whom the four answered to.

The Iranian government Tuesday accused the United States, which has long maintained that Iran is meddling in Iraq, of orchestrating the abduction of the Iranian Embassy's second secretary. U.S. officials in Baghdad today continued to deny any knowledge of the abduction, which Iran says occurred Sunday as the diplomat was leaving a bank. The diplomat remains missing.

Morgue officials and police said 33 bodies were found in Baghdad, all shot to death and apparent victims of sectarian warfare.

Marine Copter Crashes; 7 Killed (WT/AP)

By Robert H. Reid

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A U.S. Marine transport helicopter crashed in flames yesterday in a field northwest of Baghdad, killing all seven persons aboard, the U.S. military said. It was the fifth U.S. aircraft lost in less than three weeks and the latest sign of growing problems with aviation in Iraq.

A U.S. military statement gave no reason for the crash of the CH-46 Sea Knight, which went down near Fallujah in Anbar province, about 20 miles from Baghdad. However, at the Pentagon, three Marine Corps officials said the troop-transport helicopter was in flames when it went down, with the pilot appearing to attempt a hasty landing but losing control as the aircraft descended.

They said witnesses in nearby Marine aircraft saw the flames but saw no sign that it involved hostile fire.

An Iraqi air force officer, however, said the helicopter was downed by an anti-aircraft missile. He spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release information.

An Iraqi farmer who lives about a half mile from the crash site said he heard a missile fired moments before the crash, which took place in an insurgent-infested region.

"The helicopter was flying and passed over us, then we heard the firing of a missile," said the farmer, Mohammed al-Janabi. "The helicopter then turned into a ball of fire. It flew in a circle twice and then went down."

Associated Press Television video showed the flaming wreckage lying in a field in front of a cluster of mud homes. A dense plume of black smoke rose over the remains. The Marine officials suspected that the fire was caused by a mechanical problem, the officials said. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation was continuing.

Names of the victims were not released, but military officials said five were Marines and two were from the Navy.

In a statement posted on an extremist Web site, an al Qaeda-linked group, the Islamic State in Iraq, claimed it shot down the helicopter, which it described as a Chinook -- an Army helicopter that resembles a Sea Knight.

Critics have long urged the military to replace the CH-46, which was introduced in 1964 at the start of the Vietnam War. In 2001, retired Col. Frank Jensen wrote in Defense News that the Marines should replace the CH-46 but cannot because of budget limitations.

Regardless of the cause, the latest crash adds urgency to a U.S. military review of flight operations in Iraq, including whether insurgents have perfected skills in attacking U.S. planes.

The latest crash occurred five days after a U.S. Army Apache helicopter went down in a hail of gunfire north of Baghdad. Three other helicopters -- two from the Army and one operated by an American security firm -- also have crashed since Jan. 20. A total of 27 persons -- 23 U.S. service members and four American civilian contractors -- were killed in the five crashes.

Army Says It Will Withhold $19.6 Million From Halliburton, Citing Potential Contract Breach (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

DOJ_NMG_0129307

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — The Army announced during a House oversight committee hearing on Wednesday that it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Company after recently discovering that the contractor had hired the company Blackwater USA to provide armed security guards in Iraq, a potential breach of its government contract.

The Army has said that its contracts with Halliburton, which has a five-year, $16 billion deal to support American military operations in Iraq, generally barred the company and its subcontractors from using private armed guards. But in a statement, Halliburton disagreed with the Army's interpretation and suggested that there was nothing to prohibit Halliburton's subcontractors from hiring such guards.

The announcement came during a hearing of the House Government Oversight Committee that included emotional testimony about the killing of four Blackwater employees in Falluja, Iraq, in 2004.

In an e-mail message made public in the hearing and written only hours before the four were killed, another Blackwater worker told the company to end the "smoke and mirror show" and provide its employees in the war zone with adequate weapons and armored vehicles.

"I need ammo," the worker, Tom Powell, said in an e-mail message dated March 30, 2004, to supervisors at Blackwater, which is based in North Carolina. "I need Glocks and M4s — all the client body armor you got," he wrote. "Guys are in the field with borrowed stuff and in harm's way."

Mr. Powell said he had requested heavily armored vehicles "from the beginning, and from my understanding, an order is still pending."

"Why? I ask," he added.

The next day, a mob in Falluja attacked a supply convoy that was being guarded by Blackwater employees and killed four guards, later stringing up two of the mutilated, charred bodies from a bridge. The men were riding in vehicles that were only lightly armored, and their families have claimed in a lawsuit against Blackwater that the company failed to provide basic protective equipment.

Blackwater's general counsel, Andrew G. Howell, told the House panel on Wednesday that the company, which also had a State Department contract to provide security services, believed that it had had an appropriate number of armored vehicles in Iraq. He said, "We have not skimped on equipment — no sir."

The panel is investigating Blackwater and the work of other large American military contractors in Iraq.

In the dispute with Halliburton, the Army insisted repeatedly to Congressional investigators last year that it could find no evidence that Blackwater had been hired by Halliburton and its subcontractors in Iraq for security.

But in a letter dated Tuesday and made public on Wednesday, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey said that additional investigation showed that Blackwater had provided private security guards for a Halliburton subcontractor, ESS Support Services, a construction and food services business, and that the costs "were not itemized in the contracts or invoices" prepared by ESS.

"The Army is continuing to investigate this matter and we are committed to providing full disclosures of the results of our investigations to the committee," he wrote to the chairman of the oversight committee, Henry A. Waxman, a California Democrat. "We share your commitment to ensuring that contractors supporting the military and reconstruction efforts in Iraq comply with the terms and conditions of these contracts."

In a statement, Halliburton insisted that it was not in breach of its contract with the government.

"Nowhere does it prohibit subcontractors from supplementing that protection with private security," Halliburton said. "It is unrealistic to think that the military can both wage a war and at the same time protect every necessary civilian movement in Iraq." The company said it would "sit down with the Army to discuss and resolve these issues."

The committee also heard from family members of the four security guards.

"Why did Blackwater choose to make a profit over the safety of our loved ones?" asked Kathryn Helvenston-Wettengel, the mother of one of the men. "Blackwater gets paid for the number of warm bodies it can put on the ground in certain locations throughout the world. If some are killed, it replaces them at a moment's notice."

"Although everyone remembers those images of the bodies being burnt, beaten, dragged through the streets and ultimately hung from a bridge, we continue to relive that horror day after day, as those men were our fathers, sons and husbands," she said.

Halliburton Faces Scrutiny Over Security (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129308

The US military is weighing up whether to force Halliburton to pay back what could amount to tens of millions of dollars in fees it charged the army to pay for private security subcontractors in Iraq.

Tina Ballard, deputy assistant secretary of the army, said it was investigating allegations that Halliburton violated the terms of its $16bn (£8bn, €12bn) logistics contract in Iraq, known as Logcap, by knowingly or unknowingly paying for private security subcontractors, and that the army would consider taking steps to recoup those funds.

Use of private security contractors in Iraq, for duties ranging from protecting visiting US officials to securing reconstruction sites, has soared in recent years, costing US taxpayers about $3.8bn, according to a report by Democratic lawmakers.

Under the terms of Logcap, Halliburton is prohibited from using security contractors, such as Blackwater. Last year a top Defense Department official said in a letter to lawmakers investigating the issue that the department had been told by Halliburton subsidiary KBR that the company was "unaware" that Blackwater had been hired by any of KBR's many subcontractors.

But in testimony yesterday before the chief House oversight committee, Ms Ballard admitted that, after a subsequent army probe, one of KBR's subcontractors, ESS, a food services company that is a subsidiary of Compass of the UK, admitted it had hired Blackwater to protect ESS employees under a Logcap subcontract.

KBR's director of security yesterday said travelling in Iraq without security was "exceptionally dangerous".

The investigation of the alleged engagement of Blackwater by KBR and other contractors in Iraq lies at the heart of a wrongful death lawsuit against Blackwater by families of four employees who were ambushed in Falluja in 2004. Henry Waxman, the Democratic chairman of the oversight committee, said that, after three years investigating the ambush, it was still unclear whether the men, who were working for ESS, were ultimately working under a contract held by KBR - which would have violated contracting rules - or Fluor, another contractor, because ESS had offered conflicting information on the issue. Fluor yesterday denied ever working with Blackwater.

"It's remarkable that the world of contractors and subcontractors is so murky that we can't even get to the bottom of this, let alone calculate how many millions of dollars taxpayers lose in each step of the subcontracting process," said Mr Waxman.

In emotional testimony yesterday, the families of the four men, who were shot, dragged through the streets, burned and hanged from a bridge, said Blackwater failed to supply the men with teams big enough to ensure their safety, armoured vehicles and rear gunners, and other provisions. "It's like the wild west over there and there is no accountability," said Kathryn Helvenston-Wettengel, mother of one of those killed.

A Blackwater official declined to discuss details of the case, but said Congress was only hearing an "incomplete and one-sided exploration" of the incident.

5 Indicted In Probe Of Iraq Deals (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Three Army Reserve officers and two civilians were indicted yesterday on federal charges of participating in a wide-ranging bribery and contract-rigging scheme involving millions in Iraq reconstruction funds.

The 25-count indictment handed up by a Trenton, N.J., grand jury expands a probe that has resulted in three guilty pleas. Those indicted yesterday were accused of participating in a scheme to funnel $8.6 million in reconstruction contracts to an American businessman in exchange for cars, $3,200 Breitling watches, plane tickets, $3,000 Toshiba laptop computers, weapons and stolen money. Named in the indictments were Col. Curtis G. Whiteford; Lt. Col. Debra M. Harrison and her husband, William Driver; Lt. Col. Michael B. Wheeler; and Michael Morris.

"This indictment alleges that the defendants flagrantly enriched themselves at the expense of the Iraqi people -- the very people they were there to help," said Paul J. McNulty, U.S. deputy attorney general.

Three of the central characters in the scheme have pleaded guilty. Robert J. Stein, a former Coalition Provisional Authority employee, was sentenced last month to nine years in prison and ordered to forfeit millions of dollars for his role in steering contracts to businessman Philip H. Bloom. Lt. Bruce D. Hopfengardner also admitted to steering contracts to Bloom for money and a Harley-Davidson motorcycle. Bloom pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bribery and money-laundering charges last year.

The alleged fraud scheme is the largest to emerge out of the Iraq reconstruction effort. In the indictment and in interviews, federal prosecutors described a series of grand scams designed to plunder a reconstruction program funded by the United States and with money collected from the sale of Iraqi oil. Over time, Bloom and his alleged confederates discussed setting up a private security company and an Iraqi airline to snag more work.

The reconstruction program often distributed funds in cash, handing out blocks of currency known as "bricks," and the indictment described how participants in the scam smuggled the bulk back into the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0129309

Morris, who was charged with conspiracy and wire fraud, was arrested in Romania Tuesday, and federal officials said they would attempt to extradite him. Messages left for Driver, Wheeler and Harrison were not returned. A woman who answered the phone at Whiteford's home hung up.

In one case, Harrison and Wheeler smuggled at least $330,000 in stolen authority funds from Iraq to New York using commercial business-class tickets purchased by Bloom, according to the indictment. In a January 2004 e-mail, Stein proudly told Bloom that he and Wheeler had secured another contract for him.

"I will give you 200K sometime tomorrow afternoon! I love to give you money," the e-mail said. Wheeler, the CPA's deputy chief of staff in the Al Hillah region, also accepted bottles of liquor for his efforts.

Later that year, Bloom discussed opening an Iraqi airline company and a private security company to be named Anaconda. The "objectives of the company are making money while allowing us to look cool and have cool stuff. That ought to be easy to do," Whiteford said of the private security company in an e-mail.

Bloom also handed out expensive cars as rewards for help, including a Cadillac Escalade for Harrison, who served as acting comptroller for the CPA office. In an e-mail, Bloom told Stein that Hopfengardner would receive a GMC Yukon but that Whiteford was only getting a Nissan 350 Z because he "had not been able to get Bloom all the aviation licenses necessary to startup Bloom's airline company," the indictment said.

Meanwhile, Whiteford, the second-most-senior CPA official in the region, was very specific about the type of sports car he wanted: a touring model with manual transmission, a cargo convenience package and other high-end vehicle options. He also accepted a $3,200 watch, $10,000 and round-trip tickets home to Utah, according to the indictment.

The Fog Of Accountability (NYT)

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

The details are graphic: billions of dollars of Iraqi oil revenues — 363 tons of cash — bundled up and urgently flown to Baghdad on 484 pallets from the Federal Reserve Bank to jump-start a new Iraqi government. Four years later, the unanswered questions are just as graphic: Who was responsible for the money? What became of it?

Two years ago, the special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction reported that $8.8 billion of the cash surge could not be adequately accounted for by the Bush administration's provisional governing authority. The Republican-controlled Congress — which shrugged off oversight responsibilities for President Bush's failed war — dutifully sidestepped the issue. Thankfully, the new Democratic Congress is finally investigating the disappeared billions and other aspects of the war's mismanagement.

The details emerging provide a lesson in how easily cash can evaporate into the fog of an unmonitored war. One $500 million outlay was explained away with a one-word record entry — "security" — in the provisional authority's books. Ten disbursements ranging from $120 million to $900 million have no documentation at all, as if they were petty cash. Paul Bremer III, the former chief of the administration's provisional authority, told the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee this week that Iraq was strictly a cash economy with primitive banking, and that there had been no alternative but to spur reconstruction with a fast and poorly documented infusion of billions. "There are no perfect solutions in Iraq," said Mr. Bremer, still cocky despite the now increasingly apparent and seemingly limitless failures of his tenure.

According to the inspector general and Congressional investigators, Mr. Bremer's provisional authority, with the full backing of the White House and the Pentagon, doled out an estimated $12 billion to dodgy ministries — duffle bags full, some of it from the backs of pickups. The fact that this was Iraqi money reserved during the United Nations' oil-for-food program is no comfort to any American taxpayer wondering what's been happening to the hundreds of billions Washington is pouring into Iraq.

Republican lawmakers at the hearing again tried to gloss over the administration's mismanagement of the war, complaining that the mystery billions were "old news." The real news is that — at long last — the truth about the Iraq fiasco is being pursued in public by Congressional investigators.

Mistrial Declared For War Objector (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

A military judge abruptly declared a mistrial Wednesday in the court-martial of an Army lieutenant who refused orders to go to Iraq, a ruling that handed a temporary reprieve to the elated officer and left military prosecutors visibly stunned.

The decision by the judge, Lt. Col. John Head, turned on the contentious issue of whether factual stipulations agreed to earlier by the prosecutors and the defense team amounted to a confession of guilt by 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, 28, on the Army's charges of failure to deploy.

DOJ_NMG_0129310

Prosecutors argued, in effect, that Watada did confess to refusing direct orders to fly to Iraq with his unit last summer, and that his reasons were irrelevant.

Watada said he had admitted to the fact that he deliberately missed his flight, but that he did so because he considered the war illegal — and wanted to explain his reasoning at the trial.

Watada's touchstone case has made him a cult hero among antiwar protesters but a coward and a traitor to many in the military.

Under the military code, there is a heavy burden of proof on the refuser to justify disobeying the chain of command, since the chain is considered vital to the effective functioning of military forces.

With the defense set to begin its case Wednesday morning, the judge clearly surprised both sides by raising concerns about the stipulation, which he implied would cause him difficulties with the instructions he would give the jury on how to weigh the evidence.

With the seven-member military jury out of the courtroom, the judge said he could not proceed if Watada did not concede he was admitting guilt or if prosecutors did not abandon key lines of their argument.

"There is an inconsistency in the stipulation of fact," Head said. "I don't know how I can accept this ... as we stand here now."

He said he could not allow the court-martial to proceed without dismissing part of the stipulation altogether, which would have been a major tactical advance for Watada.

"We've got the immoveable object hitting the irresistible force," the judge said at one point, even as both prosecutors and defense lawyers said they wanted the court-martial to continue. Nevertheless, the prosecutors moved for a mistrial.

Though Watada will likely face another trial, the judge's ruling amounted to a temporary moral victory for the lieutenant in a case that many legal observers had considered a virtual slam-dunk for the Army.

Watada's lawyer, Eric Seitz, said Watada's intent in refusing deployment orders was at the heart of his defense, and that it was ridiculous for prosecutors to suggest that he had no right to explain why he did what he did.

"The government has created a major mess here, and that's clearly why they had to move for a mistrial," Seitz said. "Anytime the government tries to suppress a defendant's attempt to explain his actions, that's not a good thing for our legal system."

Antiwar forces wasted no time in declaring the mistrial a victory, with banners saying as much at a rally just outside the base here, several miles south of Tacoma.

"The legal mess we saw here today reflects the major mess the Bush administration has made with the war in Iraq," said Ann Wright, a retired Army colonel and diplomat who resigned a State Department post in March 2003 in protest of the war, which began that month.

But Army officials said the ruling showed how the military system bent over backward to be fair to a defendant.

"Throughout the military justice system, the Army steadfastly protects the rights of the accused," said Lt. Col. Robert Resnick, a legal advisor in the Army's staff judge advocate's office at Ft. Lewis. "The judge's ruling today in this case provides further evidence of that."

Eugene R. Fidell, a military lawyer and president of the nonprofit National Institute of Military Justice in Washington, D.C., said he was puzzled by the judge's decision "to pull the plug on the whole case." Fidell said the attorneys and the judge could have renegotiated the agreement in the courtroom.

"Now they have to start from square one," he said. With a second trial impending, he said, Watada's case will continue to make news and probably provide more momentum for the antiwar movement.

Watada smiled and hugged his mother, Carolyn Ho, after the judge declared the mistrial. But he left public comments to Seitz, who said that Watada was happy but also exhausted, suffering from a cold and disappointed that he was not able to present his defense to the jury.

Watada may not see his second court-martial start until March 19, though the judge indicated it could be postponed beyond that. Seitz, his lawyer, said it may never come to retrial because of government errors.

Seitz adamantly rejected any assertion that the stipulations were tantamount to an admission of guilt.

"No. Absolutely no way," he said. "Lt. Watada's a smart guy. He knew exactly what he was agreeing to."

Mistrial For Officer Who Refused To Go To Iraq (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129311

SEATTLE, Feb. 7 — A military judge on Wednesday declared a mistrial in the court-martial of the Army officer who called the war in Iraq illegal and refused to join his unit when it deployed there last June.

The mistrial means that the officer, First Lt. Ehren K. Watada, could be retried in March, a spokesman for the base said.

Lt. Col. John Head, the military judge presiding over the case, declared the mistrial after he rejected an agreement Lieutenant Watada had reached with prosecutors before the trial began on Monday.

Under the pretrial deal, known as a stipulation agreement, Lieutenant Watada, 28, who is assigned to a Stryker brigade at Fort Lewis, about 45 miles south of Seattle, acknowledged refusing to deploy and speaking out against the war. In turn, prosecutors dropped two charges related to comments Lieutenant Watada made in interviews. His potential maximum sentence, if he were convicted, would be reduced to four years in an Army prison from six.

A lawyer for Lieutenant Watada, Eric Seitz, has maintained that there is no dispute over what Lieutenant Watada did, only over why he did it. He has said Lieutenant Watada's actions amounted to free speech and civil disobedience protected by the Constitution.

Colonel Head has repeatedly refused to allow Lieutenant Watada to center his defense on the argument that the war is illegal. On Wednesday, after Mr. Seitz proposed that the judge require jurors to consider that Lieutenant Watada acted out of a mistaken belief that his actions were legal, Colonel Head declared the mistrial, citing confusion over the stipulation.

The judge, according to a statement released by Fort Lewis, became "concerned that the stipulation amounted to a confession by Lieutenant Watada to an offense to which he intended to plead not guilty."

Lieutenant Watada's conviction has largely been considered a foregone conclusion. But Mr. Seitz said the circumstances surrounding the mistrial, including the fact that the judge rejected a stipulation he had initially approved, could allow Lieutenant Watada to avoid prosecution altogether.

Largest U.S. Natural Gas Pipeline Company Settles Oil-for-food Allegations For $7.7 Million (SDUT/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 8, 2007

NEW YORK – The nation's largest natural gas pipeline company agreed to pay the federal government $7.7 million to settle corruption allegations related to the U.N. oil-for-food scandal over aid to Iraq, according to a settlement announced Wednesday.

El Paso Corp. will forfeit $5.48 million to the United States, which will seek to transfer the money to the Development Fund of Iraq to be paid as restitution for the benefit of the people of Iraq, according to the agreement announced by federal prosecutors and the FBI.

In a separate deal with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Houston-based company will pay an additional $2.25 million.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement that the $5.48 million represents the amount of illegal surcharges paid to Saddam Hussein's government by third parties from whom El Paso purchased Iraqi oil between mid-2000 and March 2003.

In return for the settlements, El Paso will not be prosecuted for any crimes except possibly criminal tax violations as long as it continues to continue cooperating fully with the federal government in its investigation into the scandal-ridden U.N. oil-for-food program, Garcia said.

El Paso spokesman Richard Wheatley said the company had taken measures to avoid buying oil from companies that paid illegal surcharges to Iraq but the procedures did not succeed.

"We have cooperated with the federal government in this matter for some time and we're glad to have it behind us," he said.

He said the company did not participate in the oil-for-food program until it acquired Coastal Corp. in 2001 for $24 billion.

The United Nations used the oil-for-food program starting in the 1990s as way to avoid making the Iraqi people suffer while it punished Saddam's regime. Iraq was allowed to sell its crude oil, but the proceeds were to go toward food and other humanitarian aid for Iraqis.

Authorities said Saddam began demanding kickbacks, and investigators suspect his government collected $10.2 billion in payoffs and other illegal oil sales.

U.S. Strives To Delay Iraqi Hanging (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129312

U.S. officials are working to spare Saddam Hussein's former vice president from a rapid trip to the Iraqi gallows, fearful that his execution, following the flawed hangings of Mr. Hussein and a co-defendant, could further damage the credibility of the American-backed government.

The former vice president, Taha Yassin Ramadan, was among seven officials -- including Mr. Hussein -- convicted in November by the Iraqi High Tribunal, an Iraqi-run court established by the U.S. to try members of the ousted regime. The trial court imposed a life sentence, but an appeals court in December directed that Mr. Ramadan be executed.

The appeals court offered no legal rationale for the change, and legal experts hired by the U.S. government to advise the Iraqi High Tribunal say the appeals ruling violated due process. Legal observers say prosecutors failed to provide direct evidence tying Mr. Ramadan to the specific killings for which he now faces execution, and that was a likely reason the trial court declined to order a death sentence.

"We've had two botched executions," said a senior administration official in Washington. "We would like to prevent additional debacles."

Today, the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, plans to ask Iraqi officials to reconsider the death sentence, because of flaws in the appellate process, according to a person familiar with the matter. A U.N. representative in Baghdad is scheduled to meet today with the Iraqi tribunal's chief judge, Aref Shahin, to deliver a letter detailing Ms. Arbour's concerns, this person said.

The Ramadan case places the Bush administration in a difficult dilemma. On the one hand, officials fear the bad publicity, claims of martyrdom and street violence a questionable execution could provoke. Yet they also want to avoid appearing to intervene in the Iraqi legal system, undercutting broader U.S. attempts to portray Iraq as a sovereign nation.

"There's no question that we have raised concerns with this appeals process," an administration official in Washington said, adding that the U.S. uses "funding and other things as leverage" to influence tribunal conduct. But "I don't want to substitute our judgment for the judgment of the Iraqi courts" or "micromanage the process," the official added.

On Nov. 5, Mr. Hussein and two co-defendants received death sentences from the trial court, and after the appeals chamber rapidly affirmed their verdicts, were hanged in a manner widely criticized as vengeful and amateurish. The Dec. 30 hanging was captured on video showing the execution party jeering Mr. Hussein as he stood at the gallows. Two weeks later, Mr. Hussein's half-brother, former secret-police chief Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, was decapitated by his noose. The third man was hanged apparently without incident.

U.S. officials worry the perfunctory appeals, rush to the gallows and gruesome execution footage fueled perceptions that the American-backed, Shiite-dominated Iraqi government was more interested in vengeance than justice for the ousted Sunni regime. "They turned him into a martyr," Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said of Mr. Hussein.

Western officials in Baghdad who have worked with the tribunal worry the Ramadan case could similarly inflame passions, saying it is the latest example of Iraqi political interference in the court's proceedings. Several judges considered too lenient by the government have been removed, they say, and throughout the trial, Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki and other officials suggested the verdicts in the trial of Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants were a foregone conclusion.

Mr. Maliki's liaison to the tribunal, Basam Ridha, said in an interview that the government had not tried to influence the court and that Iraqi law allows the appellate chamber to approve harsher sentences than trial courts hand down.

Mr. Ridha noted that the sole defendant acquitted by the tribunal, former Baath Party official Mohammed Azawi, was released. To ensure Mr. Azawi's safety, "we kept it secret, we gave him bodyguards and support to make sure he's OK and that nobody could hurt him," Mr. Ridha said. "We let go the guy who was ordered to go free."

Few doubt that Mr. Ramadan, the Ten of Diamonds in the pack of "most wanted" playing cards given to U.S. soldiers, was involved in atrocities over the years. In 2002, Mr. Ramadan suggested Baghdad and Washington settle their differences with a duel -- he and Mr. Hussein against Vice President Dick Cheney and President Bush.

Nevertheless, U.S. officials, Western legal advisers and human-rights observers in Baghdad say prosecutors never adequately linked Mr. Ramadan to the killings for which he is now expected to die. An execution now, they say, will foreclose the chance of holding him to account for other crimes where stronger evidence might more clearly justify a capital sentence.

The trial concerned a retaliatory crackdown on the Shiite village of Dujail after Mr. Hussein escaped a 1982 assassination attempt there. Evidence showed nearly 150 men died in custody or by execution and some 1,500 villagers were arrested, sent to camps or tortured and much of their property was destroyed. Dujail was a stronghold of Prime Minister Maliki's Dawa Party.

Mr. Ramadan headed the Popular Army, a Baath Party militia that carried out the Dujail attacks. His conviction apparently was based on the theory of command responsibility, in which superiors can be held accountable for the crimes of subordinates.

DOJ_NMG_0129313

The trial chamber scheduled a hearing to confirm the sentence on Jan. 25, but after U.N. and U.S. officials raised concerns, that was postponed to Feb. 12. Should the death sentence be confirmed, Iraqi law provides for an execution within 30 days, Mr. Ridha said.

Italian Court To Try Marine (NYT)

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

An American marine was ordered to stand trial in Italy in connection with the shooting death of a top Italian intelligence agent in Iraq in 2005. But the trial, set for April 17 in Rome, is likely to occur without the defendant.

United States officials cleared the marine, Specialist Mario Lozano, of any wrongdoing in the death of the agent, Nicola Calipari. The agent had just secured the release of an Italian journalist, Giuliana Sgrena, who was kidnapped in Baghdad.

It is the second trial in Italy involving Americans, and it is straining relations between the countries. Two dozen C.I.A. operatives face charges in Milan over the kidnapping there in 2003 of an Egyptian militant.

El Paso Corp. To Pay $7 Million As Settlement In Oil-Food Case (NYT)

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

The El Paso Corporation, the largest American natural gas pipeline operator, agreed Wednesday to pay the federal government $7.73 million to settle allegations of involvement in illegal payments under the oil-for-food program run by the United Nations in Iraq.

The company, based in Houston, will forfeit $5.48 million under a settlement with federal prosecutors in New York. Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for the Southern District, said the amount represented the sum of secret surcharges paid to Saddam Hussein's government by third parties from whom El Paso purchased oil between mid-2000 and March 2003.

In a statement, Mr. Garcia said his office would seek to transfer the $5.48 million to the Development Fund for Iraq as restitution for the benefit of the people of Iraq.

A civil penalty of $2.25 million was announced in Washington by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which said El Paso had bought about 21.4 million barrels of Iraqi crude oil from third parties participating in the program.

Paul A. Volcker, a former Federal Reserve chairman, estimated at the conclusion of his investigation of the program in October 2005 that more than 4,500 companies had taken part and that more than half had paid kickbacks.

Mr. Garcia said his office had decided against prosecuting El Paso because the company had voluntarily ceased participating in the oil-forfood program in mid-2002 out of concern for possible illegalities, had given full cooperation to the various oilfor-food investigations, had pledged continuing cooperation and had confirmed that culpable employees were no longer working for the company.

Richard Wheatley, the company's spokesman, said in a telephone interview that El Paso had not directly purchased oil from Iraq but that it had worked through third parties and had put procedures in place to eliminate surcharges, though they proved to be inadequate.

Mr. Wheatley said that the Coastal Corporation, which El Paso acquired in January 2001, had taken part in the program starting in 1996 and that El Paso continued that participation from the merger until May 2002, working through third parties.

U.S. To Press NATO For Help In Afghanistan (NYT)

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

NATO defense ministers will meet Thursday to discuss ways to confront an expected Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, amid growing American pressure for the allies to commit more troops and resources.

Go to Complete Coverage » The ministers, meeting in Seville for two days of informal talks, will also discuss developments in Kosovo, where tensions are quietly simmering over its future status.

The United States defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, and NATO's new military chief, Gen. Bantz J. Craddock, an American, face a baptism of fire with their first official meeting.

Mr. Gates told lawmakers this week that an objective of his trip was to prod his partners to supply the promised troops and military equipment for the 35,000-strong NATO-led International Security Assistance Force.

"And one of my requests of those folks, and one of the issues that I'll be pressing very hard, is that they meet the commitments that they made," Mr. Gates said.

A senior American defense official who briefed reporters on the condition of anonymity said General Craddock had drawn up a new set of requirements for the Afghan mission that would be discussed at the meeting in Seville.

Afghanistan is the world's leading opium producer, and its lawless border regions with Pakistan are the major breeding ground for international terrorism.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization has taken a major gamble by trying to help spread the influence of President Hamid Karzai's weak central government throughout Afghanistan, even as it is faced with the resurgent Taliban.

About 4,000 people were killed in the insurgency last year, and American officials say suicide attacks have increased fourfold since 2005.

DOJ:

Democrats Press Issue Of Attorney 'Firings' (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

Democrats have signaled they aren't dropping the controversy over what they describe as the Bush administration's "firing" of federal prosecutors.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, demanding that he appoint the recently fired U.S. Attorney in San Diego as a special counsel so that she can continue overseeing a congressional corruption probe.

Carol Lam, appointed in 2002 as San Diego U.S. Attorney, was among at least seven U.S. attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department. Ms. Lam supervised the investigation and prosecution of Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, now in federal prison for soliciting bribes. That case led to related investigations, including inquiries into a businessman who also had dealings with Rep. Jerry Lewis, the California Republican who until recently was chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, and into Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the former third-ranking official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Both individuals deny any wrongdoing.

Former senior Justice Department officials have said it is extremely unusual for an administration to fire U.S. attorneys, who normally remain in office throughout a president's term. Democrats in both the House and Senate have raised questions about whether the Bush White House and Justice Department may be trying to derail certain sensitive investigations and replace U.S. attorneys with conservatives loyal to the White House.

In his letter, Mr. Emanuel said, "As you are aware, there are many questions surrounding the recent dismissal of seven U.S. Attorneys, including whether or not your office has the authority to dismiss these individuals, and if their firings were politically motivated."

The Justice Department has said most of the prosecutors in question were asked to leave because of poor performance. It has strongly denied any intent to derail investigations. A spokeswoman said the Justice Department wouldn't comment specifically on Mr. Emanuel's letter because it hadn't received it. "As a general matter," she said, "U.S. attorneys leave office for all sorts of reasons, and complex and important cases carry on with no interruption by the career prosecutors who manage them. There is no reason to suggest that any ongoing cases in San Diego would be any different."

Senate Democrats, too, have pressed the issue. At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said, "We never have and never will seek to remove a United States attorney to interfere with an ongoing investigation or prosecution or in retaliation for a prosecution."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, contended the Justice Department hadn't given Congress adequate information about the firings.

Emanuel Tangles With DoJ On Lam Dismissal (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 8, 2007

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales yesterday to name former U.S. Attorney Carol Lam as outside counsel so she can continue investigating the corruption case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), who is now in jail.

Lam was one of seven U.S. attorneys the Justice Department asked to resign late last year, using a little-known provision in the USA Patriot Act that allows Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors on an indefinite basis. At the time of her dismissal, Lam was investigating whether the Cunningham case involved other members of Congress and lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0129315

Beyond Cunningham, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego sent a flurry of subpoenas for records to three congressional committees in late December. According to a Democratic leadership aide, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has been working with the House General Counsel's office and was "close to a deal" last week with the assistant U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego on whether to comply with those subpoenas — and, if the papers were handed over, which documents to include.

Cunningham pleaded guilty last year to taking $2.4 million in bribes.

In a letter sent to Gonzales yesterday, Emanuel argued that keeping Lam on as an outside counsel would allow the Bush administration to dispel questions about whether Lam's firing was politically motivated.

"To remove the cloud of politics over Ms. Lam's dismissal, and to ensure there are no delays in the investigation of the Cunningham matter, I call on you to immediately name Carol Lam as outside counsel with all necessary resources to continue her excellent work on the Cunningham case and related matters," Emanuel wrote.

Emanuel highlighted Lam's record on crime and immigration prosecutions to counter explanations that she was asked to leave because she was not prosecuting enough of these cases.

"In the latest data, San Diego ranked second in terms of immigration prosecutions, and Ms. Lam had recently convicted the chiefs of the Golden State Fence Co. for hiring illegal immigrants," Emanuel wrote.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty acknowledged during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday that a U.S. attorney in Arkansas was removed so that a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove could take his spot. But McNulty insisted that the six other U.S. attorney firings were "performance-based." He also said the attorney general's appointment authority would not be used to circumvent the Senate confirmation process.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos yesterday afternoon said Gonzales had not received Emanuel's letter, so she could not comment on it specifically.

"As a general matter, U.S. attorneys leave offices for all sorts of reasons, and complex and important cases carry on with no interruption by the career prosecutors who are managing them," said Scolinos. "There's no reason to suggest that any ongoing cases in San Diego would be any different."

Former U.S. Attorney Says He Was Ordered To Resign (AP)

By Gene Johnson

AP, February 8, 2007

SEATTLE - Former U.S. Attorney John McKay told The Associated Press on Wednesday that his resignation last month was ordered by the Bush administration, which gave him no explanation for the firing.

"I was ordered to resign as U.S. attorney on Dec. 7 by the Justice Department," McKay, who had led the department's Western Washington office, said in a telephone interview from Washington, D.C. "I was given no explanation. I certainly was told of no performance issues."

McKay previously had said only that he was resigning because it was time for him to move on. His comments came one day after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty acknowledged to the Senate Judiciary Committee that the Justice Department has fired seven U.S. attorneys in the West in the past year, most of them for "performance-related" reasons he would not divulge.

The dismissals have been heavily criticized by Democratic lawmakers.

"John McKay has worked diligently for our region and it is deeply disconcerting that he could have been let go for political reasons," said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash. "Congress and the American people have no tolerance for the politicization of the U.S. attorney's office."

Robert Lasnik, the chief U.S. District Court judge for the Western District of Washington, said he and his fellow judges could not understand the firing and were dismayed that the Justice Department implied there was anything wrong with McKay's performance.

"This is unanimous among the judges: John McKay was a superb U.S. attorney," Lasnik said. "For the Justice Department to suggest otherwise is just not fair."

"By every measure, the performance of his office improved during his tenure," Lasnik added. "If you talk to local prosecutors, or local sheriffs, or the FBI or the ATF, they never had the kind of service from the U.S. attorney's office in terms of service, cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under John McKay's leadership. We're busier than ever before because they're bringing more cases."

McKay's office filed charges against twice as many defendants last year as it did in 2001, the year he was nominated by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate.

McKay announced his resignation in mid-December, about the same time he received word that he would not be nominated to the federal bench in Seattle. His last day on the job was Jan. 26, and he took a job teaching a course on constitutional law and terrorism at Seattle University Law School.

The U.S. attorney is the top federal law enforcement officer in Seattle and makes decisions on which cases to prosecute in the Western District of Washington. McKay had personally argued on the government's behalf in the sentencing and appeal of Ahmed Ressam, who was convicted of plotting to blow up Los Angeles International Airport on the eve of the millennium.

The 22-year sentence Ressam received was less than McKay sought. On appeal, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals threw out both the sentence and one of the charges Ressam was convicted of. Federal prosecutors are expected to ask a full 15-judge 9th Circuit Court panel to rehear the appeal.

King County Prosecutor Norm Maleng, who is heading a committee to help select McKay's permanent replacement, said McKay's pursuit of terror suspects, from Ressam to a local group that sought to establish a terrorist training camp in Bly, Ore., was a hallmark of his tenure, as was improving communication between state and federal law enforcement.

"That statement that it was 'performance-related,' no one can understand what was meant by that," Maleng said. "It isn't just that he did a good job. He did an outstanding job."

Tom Hillier, the federal public defender in Seattle who represented Ressam, said he was surprised, too.

"If this was done for political reasons, it shows a fundamental disrespect for the independence of the U.S. attorneys," Hillier said. "It's definitely bad policy for an administration to be accepting resignations for what it sees as performance issues, particularly if they're not giving any information about what those issues are. John McKay vigorously enforced the laws in this district."

McKay declined to say whether he had made any politically charged comments that might have drawn the ire of Justice Department officials. All U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and may be dismissed for any reason, or no reason at all.

Jeffrey C. Sullivan, chief of the criminal division in the U.S. attorney's office for Western Washington, was named to be interim U.S. attorney for the district.

A provision in the reauthorization of the Patriot Act allows the attorney general to appoint U.S. attorneys indefinitely without Senate confirmation, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has promised to submit all of his choices for confirmation.

Last year, the U.S. attorney in Arkansas, H.E. Bud Cummins, was ordered to resign without cause, McNulty acknowledged Tuesday. Cummins was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential counselor Karl Rove and a former military prosecutor.

McKay Got Good Review 7 Months Before Ouster (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 8, 2007

Seven months before he was forced to resign as U.S. attorney for the western district of Washington, John McKay received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators.

"McKay is an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the [U.S. attorney's office] and the District's law enforcement community," the team of 27 Justice Department officials concluded, according to a copy of their final report obtained by The Seattle Times.

Yet on Dec. 7, Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, called McKay and asked him to step down.

"I was told to resign by the end of January," McKay confirmed Wednesday. "I asked what the reason was, and they told me there was none.

"Ultimately, I serve at the pleasure of the president," McKay said. "I accept that now and I accepted that then, and that's why I resigned."

McKay's revelation came one day after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate judiciary committee that six U.S. attorneys had been asked to resign in December for "performance-related" issues.

Democrats convened the hearing to express concerns that the White House was purging U.S. attorneys, either to replace them with political loyalists or to penalize them for cases they prosecuted.

McNulty denied both assertions at the hearing.

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., was not satisfied.

"I would like the Justice Department to inform me exactly what it means by 'performance-related' reasons and reassure me that Mr. McKay was not dismissed solely on the basis of partisan politics," Murray wrote in a letter to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.,

DOJ_NMG_0129317

who chairs the judiciary committee. Tasia Scolinos, director of public affairs for the Department of Justice, said the department would not confirm whether McKay was asked to step down, or why.

"The department appreciates John's commitment to the job and the important work done during his tenure as U.S. attorney," Scolinos said.

McKay's forced resignation, and the suggestion that it was due to poor performance, shocked many in the Seattle legal community.

Chief U.S. District Court Judge Robert Lasnik said that among federal judges in Western Washington, "it was unanimous that our feeling was John McKay was an absolutely superb U.S. attorney, and by every measure the performance of his office improved during his tenure."

Norm Maleng, King County Prosecutor, said, "[McKay] took the U.S. attorney's office to a higher level. He reached out to every prosecutor in Western Washington, and renewed connections and hooked back into their needs."

The assessment of McKay's office by the Justice Department's Evaluation and Review Staff (EARS) was similarly laudatory.

An EARS review, as it is known inside the Justice Department, is conducted every three years of each U.S. attorney's office.

Roger McRoberts, deputy criminal chief of the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of Texas, led the team that evaluated McKay's office. McRoberts declined to comment Wednesday.

In March 2006, McRoberts and his colleagues interviewed more than 170 federal and local law-enforcement officials. Their final report gave McKay's office high marks for the productivity of its criminal division, its anti-terrorism program and its complex drug investigations.

McKay, 50, was personally commended for his collaborative relationships with federal, state and local authorities, and for reaching out to his Canadian counterparts.

"[McKay] has been responsible for major advances in a cooperative cross-border effort," the report said. "All involved in these efforts pointed to U.S. Attorney McKay as the individual most responsible for the dramatic increase in cooperation."

McKay, nominated by President Bush to be U.S. attorney in late 2001, served during a time of sweeping legal changes, such as the Patriot Act and technological advancements.

The U.S. Navy last month gave McKay its Distinguished Public Service Award, its highest civilian honor, for creating a computer network that enhances the ability of local, state and federal law enforcement to share information.

McKay personally prosecuted several high-profile cases, including the sentencing and appeals of Ahmed Ressam, who was convicted in 2001 on terrorism and explosives charges for plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on the eve of the millennium.

McKay said last month that he planned to join the faculty of Seattle University Law School.

Senators Weigh PATRIOT Act Attorney Provision (CONDAILY)

By Basil Talbott, CongressDaily

Congress Daily, February 8, 2007

Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter, R-Pa., Tuesday said he would support a bid to reverse a provision in the USA PATRIOT Act that helped facilitate what Democrats charge was the improper dismissal of seven U.S. attorneys.

Denying an accusation by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that the provision was "slipped into the PATRIOT Act in the dead of night" on his watch, Specter said he discovered it recently and agreed "We ought to change it back to what it was."

The provision authorizes the attorney general to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods.

A bill by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. to change the appointment procedure is scheduled to be voted on in the committee Wednesday.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended the provision and said turnover in U.S. attorneys was normal. He pledged to go over each case in detail in private with the committee.

McNulty conceded that one individual who was singled out, U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins, was not fired for cause.

He said Cummins was asked to make way for interim appointment of Tim Griffin, who news reports have linked with White House adviser Karl Rove.

The other six U.S. attorneys who left were asked to resign for cause, according to McNulty, who said he preferred to discuss their situations in a closed session. Schumer said he was determined to obtain all records including evaluations of those involved, and would consider using subpoena power if necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0129318

Hearing Schumer's accusations that politics might have played an improper role in the dismissals and replacements "is like a knife in my heart," McNulty said. "The attorney general and I love the Justice Department." Schumer retorted, "What I have seen happening in the Justice Department is like a knife in my heart."

Schumer said several U.S. attorneys "were apparently fired with no real explanation" and were "seemingly removed merely to make way for political up-and-comers."

McNulty said the administration should have the power of making interim appointments, but declined to give an opinion on returning to the old system.

The previous statute authorized the attorney general to make interim appointments for 120 days, and if no nomination of a full-time replacement was made by then, a district court judge would make another interim appointment.

Pals: U.S. Attorney Has Right Stuff (AD&G)

By Paul Barton

Arkansas Democrat & Gazette, February 8, 2007

Ask friends of new U. S. Attorney Tim Griffin to describe the 38-year-old prosecutor, and they gush adjectives. They call him "driven," " conscientious, " "highly intelligent" and fiercely loyal to his home state of Arkansas.

Rep. John Boozman, the lone Republican in the Arkansas delegation, is typical: "He's a very smart guy and very hard worker. He's done great no matter where he has been."

But outside the circle of Griffin's friends and many of the state's prominent conservatives, Griffin remains something of a mystery.

"I don't know many people who know anything about him," veteran Little Rock attorney Scott Trotter said. When Griffin, a Magnolia native, was appointed to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas in December, "we just sort of scratched our heads."

Said Arkansas' senior senator, Democrat Blanche Lincoln, "I really didn't know much about him, aside from what I read about him in the newspaper and what I found on Google."

Griffin's political resume — key player in both of President Bush's campaigns, deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove — is better known than his legal resume. Many saw his appointment as forcing out the popular Bud Cummins in order to reward a campaign operative.

Cummins was not among them.

He, too, was a loyal Republican and Bush backer when he was appointed in 2001. To replace him with Griffin, Cummins has said, was "entirely within the prerogative of the White House."

Deputy U. S. Attorney General Paul McNulty voiced similar sentiment during testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday.

"A lot of U. S. attorneys bring political experience to the job," he said.

McNulty acknowledged that Griffin's file as a prosecutor was "not the thickest" but argued that Griffin has more experience in that role than Cummins had in 2001.

According to Griffin's Justice Department biography, most of his prosecutorial experience is in military courts. Griffin has served 10 years in the Judge Advocate General's (JAG) Corps of the U. S. Army Reserve. A graduate of Hendrix College and Tulane Law School, he holds the rank of major.

Called to active duty in September 2005, he served as an Army prosecutor at Fort Campbell, Ky., home of the 101 st Airborne Division.

His Justice Department biography says he prosecuted 40 cases and cites one, U. S. v. Mikel.

On his 21 st birthday, Pvt. Nicholas Mikel opened fire on his fellow soldiers during morning exercises. He later admitted that he was trying to kill his platoon sergeant and was sentenced to 25 years in prison in a plea bargain.

In May 2006, Griffin was assigned to the 101 st Airborne Division and sent to Iraq. He spent four months as judge advocate general in Mosul. EARNED CUMMINS' PRAISE

Griffin has a long history as a political operative.

In 1997, he went to work for Indiana's Republican Rep. Dan Burton's Government Reform Committee, which spent the better part of three years investigating foreign contributions to the 1996 Clinton-Gore campaign.

Griffin moved to the Republican National Committee for the 2000 presidential campaign, serving as deputy research director, then as legal advisor to the Bush-Cheney recount team in Florida.

He was rewarded with an appointment as special assistant to Michael Chertoff, then the assistant attorney general.

In the summer of 2001, Chertoff sent him to Little Rock, where Griffin served a year as a special assistant to the U. S. attorney.

Half that time was under Cummins, who offered high praise in a send-off letter. “You performed at the highest level of excellence during your time here,” Cummins wrote.

In Little Rock, Griffin prosecuted firearms and drug cases and organized the Eastern District’s Project Safe Neighborhoods, the Bush administration’s attempt to reduce firearms-related violence. “Overall, you served the office extremely well,” Cummins wrote. “I believe you indicted more people during your time here than any other [assistant U. S. attorney]. You were a real workhorse, and the quality of your work was excellent.”

ASSISTANT TO ROVE As research director for the Republican National Committee in the 2004 presidential campaign, Griffin’s job was to dig up things to use against Democratic candidate John Kerry. Three months after Bush began his second term, Griffin was named special assistant to the president and deputy director of political affairs — No. 3 to Rove.

Jim Dyke, a Charleston, S. C., communications consultant, worked with Griffin at the White House.

He said last week that Griffin’s general abilities and intelligence were unmistakable, and that Griffin has a real concern about crime and the other publicpolicy challenges that confront Arkansas.

“He has a real passion for the law,” Dyke said.

Arkansas’ Republican Sen. Tim Hutchinson felt much the same about Cummins when he recommended Cummins to be U. S. attorney in 2001. “Bud is a talented, aggressive attorney with a diverse professional backg round,” Hutchinson said when Bush endorsed his choice.

Cummins, 41, was then in private practice with a focus on business litigation, and was the state director of the National Federation of Independent Business, working as a lobbyist for the small-business group.

He had previously been a law clerk for U. S. District Judge Stephen Reasoner, now deceased, and for U. S. Magistrate Judge John Forster Jr.

From 1997-98, Cummins was chief legal counsel to Gov. Mike Huckabee.

Huckabee also had appointed Cummins to serve as a special associate justice of the Arkansas Supreme Court on five occasions.

Less than two months before Hutchinson offered his name, on Dec. 18, 2000, Cummins cast one of Arkansas’ six Electoral College votes for George W. Bush.

In an interview last week with The Washington Post, Cummins reiterated that “the political aspect of it shouldn’t really be a shock to anybody.”

He added: “Every U. S. attorney knows they serve at the pleasure of the president.” Information for this article was contributed by Linda Satter and Alex Daniels of the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette.

"Resignation" Of U.S. Attorneys (DENP)

Denver Post, February 8, 2007

The dismissals of at least seven U.S. attorneys in the West is a vivid reminder of just how far the Bush administration will go to circumvent Congress.

The groundwork for the purge was laid last year by Justice Department officials, who finagled the insertion of a measure into reauthorization of the Patriot Act. It allowed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint "interim" U.S. attorneys indefinitely - in other words, without Senate confirmation. It is another of the administration's schemes to operate without the proper oversight of Congress.

No one noticed the provision, not even Republican Sen. Arlen Specter, whose staff was bamboozled into inserting it. But once the law went into effect, the firings began.

San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, who prosecuted Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham for taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors, was unceremoniously forced out by the administration. She was in the middle of pursuing co-conspirators when her "resignation" was announced last month.

A Justice Department official testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday said Lam's dismissal was "performance related." Of that we have no doubt.

And then there is the case of Arkansas U.S. Attorney Ed Cummins, who was fired without cause after the administration decided to give his job to a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove. The new hire has "more experience," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the judiciary panel.

Others pushed out include Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, John McKay in Seattle, David Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel Bogden in Nevada and Paul Charlton in Arizona.

DOJ_NMG_0129320

The Justice Department, of course, disavows any ulterior motives in the shuffle. "When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart," McNulty told skeptical lawmakers.

The firings will have a chilling effect on all federal prosecutors, as McNulty well knows. U.S. attorneys should be empowered to pursue justice wherever the road takes them. They certainly shouldn't fear for their jobs because the administration wants to reward the well-connected, or because their exercise of judgment could be seen as unwelcome independence.

Congress should act quickly to reinstate time limits on interim U.S. attorney appointments, a move supported by Specter and many other lawmakers. Scrutiny of these appointments will protect the country from nominees whose fidelity is to the White House instead of the Constitution.

Politics? What Politics? (MCA)

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 8, 2007

The Justice Department had a chance to defend its dismissal of H.E. Cummins III, the United States attorney for Eastern Arkansas, along with six other U.S. attorneys across the country. Apparently the move was indefensible.

Cummins, 47, best known in the Mid-South for prosecuting police corruption cases, was replaced by interim U.S. Atty. J. Timothy Griffin, 38, a protege of presidential adviser Karl Rove and a former Republican Party opposition researcher.

Advertisement

Offered a chance to explain the move at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing this week, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty said he knew of no complaints about Cummins' service.

This after Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said: "I think I would never, ever, make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing, serious investigation."

Could the credibility of the administration get worse?

The losers here go beyond Cummins and the Senate, which didn't get a chance to vet Cummins' replacement because of a little-known provision of last year's reauthorization of the Patriot Act that allows the White House to circumvent the Senate approval process with open-ended interim appointments. The people of Eastern Arkansas have lost a capable federal prosecutor with a formidable record of public service.

Griffin could turn out to be capable as well. But he enters office under a cloud of doubt, created by an administration that has manipulated the Patriot Act to consolidate presidential power to an unprecedented degree.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Classified Data Impasse In Nacchio Trial (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 8, 2007

The Department of Justice said in a new court filing that it is at an impasse with attorneys for former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio over how the parties will handle the introduction of certain classified information during the course of his criminal insider trading trial.

Nacchio's attorneys have said they plan to use classified information to defend him against 42 counts of illegal insider trading.

Prosecutors said in the filing that an unnamed government agency believes its identity will be disclosed under the defense's proposed handling of certain top-secret information.

"The agency believes that the defendant's proposals, if adopted, will reveal the agency's identity," Justice Department attorneys wrote in the filing.

The government asked U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham to rule on its proposed handling of the information.

A hearing is scheduled for Thursday.

Nacchio faces 42 counts of illegal insider trading connected to his sale of $101 million in Qwest stock in early 2001. The government alleges Nacchio sold the stock while he knew the company's finances were deteriorating.

Nacchio has pleaded not guilty. He faces up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each count. His attorneys have said he had a rosy outlook for Qwest at the time of the stock sales because he knew the company was in line to receive large top-secret government contracts.

The trial is set for March 19.

Prosecutors, Nacchio Lawyers at Impasse Over Secret Evidence

DENVER (AP) -- Prosecutors say they are at an impasse with former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio's attorneys over the best way to describe some of the classified material to be used at his trial on insider trading charges.

The evidence includes government documents that must be withheld from the public under federal law. Attorneys for both sides have been working on substitute explanations for the documents that can be made public without violating the law.

Representatives of a federal agency have said they believe a description proposed by defense attorneys will reveal the agency's identity, prosecutor Leo Wise said.

"After discussions between the parties, it now appears that the parties are at an impasse on this issue," Wise wrote in a brief filed late Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham has scheduled a hearing in the case Thursday afternoon to discuss pending issues ahead of the March 19 trial.

The brief was filed the same day Nacchio's attorneys sought a 60-day postponement in the trial, contending prosecutors have been so slow in turning over evidence that Nacchio's rights could be jeopardized if the trial starts as scheduled.

At issue are witness interviews and other documents that Nacchio's attorneys say may help his defense, a contention prosecutors have disputed.

Defense attorney Herbert Stern told Nottingham that he needs the additional time to evaluate material that prosecutors have turned over in recent weeks, including six CD-ROMs of documents that Stern said he was made aware of Monday.

Prosecutors have countered that evidence exchange has been hampered because of the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets strict guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts.

The act requires attorneys and the judge to receive Justice Department security clearances before they are able to review the contracts in secure facilities.

Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge that Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets.

He has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts which made him more optimistic about the Denver-based telephone company's financial future.

Separately, Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue. That case is pending.

Brocade Attorneys Take Shot At Killing Case (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 8, 2007

The initial casualties of the government's massive stock option backdating probe had their first chance to try to get their cases thrown out of court on Wednesday.

But after an hour of arguments, it seemed unlikely that U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer would dismiss some of the fraud counts against former Brocade Communications CEO Gregory Reyes and ex-HR manager Stephanie Jensen.

The motion to dismiss seven criminal counts is part of a two-pronged effort -- made possible by Breyer's insistence that criminal and civil government cases proceed together -- to gut criminal and civil SEC charges accusing the defendants of backdating employee stock options to recruit and retain top talent during the dot-com boom.

The other prong, a motion for summary judgment on the civil side, was filed late Monday.

At Wednesday's hearing, a lawyer for Reyes -- Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom partner Christopher Gunther -- argued that an August decision by the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals should invalidate seven counts in the indictment. Reyes is indicted on 12 counts and Jensen on eight. Gunther's energetic presentation included a chalkboard drawing and a stroll across the courtroom to display how far "out on a limb" prosecutors were going with their case.

The opinion he cited, U.S. v. Brown, 2006 WL 2130525, found that a person cannot be convicted on charges of denial of honest services if he or she was acting in the best interests of the company.

And, Gunther said, the government's indictment says that Reyes and Jensen manipulated options grants not for their own gain, but to benefit the company.

"This is a case that's got no victim, and it's got no ill-gotten gains," he said.

Breyer seemed interested in the Brown arguments and asked the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal, whether the Department of Justice had decided how to deal with the case's fallout.

"Right now, the only policy I'm aware of, your honor, is that Brown was wrongly decided," Steskal said. He also told the judge that it's possible that later in the case, when the government produces its evidence, it could offer support for behavior that would involve self-dealing.

In the end, Breyer seemed inclined to not dismiss the indictments -- at least not right away -- since the honest services issues could be revisited later in the case.

But even if the judge doesn't dismiss the criminal counts, the defendants are holding out hope that a collateral motion could make that moot.

In their summary judgment arguments in the SEC's civil case against Brocade, Reyes' lead lawyer, Skadden partner Richard Marmaro, argues that none of the alleged wrongdoing at Brocade resulted in material damage to the company.

Since most of the backdated options were never exercised, the expenses they incurred, Marmaro said, were predominantly limited to paper, and didn't extend to the company's cash flow. And therefore, he argues, there was no damage to the company.

"For securities fraud to exist, there must be fraud," Marmaro wrote. "For 'fraud,' there must be a victim and a materially false statement. Here, there is neither."

The motion included hundreds of pages of financial analyses, news stories and formerly privileged internal company documents relating to the expense issue.

After the hearing Wednesday, Marmaro argued that if the summary judgment motion is successful -- and Breyer rules in the civil case that there was no material damage to the company -- the judge would have to reconsider whether the criminal case should move ahead.

"Who was the victim of this conduct?" Marmaro asked.

Maxim Ruling Opens Door For Backdating Cases (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

An influential Delaware judge issued a strongly worded opinion that could open the doors to more shareholder derivative lawsuits against companies alleged to have backdated stock options.

William Chandler, chancellor of the Delaware Court of Chancery, ruled Tuesday that certain claims brought by a shareholder of Maxim Integrated Products, Inc., a Sunnyvale, Calif., chip maker, against several current and former board members could go forward despite defendants' objections.

Separately, Maxim last week said an internal probe overseen by a special committee of its board found backdating of options to its employees and directors, though options for top officers were "properly granted." The company said it expects to restate results back to at least 2000.

John Donovan, a securities litigator at Ropes & Gray LLP in Boston, says the Delaware decision is surprising and is likely to be influential. "Until now, there have only been a handful of rulings on derivative suits in backdating cases," and in general they have favored defendants, he says. This decision is likely to have more weight, says Mr. Donovan, in part because the Delaware Chancery Court is among the most influential in the country on corporate law issues. And Chancellor "Chandler is the first among equals for a very influential court." Mr. Donovan represents companies or boards in suits involving alleged backdating.

The suit, brought by Walter E. Ryan, is called a derivative suit, in which a shareholder technically sues on behalf of the corporation itself. To file a successful derivative suit, a plaintiff generally must first ask the board to remedy the alleged problem. But that requirement may not apply if a plaintiff can raise a reason to doubt that board members were complicit in the alleged behavior.

Defendants moved to dismiss the case on a variety of grounds, among them that Mr. Ryan had failed to take the backdating issue to the board. Chancellor Chandler denied the motion on that point, ruling that because "one half of the current board members approved each challenged transaction," the requirement to ask for board approval wasn't necessary.

"I am convinced that the intentional violation of a shareholder approved stock option plan, coupled with fraudulent disclosures regarding the directors' purported compliance with that plan, constitute conduct that is disloyal to the corporation and is therefore an act in bad faith," Chancellor Chandler wrote. He dismissed claims concerning transactions that occurred before the plaintiff owned shares.

As part of Maxim's announcement last week, Carl Jasper, the company's chief financial officer, resigned. John F. Gifford, the company's founder, stepped down as chief executive in December, and retired as a company adviser just before the release of the special committee probe's findings last week.

Questions continue to swirl around Maxim's options-granting practices. Although the internal probe found that all options for top officers -- including Mr. Gifford -- were "properly granted," Maxim hasn't explained its pattern of past option grants. From 1995 to 2001, four grants to top officials were dated at quarterly low points in Maxim's stock price, often at the bottom of steep dips, and three others were at monthly lows.

In addition, Mr. Gifford exhibited fortunate timing when he later exercised his grants. He exercised and held onto the resulting Maxim shares seven times from 1997 through 2002, according to regulatory filings and insider-trading data from Thomson Financial. In all but one case he did so on the day Maxim's stock reached its lowest closing price of the month.

A Maxim spokesman has said the company is continuing to look into past exercises of stock options. A lawyer for Mr. Gifford didn't comment. A lawyer representing several other defendants declined to comment.

In Bribe Probe, Siemens Ex-Staffer Cites Payment (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl In Frankfurt And David Crawford In Berlin

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

A former Siemens AG executive alleged to have negotiated a $50 million payment to cover up bribes in Saudi Arabia is cooperating with German authorities, according to people familiar with the matter.

The executive's assistance could lend momentum to a widening international investigation into alleged corruption at the German conglomerate.

Police raided Siemens's offices in mid-November and arrested several suspects. Prosecutors suspect senior Siemens employees set up sham consulting contracts to bribe potential customers.

Siemens is cooperating with prosecutors. The company said in December it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions spanning seven years.

The prosecutor's office in Munich yesterday said it released a former Siemens employee who had turned himself in for questioning last week.

It would only identify the witness as "J.-C.S.," adding that the person had traveled to Germany from Argentina and made extensive statements to authorities.

People familiar with the situation said the witness -- who is also a suspect -- is Juan-Carlos Stotz, 43 years old, a former telecommunications-equipment executive suspended late last year by Siemens.

Mr. Stotz allegedly helped broker a $50 million settlement in 2004 with a Saudi consulting firm that had threatened to forward documents to U.S. authorities detailing bribes paid on the German company's behalf, according to another key suspect cooperating with German authorities.

That suspect, Michael Kutschenreuter, the former finance chief at the telecom unit, also told prosecutors after being arrested in November that top management -- including Klaus Kleinfeld, now the chief executive of Siemens, and Heinrich von Pierer, the CEO at the time -- were informed of the payment, which he described as "hush money."

German prosecutors are investigating Mr. Kutschenreuter's claims -- as well as claims by witnesses of widespread bribes in other countries -- as they try to determine how high up the corporate ladder the alleged corruption traveled.

Siemens says it has "zero tolerance" for illegal payments and that any wrongdoing that might have occurred was the result of "individual acts" by renegade managers. It suspended Mr. Kutschenreuter late last year.

The company would only confirm yesterday that Mr. Stotz was an "active" employee of Siemens until late last year.

Siemens says no bribes or hush money were paid in its dispute with the Saudi company, Beit Al Etisallat. Messrs. Kleinfeld and von Pierer say they were never aware of any illegal payments.

The company has said it agreed to settle with Beit Al Etisallat in early 2005 and that a Riyadh court certified the settlement.

The $50 million payment was made after the Saudi firm filed a claim saying it was owed $910 million in damages after the German company ended its contract in 2000.

Prosecutors released a half-dozen suspects -- including Mr. Kutschenreuter -- in December.

Mr. Kutschenreuter told prosecutors in December that he dispatched Mr. Stotz to London in 2004 to meet with Abdul Wahab Al-Akeel, the head of Beit Al Etisallat. Mr. Stotz returned to Germany with documents detailing bribes paid by Siemens to win contracts with Saudi Telecom, according to witness statements by Mr. Kutschenreuter reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Kutschenreuter said he informed Mr. Kleinfeld and other senior executives in writing in April 2004 of the situation, and that Mr. Stotz continued to negotiate a settlement with Mr. Akeel while Mr. von Pierer and other Siemens officials also got involved. He said the $50 million payment to Beit Al Etisallat, finalized in early 2005, included $17 million for past obligations and described the rest as "hush money."

The Munich prosecutor's office declined to comment on Mr. Kutschenreuter's allegations or the role of Mr. Stotz in the investigation. Mr. Stotz couldn't be reached for comment.

The highest-ranking executive arrested thus far in the probe is Thomas Ganswindt, a member of Siemens's management board until September 2006.

German prosecutors also have said that Heinz-Joachim Neubürger -- Siemens's chief financial officer until last April -- is a suspect.

Mr. Ganswindt's lawyer said his client isn't guilty. A lawyer for Mr. Neubürger declined to comment.

The Munich prosecutor's office said it has interrogated more than 30 people and that it is working with prosecutors in Switzerland, Italy and Liechtenstein.

Siemens last week said the U.S. Department of Justice is also conducting an investigation into possible criminal wrongdoing and that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission had begun an informal inquiry.

The company has hired an outside auditor and says it has taken additional steps to beef up its compliance.

FAULTY ASSUMPTIONS In Home-Lending Push, Banks Misjudged Risk (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

When the U.S. housing market was booming, HSBC Holdings PLC raced to join the party. Sensing opportunity in the bottom end of the mortgage market, the giant British bank bet big on borrowers with sketchy credit records.

Such subprime customers have always been risky, but HSBC figured it could control that risk. In 2005 and 2006, it bought billions of dollars of subprime loans from other lenders, lured by the higher interest rates they carry.

Now, the party is over for HSBC -- and for lots of other bankers who aimed to cash in on the housing boom of the first half of this decade. When interest rates ticked up and the market cooled, HSBC reached a disconcerting conclusion: Its systems for screening subprime borrowers and for assessing the default risk they posed were flawed.

Many of those loans have soured, sometimes quickly. The percentage of HSBC mortgages more than 60 days past due is climbing. Fraud by borrowers has been higher than expected. "We made some decisions that could have been better," says Tom Detelich, the HSBC executive in the U.S. spearheading an effort to clean up the mortgage portfolio. 1

In a surprise announcement late yesterday, HSBC said its subprime-mortgage problem was worse than previously indicated. It said the capital it sets aside to cover all bad debts, including the soured mortgages, would be 20%, or $1.76 billion, higher than analysts' consensus estimates. "The impact of slowing house price growth is being reflected in accelerated delinquency trends across the U.S. subprime mortgage market, particularly in the more recent loans," the bank said.

HSBC's mortgage woes provide a window into the economic hangover brought on by the end of the housing boom. In recent months, mortgage bankers have taken a place beside home builders, condominium developers and real-estate agents, all of them struggling to adjust to a new housing landscape.

London-based HSBC, the world's third-largest bank by market value and one of the biggest subprime lenders in the U.S., is one of several lenders to stumble in its dealings with low-end borrowers. Subprime mortgage lending surged over the past several years, and these days, subprime mortgages comprise about 12% of the roughly $8.4 trillion U.S. mortgage market, up from 7.5% of the market in late 2001, according to First American LoanPerformance, a San Francisco research firm.

Seattle-based Washington Mutual Inc. said last month that its subprime mortgage portfolio suffered in the fourth quarter. Four smaller mortgage lenders from which HSBC bought loans have disclosed problems: Carrollton, Texas-based Sebring Capital said that as of Dec. 1 it had ceased operations and was no longer accepting loan applications; Ownit Mortgage Solutions Inc. of Agoura Hills, Calif., filed for bankruptcy-court protection just after Christmas; and Fieldstone Investment Corp. and Accredited Home Lenders Holding Co., both public companies, have reported disappointing financial results.

HSBC is working to contain the damage and to persuade investors that it has learned from its mistakes. It has hired more people to seek payments from borrowers and has installed an executive schooled in workouts at the worst-hit division, HSBC Mortgage Services.

The troubled subprime mortgages represent only a small slice of HSBC's overall consumer-loan portfolio. But some analysts attribute the poor performance of HSBC's stock to the weakness of its U.S. consumer-finance operations. Over the past year, its shares have been flat in London trading, while the Dow Jones Wilshire Global Banks index has risen 19%.

HSBC, a 142-year-old bank with operations in 76 countries and territories, got into the U.S. consumer-finance business in 2003 with its $14 billion purchase of Household International Inc. Household, a big subprime lender based in Prospect Heights,

DOJ_NMG_0129325

Ill., had been criticized for allegedly predatory lending practices and, shortly before the HSBC deal, had reached a $484 million settlement with state regulators. HSBC saw Household as a way to diversify beyond Europe and Asia, and viewed subprime mortgage lending as a far less competitive business than lending to more credit-worthy customers.

After the deal was announced, Household's then-chief executive, William Aldinger, bragged that Household employed 150 Ph.D.s skilled at modeling credit risk. Household had developed a system for assessing consumer-lending risk -- called the Worldwide Household International Revolving Lending System, or Whirl -- which it used to underwrite credit-card debt and to collect from consumers in the U.S., United Kingdom, Middle East and Mexico.

Complicated Web

The mortgage market in the U.S. is a complicated web of mutually dependent businesses. Mortgages are frequently bought and sold several times over, and the default risk often lands far from the institution that originated a mortgage. Banks and mortgage brokers size up would-be borrowers and make the loans. These lenders sell many of the loans to mortgage wholesalers, which gather them into pools and flip them to large financial institutions or banks like HSBC. Some of these buyers, including Wall Street investment banks, package the mortgages as securities for sale to investors, a process known as securitization.

HSBC Mortgage Services, a South Carolina-based arm of the bank, was active in several parts of this web. One unit, called Decision One Mortgage Co., originated mortgages, many of them to subprime borrowers. HSBC sold some of these loans, but it held others as investments, collecting the interest income they generated and shouldering the risk of loss if they soured.

But the old Household branch network didn't reach everywhere, and HSBC was eager to boost the size of its mortgage business quickly. So it became a big buyer of subprime loans originated by others, which it held in its own portfolio. It purchased loans from approximately 250 wholesale mortgage companies, which themselves bought the loans from independent brokers and banks.

In 2006, the main operations of HSBC Mortgage Services moved from Charlotte, N.C., to a new Fort Mill, S.C., facility, which HSBC said offered 60% more space to accommodate expected growth. The unit also added to its mortgage-processing staff in Florida.

HSBC focused on buying second-lien loans. Also known as piggyback loans, they allow home buyers who are unable to scrape together down-payment money to borrow it. By cobbling together a bigger first mortgage from one lender and a second-lien loan often from another, home buyers can borrow 100% of the purchase price of a home. In the event of default, the first-mortgage lender has first claim on the property, which leaves the second-lien lender in a riskier position. For that reason, second-lien loans carry higher interest rates -- making them potentially more lucrative for lenders.

HSBC bought lots of mortgages. It was the top buyer of loans from Fieldstone Investment in Columbia, Md., a large mortgage originator. According to Fieldstone's securities filings, HSBC bought Fieldstone mortgages with a face value of $1.2 billion in 2005. By March 2006, the second-lien loans on HSBC's balance sheet totaled $10.24 billion, up from $6.3 billion in September 2005.

Bobby Mehta, HSBC's top executive in the U.S., said the bank was building its mortgage portfolio in a disciplined manner. "We've done them conservatively based on analytics and based on our ability to earn a good return for the risks that we undertake," he told investors in May 2005.

Tricky Business

Assessing the quality of big mortgage pools and predicting how many of the loans will go bad is a tricky business. Typically, HSBC would first specify to a mortgage wholesaler what kind of loan pool it was looking for, based on the income and credit scores of borrowers. Then it would send in its analysts to review the portfolio.

Zan Hamilton, chief executive officer of Lime Financial in Oregon, says his mortgage origination firm got used to having HSBC employees hunched over their computers sorting through mortgages for sale, trying to ensure they met HSBC's standards.

Some decisions later proved to be mistakes. To speed up these purchases from other lenders, HSBC accepted loan paperwork that didn't verify whether borrowers made as much as they claimed. Mortgages that rely on the borrower's word about that are called "stated-income" loans. (More conservative lenders might demand full documentation of income.)

As the real-estate market boomed in recent years, subprime loans were in hot demand by Wall Street banks and other investors, thanks to the higher interest rates paid by subprime borrowers. This competitive market prompted HSBC and others to seek riskier loans from less credit-worthy borrowers.

Lenders typically base their calculations of a borrower's credit-worthiness on credit ratings known as FICO scores, which are generated by Fair Isaac Corp. of Minneapolis. FICO scores are used to assess applicants for credit cards, auto loans and fixed-rate mortgages, among other things.

DOJ_NMG_0129326

But FICO scores had not yet been put to the test in predicting the performance, during a weakening housing market, of second-lien loans taken out by subprime borrowers. The same was true for adjustable-rate mortgages to subprime borrowers, which HSBC also purchased.

"There was very little data on loans to subprime borrowers where the borrower put very little down," says Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va.

Chris Freemott, president of All American Mortgage Inc. in Naperville, Ill., says it was a time when "everyone lowered their credit standards" in what he refers to as "a race to the bottom." Adds Mr. Hamilton at Lime Financial: "People got way too aggressive in pricing, and they weren't pricing for the risk."

HSBC acknowledges that it erred in the way it assessed such subprime mortgages. "What is now clear is that FICO scores are less effective or ineffective" when lenders are granting loans in an unusually low interest-rate environment, Douglas Flint, HSBC's finance director, told investors in December. A spokesman for Fair Isaac says the company simply provides credit scores, and it is up to lenders to decide how to use them.

In 2005, HSBC stepped up its mortgage buying. By early 2006, interest rates were rising and home-price appreciation was slowing. The rate increases made it difficult for some borrowers to lower their monthly payments by refinancing, one way that borrowers in a financial pinch try to avoid default.

Some of HSBC's loans turned bad swiftly. Cynthia Soto and her husband Frank got a second mortgage from HSBC in May 2005 on their Grove City, Ohio, home. Ms. Soto, now 53 years old, says she was struggling with disabilities connected to heart troubles, and that she needed a kidney removed. Her husband works at an auto-parts plant. The Sotos wanted the money to pay off credit-card debt.

Second mortgages can be risky for lenders, because the first-mortgage lender has first claim on the home in event of default. Just one year after getting the $32,000 loan, the Soto's filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy protection. "After raising three kids and having to come down to that, it was pretty hard," Mrs. Soto says. In bankruptcy-court documents, the Sotos, whose first mortgage is also with HSBC, maintained that there isn't enough equity in their 39-year-old home to cover the second HSBC loan.

Loans that HSBC purchased from other originators also began going bad. HSBC, for example, held the mortgage on Radames Mendez Jr. and Shana Ramos's Pennsylvania home. Bay Capital, a Maryland lender, had made the loan in June 2005, then transferred it to HSBC, according to federal court records. By April 2006, the borrowers had fallen behind on their payments, according to a complaint HSBC filed last September, seeking payment of $170,718.02 in principal due on the mortgage. In court papers, a local sheriff said he'd been unable to locate the couple to serve them with the foreclosure papers.

Mortgage lenders expect to see delinquencies and defaults climb in such an environment, and they plan for it. But by early 2006, HSBC was seeing indications that delinquencies were going to be worse than expected.

At first, HSBC executives say, the bank thought the defaults were tied to a change in U.S. bankruptcy laws in 2005, which prompted a spike in bankruptcy filings by consumers. But after a few more months of data rolled in, HSBC officials concluded they had a broader problem.

Last August, HSBC issued a memo to companies from which it was buying loans. The paper, called "Threads of Early Payment Default," reported that delinquencies were rising. HSBC said mortgage lenders had seen "a wealth of surprising data" on loans originated in 2005, including "surges" in 60-day-past-due delinquencies, particularly on "borrower-friendly" second-lien loans, and "heightened fraud incidents."

When borrowers didn't have to verify their incomes, the report said, they were overstating them, and they bolstered their false claims by overstating their job positions. HSBC recommended that originators verify employment by phoning human-resources departments and asking questions such as: "How many years has John worked there?" and "What is his title?"

HSBC has told investors that its second-lien loan portfolio represents just 6% of HSBC Finance Corp.'s $177 billion U.S. consumer-loan portfolio, which includes mortgages, auto loans and credit-card receivables. The percentage of loans in that larger pool that are 60 days or more past due rose to 3.99% at the end of September, from 3.57% three months earlier.

Limiting Damage

HSBC is trying to limit the damage. Last August, it installed a new head of HSBC Mortgage Services: Mr. Detelich, who had overhauled HSBC's U.S. consumer-lending business after Household's 2002 predatory-lending settlement with state regulators.

HSBC doubled to 875 the number of employees in Tampa and nearby Brandon who contact customers about missed payments and try to work out payment plans. That operation now runs seven days a week. HSBC is using computers to try to identify borrowers who will have the most trouble making monthly payments after their adjustable-rate mortgages, or ARMs, adjust upward.

This year is expected to be particularly tough for some holders of adjustable-rate subprime mortgages. Holders of ARMs originated in 2005 and 2006 and that reset after two years could face monthly payment increases of as much as $500, according to Fitch Ratings. That could mean more trouble for HSBC, which holds many such loans.

HSBC is hiring "ARM modification specialists" in Tampa to help troubled borrowers. The bank says it is willing to stop short of jacking up rates as much as it is entitled to if that would help borrowers avoid default -- but only case-by-case.

The bank has stopped making and buying loans where borrower income hasn't been verified, and it has raised the FICO scores needed for certain loans. "Ensuring the customer can make payment is good for us and good for the customer," says Mr. Detelich.

H-P Names General Counsel (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

Hewlett-Packard Co. appointed Michael Holston executive vice president and general counsel, succeeding Ann Baskins, who resigned in September over her role in H-P's board-investigation scandal.

Mr. Holston, 44 years old, is a partner at the law firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP. He led H-P's internal review of the leak investigation and has worked with H-P as external counsel for more than a decade, H-P said. His new responsibilities will include the company's legal affairs in addition to other areas such as compliance, privacy and ethics.

In a statement, Chief Executive Mark Hurd said "Mike is a first-rate lawyer, with extensive trial and government-relations experience."

H-P declined to make Mr. Hurd or Mr. Holston available for comment.

In September, H-P disclosed that external investigators retained by the company had used pretexting -- gaining access to private phone records through false pretences -- to spy on board members, employees, reporters and others in an investigation to ferret out boardroom leaks. The scandal resulted in the resignation of Patricia Dunn as chairman and investigations by several government agencies.

That month, Mr. Hurd asked Morgan Lewis to conduct an independent review of its leak investigation. Mr. Holston conducted the review and reported directly to Mr. Hurd. Another law firm had initially investigated the affair on behalf of the board.

Mr. Holston told reporters in September that Mr. Hurd attended a July 2005 meeting at which a summary of the first phase of the leak investigation was discussed, but Mr. Holston didn't specify if pretexting was mentioned in the meeting. Mr. Hurd also received a report on the investigation in March 2006 that explained pretexting but contained assurances that the tactics were legal, Mr. Holston disclosed. Mr. Hurd said he didn't read the report.

Fallout from the scandal included criminal charges by the California attorney general against Ms. Dunn, who pleaded not guilty. Ms. Baskins, was never charged. She declined to testify as part of a congressional investigation into the matter.

In appointing Mr. Holston. Mr. Hurd passed over Charles Charnas, acting general counsel for the company. Mr. Charnas was part of Ms. Baskins's team at H-P, but has not been implicated.

The appointment follows others Mr. Hurd has made in the wake of the scandal. In October, Mr. Hurd hired his former general counsel at NCR Corp. to serve as vice president and chief ethics and compliance officer, filling the shoes of Kevin Hunsaker, a former H-P executive who resigned for his role in the leak investigation and was also indicted by the California attorney general. He has pleaded not guilty.

Prior to joining Morgan Lewis, Mr. Holston was a prosecutor for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania U.S. Attorney's Office.

Mr. Holston's appointment is effective Feb. 22. He will be based in H-P's Palo Alto, Calif., headquarters and will report directly to Mr. Hurd. He also will join the company's executive council.

Judge Rejects Raines's Request To Accelerate Trial Date (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

A judge yesterday rejected former Fannie Mae chief executive Franklin D. Raines's request that the government be compelled to begin a trial this month on administrative charges that he manipulated the company's earnings.

Accelerating such an extensive case "would be nothing short of an absurdity," administrative law Judge William B. Moran said at a scheduling conference.

Raines had argued that he was entitled to have the proceeding begin within 60 days of the filing of charges, which occurred in December.

DOJ_NMG_0129328

The federal agency that filed the charges, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, had proposed a timetable that left the trial date open but gave the parties until nearly the end of this year to file pretrial statements.

Noting that Raines and other former Fannie Mae executives are seeking millions of pages of government documents for use in their defense, the judge said Raines's position was "specious and somewhat disingenuous."

Citing a Supreme Court decision in a previous case, the judge said the statute required that the scheduling conference, not the evidentiary hearing, occur within 60 days of the filing of charges. In future arguments, Moran warned, lawyers in the case should tell the court about case law that runs contrary to their positions.

Kevin Downey, an attorney for Raines, told the judge that if the trial begins this month, the burden on the defense would be comparable to the burden on the regulators. This week, a spokesman for Raines framed the request for a February trial date as an issue of fairness.

District-based Fannie Mae, which was chartered by the federal government to promote housing affordability, recently corrected its books to show that it had overstated past profits by $6.3 billion.

Regulators are seeking to recoup more than $115 million of compensation that they say Raines and two other former executives received while Fannie Mae's financial results were misstated. The regulators also are seeking penalties that could exceed $100 million.

Charged along with Raines are former Fannie Mae chief financial officer J. Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne G. Spencer. They joined Raines in pressing for the trial to begin this month.

"We're ready to go . . . simple as that," David S. Krakoff, an attorney for Spencer, told the judge. "What's really behind OFHEO's position is they're not ready to go . . . and they should be ready to go."

In response to Krakoff's protest, Moran reiterated that calling for a Feb. 16 start date was "really disingenuous," adding, "It's not a fair argument to make."

The judge's ruling yesterday could defer the conclusion of the case until next year.

However, in a second track of their defense strategy, the three former executives are trying to have the case moved out of the administrative law arena and into U.S. District Court. They note that the administrative law judge's role would be to make a recommendation to the OFHEO director, and they say the director, James B. Lockhart III, has prejudged the case.

Speaking from the bench yesterday, Moran said he would be a fair and impartial judge, and he said the OFHEO director can't "willy-nilly ignore" a judge's findings.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Officials Indict 5 In Iraq Contract Scam (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) Three U.S. Army Reserve officers were indicted Wednesday, accused of taking part in a bid-rigging scam that steered millions of dollars for Iraq reconstruction projects to a contractor in exchange for cash, luxury cars and jewelry.

An American businessman in Romania was charged as the go-between for the military officers and the contractor. The husband of one of the reservists was accused of helping smuggle tens of thousands of dollars into the United States that the couple used to pay for a deck and a hot tub at their New Jersey house.

Together, the five used the $26 billion Iraqi rebuilding fund "as their own personal ATM machines," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in announcing the charges.

"These defendants actually took bricks of stolen cash ... and smuggled them out of Iraq and back to the United States for their own personal use," McNulty said.

The 25-count indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in New Jersey, marks the latest development in an investigation of $8.6 million in Iraq contracts awarded to construction mogul Philip H. Bloom.

Bloom, an American citizen who ran construction and services companies under Global Business Group, has admitted to laundering at least $2 million that was stolen from reconstruction funds managed by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. He awaits sentencing.

McNulty said the five people indicted Wednesday stole or otherwise misused $3.6 million from the CPA fund.

The three reservists - Col. Curtis G. Whiteford of Utah, Lt. Col. Debra M. Harrison of New Jersey and Lt. Col. Michael B. Wheeler of Wisconsin - were responsible for helping supervise the funding and progress of the CPA contracts in al-Hillah, Iraq, southwest of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0129329

In return for steering contracts to Bloom between 2003 and 2005, prosecutors said, the military reservists and their accomplices shared an estimated $1 million in cash, and were showered with Porsche and Nissan sports cars, a Cadillac SUV, real estate, a Breitling watch, business-class plane tickets, computers and other items.

Harrison's husband, William Driver, was charged with helping smuggle over $300,000 into the U.S., part of which was used for home improvements, prosecutors said.

One of Bloom's friends, businessman Seymour Morris Jr., allegedly acted as a go-between for the military officers and the construction company by illegally wiring money and securing the goods. Morris is a U.S. citizen who lives in Romania, and owns a Cyprus-based financial services business.

Charges against the five include bribery, conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and transporting stolen property.

The indictment was unsealed the day after authorities arrested Morris in Romania. It also followed tough questioning Tuesday by House Democrats of the former U.S. occupation chief in Iraq over how he doled out up to $12 billion in Iraqi money without accounting for it.

At that hearing, in front of the a House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, L. Paul Bremer III repeatedly said he had spent Iraqi - not U.S. - money. Bremer ran the country for 14 months.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents helped unravel the scheme by examining money trails and other data gleaned from computers, cell phones, global positioning systems and other devices, said Kumar Kibble, the agency's deputy assistant director for national security.

Stuart Bowen, the government's special inspector general in Iraq, said his team of 10 investigators are pursuing 80 cases of waste, fraud and abuse of taxpayer dollars in reconstruction contracts.

Last week, former CPA comptroller and funding officer Robert Stein, 52, of Fayetteville, N.C., was sentenced to nine years in prison for receiving kickbacks from Bloom in exchange for contracts.

Bribery and fraud "has not been a significant component of the American reconstruction experience over there, but where we found it, it has been egregious," Bowen said. "And this is an egregious example of it."

Officers Charged With Rigging Reconstruction Bids (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Three high-ranking U.S. Army Reserve officers were charged Wednesday with steering more than $8.6 million in Iraqi reconstruction contracts to a U.S. businessman in exchange for cash, luxury cars, liquor and other payoffs.

Col. Curtis Whiteford of Riverton, Utah, Lt. Col. Debra Harrison of Trenton, N.J., and Lt. Col. Michael Wheeler of Amherst Junction, Wis., allegedly rigged the bids for more than 27 projects for businessman Philip Bloom, according to a 25-count indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Trenton.

In return, the officers received luxury cars, including a $50,000 Cadillac Escalade SUV, Breitling watches worth $3,200 each, business-class airline tickets and other goods, the indictment said.

Harrison's husband, William Driver, also was charged with four counts of money laundering for allegedly helping to smuggle some of the stolen money into the USA and using it to build a deck and a hot tub at their New Jersey home.

Some of the alleged bribes are detailed in e-mails. One Defense Department civilian employee allegedly involved in the operation told Bloom in an e-mail that he had won a contract for construction at an Iraqi police academy, the indictment said. "I will give you 200K some time tomorrow! I love to give you money," the e-mail said.

The officers allegedly kept the contracts under the $500,000 threshold that would have required approval by a board in Baghdad, the indictment said.

Bloom, who lived and ran his businesses in Romania, pleaded guilty April 18 to conspiracy, bribery and money laundering. Bloom admitted paying more than $2 million to the Army officers and Pentagon contractor Robert Stein of North Carolina in return for being funneled the reconstruction contracts, according to the Justice Department. Stein, who pleaded guilty to similar charges in February, was sentenced Jan. 29 to nine years in prison.

Also charged was Seymour Morris, a U.S. citizen living in Romania. He is accused of laundering the stolen government money through accounts in Cyprus and then wiring the cash to the USA to buy some of the items used to bribe the officers.

More indictments are expected as the investigation continues into contract corruption in Iraq, said Stuart Bowen, special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. Bowen said he began the investigation in 2004 when a whistle-blower tipped him to irregularities at the U.S.-led occupation's office in Hillah.

"We are rooting out fraud, waste and abuse where we find it," Bowen said. "Where we have found it, it has been egregious."

DOJ_NMG_0129330

The indictment was unsealed one day after Paul Bremer, the former head of the U.S.-led occupation in Iraq, strongly denied accusations by auditors and House Democrats that his team was too lax with the billions of dollars it gave to Iraqi government ministries during his tenure in 2003-04.

U.S. Indicts Five In Iraq Fraud (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 8, 2007

The Justice Department has announced the first criminal indictments relating to contracting fraud in Iraq in what one official described as a "B-grade" plot, involving millions of dollars in bribes, gifts, kickbacks, and reconstruction contracts involving three senior active-duty Army officers, the spouse of one of the officers, and a U.S. contractor who owned and operated numerous companies in Iraq with ties to Romania.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said at a press conference that the Army officers and their coconspirators used Coalition Provisional Authority funds "as their own personal ATM machines," allegedly stealing millions of dollars from the CPA. The defendants and the unindicted coconspirators "rigged valuable reconstruction projects," McNulty said, "all the while helping themselves to cash, SUVs, luxury cars, jewelry, and other valuable items."

The investigation was sparked three years ago. The U.S. special inspector general for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, was sitting in his office inside the Green Zone, barely getting settled into his job, when a whistleblower, a U.S. official from the CPA comptroller's office in al-Hillah, about 50 miles southwest of Baghdad, walked in and told Bowen that some of his colleagues in the comptroller's office were stealing money from CPA funds. Bowen launched what he calls a "coordinated and rigorous investigation" by his office, the FBI, Immigrations and Customs Enforcement, and the Internal Revenue Service. For months, investigators pursued a maze of financial transactions through the Green Zone and in the United States and Romania.

Over a two-year period, McNulty said, the three Army Reserve officers conspired with three other people to rig the bids on contracts being awarded by the CPA. In all, they diverted nearly $8.6 million in contracts to one man, Phillip Bloom. One of Bloom's friends, Seymour Morris, also a U.S. citizen who operated a business in Romania, allegedly acted as a conduit.

In return for the contracts, said McNulty, Bloom "showed his gratitude" to the defendants and their coconspirators by "showering them" with gifts including more than $1 million in cash, luxury cars, a Cessna airplane, real estate, a motorcycle, jewelry, weapons, and future employment. The indictment unveiled today alleges that the defendants, in McNulty's words, "actually took bricks of stolen cash" and smuggled them into the United States. One defendant allegedly carried more than $300,000 and along with her husband, who also was named in the indictment, built a hot tub and deck in their home in New Jersey.

In all, the Justice Department said, the CPA fund lost $3.6 million in the bribery-kickback scandal but has so far recovered $2 million from the defendants. Some of the contracting work Bloom performed was legitimate, it said.

The department released a 25-count indictment, describing in minute detail the complex and audacious nature of the alleged scheme and revealing the relative ease with which the U.S. military personnel could siphon off millions of dollars in reconstruction funds, divert weaponry for their own personal use, and give lucrative reconstruction contracts to their buddies in exchange for gifts and kickbacks.

According to the indictment, three of the defendants, Col. Curtis Whiteford, Lt. Col. Debra Harrison, and Lt. Col. Michael Wheeler, were active U.S. Army Reserve officers, assigned to the CPA's office in al-Hillah. Harrison and Wheeler reported to Whiteford. The fourth defendant, Morris, owned and operated a Cyprus-based financial services business called Oxbridge Holdings Company Ltd. and lived in Romania. The fifth defendant, William Driver, is Harrison's husband.

Russert Contradicts Libby's Testimony (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, February 8, 2007

NBC newsman Tim Russert testified Wednesday he never discussed a CIA operative with vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, contradicting Libby's version to a grand jury in the CIA leak investigation.

The testimony came as prosecutors prepared to rest their perjury case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

Russert, the host of "Meet the Press," testified about a July 2003 phone call in which Libby complained about a colleague's coverage. Libby has said that, at the end of the call, Russert brought up war critic Joseph Wilson and mentioned that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

"That would be impossible," Russert testified. "I didn't know who that person was until several days later."

DOJ_NMG_0129331

That discrepancy is at the heart of Libby's perjury and obstruction trial. He is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding Wilson's wife, CIA operative Valerie Plame.

During Libby's 2004 grand jury testimony, he said Russert told him "all the reporters know" that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Libby now acknowledges he had learned about Plame a month earlier from Cheney but says he had forgotten about it and learned it again from Russert as if new.

Libby subsequently repeated the information about Plame to other journalists, always with the caveat that he had heard it from reporters, he has said. Prosecutors say Libby concocted the Russert conversation to shield him from prosecution for revealing information from government sources.

Plame's identity was leaked shortly after her husband began accusing the Bush administration of doctoring prewar intelligence on Iraq. The controversy over the faulty intelligence was a major story in mid-2003.

Given that news climate, defense attorney Theodore Wells was skeptical about Russert's account.

"You have the chief of staff of the vice president of the United States on the telephone and you don't ask him one question about it?" Wells asked. He followed up moments later with, "As a newsperson who's known for being aggressive and going after the facts, you wouldn't have asked him about the biggest stories in the world that week?"

"What happened is exactly what I told you," Russert replied.

Russert originally told the FBI that he couldn't rule out discussing Wilson with Libby but had no recollection of it, according to an FBI report Wells read in court. Russert said Wednesday he did not believe he said that.

Russert also acknowledged that in November 2003, shortly after the investigation began, that he told an FBI agent that he had not discussed Wilson's wife with Libby. The NBC News reporter subsequently resisted a subpoena for his testimony, but he agreed to give it after negotiations with Fitzgerald's office.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has spent weeks making the case that Libby was preoccupied with discrediting Wilson. Several former White House, CIA and State Department officials testified that Libby discussed Plame with them — all before the Russert conversation.

Fitzgerald has said Russert would be his final witness. Prosecutors spent the past few days playing audiotapes of Libby's grand jury testimony in court. In the final hours of those tapes Wednesday, Libby described a tense mood in the White House as the leak investigation began.

Though President Bush was publicly stating that nobody in the White House was involved in the leak, Libby knew that he himself had spoken to several reporters about Plame. He said he did not bring that up with Bush and was uncertain whether he discussed it with Cheney.

Libby did remember one conversation with Cheney, however, in which the vice president seemed surprised when told by his aide where Libby had learned Plame's identity.

"From me?" Cheney asked, tilting his head, Libby recalled.

Libby said he had forgotten that Cheney was his original source until finding his own handwritten notes on the conversation. The notes predated the Russert phone call by more than a month.

Russert, who arrived in court on crutches because of a broken ankle, was scheduled to resume testifying Thursday. Prosecutors said they plan to rest their case after his testimony.

Russert Says He Didn't Tell Libby About CIA Officer (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief for NBC News, yesterday swiftly and firmly rejected I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's assertion that the journalist revealed the identity of an undercover CIA officer to him during a telephone call in the summer of 2003.

Testifying as the final, and perhaps most critical, prosecution witness in the perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, Russert recounted their conversation that July and how a "very agitated" Libby called to complain about MSNBC's "Hardball." Russert said that the subject of the CIA officer, Valerie Plame, never came up and that he could not have told Libby anything about her.

"That would be impossible," Russert said, "because I didn't know who that person was until several days later."

Libby, who faces five felony counts of lying to investigators about his role in the leak of Plame's identity, has repeatedly testified that he shared information about Plame with other reporters only after hearing it from Russert during the telephone call. Libby has acknowledged that Cheney first told him about Plame's CIA job, in mid-June, but said that he had forgotten the information by the time he heard it from Russert.

DOJ_NMG_0129332

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald has argued that Libby fabricated the story about learning the information from Russert in the July 10, 2003, telephone call to protect himself from criminal charges. Passing along gossip from a reporter would not be a crime, but disclosing a CIA officer's classified status to reporters after learning it from the vice president could be.

Prosecutors spent three years investigating whether senior Bush administration officials deliberately revealed Plame's status to punish her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. The CIA had sent him to Africa in 2002 to investigate reports that Iraq had been trying to buy nuclear material there. Wilson found no evidence of the activity and in July 2003 accused the administration of twisting his findings to justify going to war. Eight days after he went public with his accusations, his wife's name and CIA role were revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak.

In 11 minutes of direct testimony, Russert offered a vivid description of his telephone call with Libby, and said it rapidly "evolved into a consumer complaint." Russert said Libby, who was then Cheney's chief of staff, was upset that "Hardball" host Chris Matthews had said in two broadcasts that the vice president was responsible for Wilson's mission to Niger for the CIA and had made negative remarks about Libby.

"What the hell is going on with 'Hardball'?" Russert quoted Libby as having asked him. "Damn it. I'm tired of hearing my name over and over again. What is being said is not true."

In addition to testifying that he had not mentioned Plame to Libby, Russert said that Libby did not bring her up, either.

Russert said he first learned about Plame and her CIA job from the Novak column on July 14, and said "Wow" when he read it. He testified that if Libby had mentioned to him during their phone call four days earlier that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, he would have pursued it, asking questions about how Plame's job might relate to Wilson's accusations against the White House.

"That would be a significant story," he said.

Under cross-examination, defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. pressed Russert to say that he had, in fact, asked Libby about Wilson, because the former ambassador had become a major figure in the news. Russert said that he had not, and that he had been "in listening mode" during the call.

"What happened is exactly what I told you, sir," Russert said. "I did not know" about Plame. "I did not talk about it."

Jurors heard Russert's testimony on the same day they listened to Libby say in his own words that he had the utmost respect for Russert as a journalist. Libby's admiring description of Russert came in audiotapes of his March 2004 grand jury testimony, the last of which were played in court yesterday morning. Libby said it meant more to him to hear the information from a reporter he considered so credible.

"Tim Russert, in my view anyway, is one of the best of the newsmen, the most substantive," Libby testified. "It struck me that not only did he know this, and I didn't know it, but he also thought it was important."

In portions of the tapes played yesterday, Fitzgerald repeatedly pressed Libby to explain any role the vice president may have played in the leak. During Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004, the special counsel asked whether Cheney believed that Plame was the reason the CIA sent Wilson on the mission to Niger, and whether he considered Wilson unqualified or biased. Fitzgerald also pressed Libby on whether Cheney suggested or implied that he should tell journalists that Wilson is married to a CIA officer.

In response to each question, Libby can be heard on the tapes carefully choosing words that would not implicate Cheney, and saying he could not recollect whether the vice president suggested they make Plame's CIA role public.

In his grand jury testimony, Libby said that as the CIA leak investigation was beginning in September 2003, he knew the probe would look at more than just which administration official leaked the name to Novak. He said he was aware that the president had asked administration officials to come forward.

Libby said he privately went to the vice president twice to ask whether Cheney wanted to know all the details of his conversations with reporters about Wilson and Wilson's wife in late June and early July.

"I would have been happy to unburden myself of it," Libby testified. "He didn't want to hear it. . . . I have no problem telling him what happened."

But he said Cheney shook his head no. "You don't have to," Libby recalled his boss telling him.

Libby's attorneys have argued in the trial that Libby had no motive to lie because he believed the investigation was focused solely on identifying Novak's source.

At Libby Trial, Russert Of NBC Gives And Gets (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And David Johnston

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129333

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — The prosecution in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. neared the end of its case Wednesday with a final dramatic flourish — putting Tim Russert of NBC News on the witness stand to deliver what could be a serious blow to Mr. Libby's defense.

Nevertheless, Mr. Russert, who is accustomed to asking tough questions of his guests on "Meet the Press," found himself in the clearly uncomfortable role of being the subject of tough questions during a cross-examination by Mr. Libby's defense lawyer.

Mr. Russert, whose signature technique in interrogating officials on his television program includes confronting them with documents and texts of previous quotes, found the technique used on him. A defense lawyer displayed documents on a large television screen in the courtroom as he challenged Mr. Russert's recollection of events.

The cross-examinationis expected to conclude on Thursday. He is the last of 10 witnesses who testified in 10 days of trial in which the prosecution has tried to show that Mr. Libby lied repeatedly to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a federal grand jury about how he learned about the Central Intelligence Agency operative at the heart of the leak case.

After the prosecution concludes its case, Mr. Libby's lawyers will face a daunting task in trying to undo it. The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, has offered a straightforward case in which the jurors have heard from numerous witnesses supporting the charges against Mr. Libby.

On Wednesday, Mr. Russert testified under a prosecutor's questioning that, contrary to Mr. Libby's testimony, he never spoke with him about Valerie Wilson, the C.I.A. officer.

Mr. Russert, the moderator of "Meet the Press," was unequivocal in his testimony that no such conversation with Mr. Libby occurred. But when Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., began his efforts to disparage Mr. Russert's reliability in cross-examination, Mr. Russert's confident demeanor changed abruptly.

Mr. Russert, whose appearance drew the largest crowd of spectators yet in the three-week-long trial, stopped speaking in the confident, complete sentences in which he had answered the prosecutor in his direct testimony. Instead, he became more deliberate and halting in his responses, frequently asking Mr. Wells to repeat the question or asking for time to examine the document about which he was being asked. "Say again?" he said frequently.

Mr. Libby, who is charged with five felony counts, has sworn that it was Mr. Russert who informed him about Ms. Wilson sometime on July 10 or July 11, 2003. Although Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, has acknowledged he heard about Ms. Wilson from Mr. Cheney earlier, he said he had forgotten about that. He said, "It was like hearing it for the first time" when he said Mr. Russert told him weeks later.

The prosecution has offered testimony that Mr. Libby learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from Mr. Cheney's former spokeswoman, a former under secretary of state and two officials of the C.I.A. In addition, two reporters, Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time magazine, testified that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Wilson's identity with them.

White-collar criminal defense lawyers said on Wednesday that Mr. Libby's lawyers faced an uphill battle, although most cautioned that a criminal trial almost always appeared bleak for a defendant after the prosecution had presented its case, before the defense put on its own evidence.

Some of the lawyers, including those with clients in the case who would not discuss the trial on the record, said Mr. Fitzgerald's case lacked emotional appeal, but gave the jurors an uncluttered and convincing story of wrongdoing.

Defense efforts to trap prosecution witnesses in contradictions and memory lapses had probably helped Mr. Libby, the lawyers said, although they expressed doubt that the effort had jelled into a plausible explanation of Mr. Libby's conduct.

Andrew G. McBride, a lawyer in Washington, said that the defense could seek to show that Mr. Libby dealt with a wide array of issues that were more important than responding to an Op-Ed article published in The New York Times on July 6, 2003, by Valerie Wilson's husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV.

Mr. Wilson wrote that he had been on a mission to Africa to look into reports that Saddam Hussein was trying to buy uranium for his weapons program. He said that he discovered no evidence of that and asserted that the Bush White House had willfully distorted intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

On July 14, Ms. Wilson's identity as a C.I.A. operative was disclosed in a column by Robert Novak.

Several of the lawyers said that the defense must find a way to cast Mr. Libby's actions in a sympathetic light, which raises the question of whether Mr. Libby will testify in his own defense.

"Whether a defendant takes the stand in his own defense is the most difficult decision that an attorney and his client have to make," said Richard Ben-Veniste, a prominent lawyer in Washington who has attended the trial.

Howard M. Pearl, a lawyer in Chicago, said that these decisions hinged on a careful balancing of the potential benefits of the defendant's testimony weighed against the risks of alienating a jury or opening oneself to embarrassing questions.

"If a defendant does testify, the case is usually won or lost on the basis of the credibility of his testimony," Mr. Pearl said.

In the complex story behind Mr. Libby's criminal trial, the Russert-Libby conversation has loomed increasingly important. Mr. Libby has said that he learned about Ms. Wilson from Mr. Russert in a conversation in which he had called to complain about Chris Matthews' comments on "Hardball."

Mr. Russert, who limped into the courtroom Wednesday using a crutch because of a broken ankle, recalled that conversation for Mr. Fitzgerald, who took less than nine minutes to draw out the account, in which Mr. Russert said that Mr. Libby was "agitated" about Mr. Matthews.

Asked how he could tell Mr. Libby was agitated, Mr. Russert replied: "He said, 'What the hell's going on with Hardball. Dammit, I'm tired of hearing my name over and over again.' "

Mr. Russert insisted that it "would be impossible" for him to have told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson in their conversation on July 10 or 11, 2003, "because I didn't know who that person was until I read the Bob Novak column." He said that, when he read it on July 14, he said to himself, "Wow, this is really big."

In challenging Mr. Russert's reliability, Mr. Wells homed in on a dispute he had with The Buffalo News in 2004 over his serving as a debate moderator. Using Mr. Russert's technique, Mr. Wells displayed on the television screen documents in connection with the incident in which Mr. Russert had acknowledged that he had forgotten making a telephone call to a Buffalo reporter.

He also challenged Mr. Russert about initial efforts to avoid testifying. Mr. Russert had said in an affidavit that it was a matter of journalistic principle to refuse to divulge his conversation with Mr. Libby. But Mr. Wells, who also displayed this affidavit on-screen, noted that when Mr. Russert was first reached by telephone by an F.B.I. investigator, weeks before the affidavit, he spoke freely about it.

Russert Denies Discussing Plame In Disputed Call With Libby (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald concludes his perjury case against former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby on Thursday having succeeded in keeping the focus on the lengths to which Mr. Libby went to refute attacks on the Bush administration's handling of the invasion of Iraq.

Mr. Libby's actions, at Vice President Dick Cheney's behest, are key to Mr. Fitzgerald's charge that the former top aide intentionally lied to investigators during his probe of the leak that lead the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame.

Witnesses buttressed Mr. Fitzgerald's argument that Mr. Libby lied when he told investigators that he first learned about Ms. Plame from NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert. Several witnesses testified that wasn't true. Mr. Fitzgerald has argued that Mr. Libby lied to cover-up his involvement in a campaign against Ms. Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, who had criticized the administration.

In all, ten witnesses took the stand to help Mr. Fitzgerald methodically make his case, which had been heavily criticized and appeared weakened over pre-trial revelations that he pursued his investigation for more than two years despite having learned early in the probe that Mr. Libby wasn't the original source of the leak. No one has been charged in the leak.

Mr. Russert, the star government witness, took the stand and withstood over an hour of sometimes confusing questions from Theodore Wells, one of Mr. Libby's attorneys. Mr. Russert contradicted Mr. Libby's claims to have first learned about Ms. Plame from him. In 12 minutes of answering questions from Mr. Fitzgerald and over an hour of mostly respectful quizzing from Mr. Wells, Mr. Russert didn't budge from his contention that he couldn't have told Mr. Libby about Ms. Plame since he didn't know it at the time.

"That would be impossible. I did not know who that person was until several days later," when he read a syndicated column by Robert Novak, Mr. Russert said. Mr. Wells made several attempts to get Mr. Russert to admit to having a "faulty recollection" with little success.

Mr. Wells did prevail on Mr. Russert, however, to acknowledge that he answered questions from an FBI agent in a telephone call in November of 2003, denying that he told Mr. Libby about Ms. Plame. Mr. Wells tried to use that fact to draw a contrast with Mr. Russert's and NBC's protestations later on that he couldn't testify about his contact with Mr. Libby because he was seeking to protect the confidentiality of sources. Mr. Russert responded that he believed that answering prosecutors "on a fishing expedition" was different from responding to what he thought was a false statement.

Earlier this week, prosecutors played eight hours of Mr. Libby's recorded testimony to a grand jury to allow jurors to hear Mr. Libby's repeated assertion that he first learned about Mr. Wilson's wife from Mr. Russert in a July 11, 2003, telephone call.

The recordings could be the only opportunity for the jury to hear from Mr. Libby himself, since defense attorneys have backed off previous statements that he would testify. Defense attorneys said in court filings that he may not take the stand in his own defense.

Mr. Libby's words contrasted with testimony from several former administration colleagues of Mr. Libby's and from two journalists, who have bolstered Mr. Fitzgerald's charge that Mr. Libby either told them or learned from them about Ms. Plame before the call with Mr. Russert. A note in Mr. Libby's handwriting entered into evidence shows Mr. Libby also learned about Ms. Plame from Vice President Dick Cheney in early June.

Defense attorneys say Mr. Libby's misstatements weren't intentional, but rather a result of faulty memory. They also used their cross-examination to attack the credibility of two journalists, Judith Miller, formerly of the New York Times, and former Time magazine reporter, Matt Cooper, whose own memory and note-taking of conversations with Mr. Libby were shaky.

The defense team plans to call eight journalists to testify, with Jill Abramson, New York Times managing editor, being the first when it begins presenting its case, perhaps late Thursday. Prosecutors said they objected to Ms. Abramson being called. Mr. Libby's attorneys hope to use her to poke more holes in testimony by Ms. Miller, who said Ms. Abramson brushed her off when she suggested someone write a story about the Wilson controversy.

Also, yesterday in court, Mr. Libby's taped testimony revealed that in 2003, as controversy ensued over the Wilson criticism, Mr. Cheney ordered Mr. Libby to leak portions of an intelligence report, which said that Iraq "vigorously" sought to procure uranium for its weapons program, to The Wall Street Journal. Mr. Libby said he asked Paul Wolfowitz, then deputy Defense Secretary, to leak parts of the report to an editor of the paper's opinion page. Mr. Libby also gave the information to Ms. Miller, but she didn't write about it. A July 17, 2003, Journal editorial criticized Mr. Wilson's claims, citing the intelligence report, which was made public after the editorial was published. (Read the editorial1.)

A spokesman for Dow Jones & Co., publisher of the Journal, declined to comment.

Russert Tells Jury He Never Told Libby Of CIA Agent (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert testified today that he never gave former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby information about the wife of a Bush administration war critic, directly contradicting the premise of Libby's defense of perjury charges.

Russert became the third journalist in the federal court trial to offer testimony that counters statements that Libby told investigators and a grand jury probing the outing of CIA operative Valerie Plame. The conversations — and alleged lies that Libby offered about them — form the crux of his perjury and obstruction indictment.

Testifying in federal court, a grim-faced Russert recounted receiving a phone call from Libby the week after former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV published a New York Times op-ed article on July 6, 2003, accusing the Bush administration of twisting pre-war intelligence in Iraq.

He said an "agitated" Libby called to complain about coverage of the growing controversy on the "Hardball" program on MSNBC.

" 'What the hell is going on with 'Hardball?' " Russert recalled Libby saying. "'Damn it, I'm tired of hearing my name over and over again.' "

Russert said Libby complained that the MSNBC program, with anchor Chris Matthews, were distorting the truth about Wilson and his allegations.

Russert said he told Libby that even though he was head of the Washington bureau of NBC News, he did not have authority or responsibility over the "Hardball" program, which is run by one of the network's cable affiliates. He said he referred Libby to other NBC officials.

Under questioning by prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, Russert said that he had not discussed with Libby the wife of Wilson or the fact that she worked for the CIA.

"That would be impossible," Russert testified, "because I did not know who that person was until several days later."

Russert said that he did not know about Plame until he read about her in a column published by syndicated columnist Robert Novak. That column appeared on July 14, 2003.

Libby has asserted that four days earlier — on or around July 10 — that Russert told him that "all the reporters" knew that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. Libby has said that was the first time he learned about her identity.

Asked if he had conveyed Libby that information, Russert responded: "No. I wouldn't do that. I didn't know that."

Russert said that Libby did not give him the information about Plame. He said he would have remembered if Libby had given him the information because "that would be a significant story."

Russert recalled later reading the Novak column connecting Plame to the CIA.

"I said, 'Wow! Look at this. This is really significant. This is big.' And I went to work and began to ask people I was working with what we knew about that and why we didn't have the story, because to me it was a significant development in the story."

Fitzgerald's questioning of Russert lasted barely 10 minutes. Russert had resisted testifying before the grand jury investigating the case in 2004 because of concerns that it would chill his ability to report, but was required to answer questions by a federal judge.

Libby's lead trial lawyer, Theodore Wells, spent the afternoon testing Russert's memory, including an article in the Buffalo News, where Russert acknowledged forgetting a phone call that he had placed to a columnist who had been critical of his work moderating a debate.

Russert's testimony strikes at the heart of Libby's defense that the vice president's aide said he learned about Wilson's wife from Russert.

The government has alleged that Libby made up the story about Russert and that he was the one spreading classified information about Plame's status, which had been supplied to him by his then-boss, Vice President Dick Cheney, which could be a federal crime.

Libby apparently believed that passing along information supplied by reporters would not violate the law, prosecutors believe.

Russert is expected to be the last witness called by the government. The defense is expected to begin its case Thursday afternoon.

TV Reporter Contradicts Libby In Perjury Trial (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, February 8, 2007

Tim Russert, host of NBC's Meet the Press, on Wednesday became the latest witness in the perjury trial of Lewis Scooter Libby to contradict Mr Libby's testimony to the grand jury.

Mr Russert told the trial that he had not discussed the identity of a CIA agent with Mr Libby, the vice-president's former chief of staff.

Mr Libby had told the grand jury he first heard about Valerie Plame, the covert operative, from Mr Russert during a phone call in July 2003, claiming the journalist had said "all the reporters" knew that Ms Plame was an agent at the Central Intelligence Agency. Mr Russert said he had not discussed Ms Plame in that call. "That would be impossible. I didn't know who that person was until several days later."

The prosecution contends that Mr Libby lied to the grand jury, seeking to blame reporters to mask the fact he first heard her name from Dick Cheney, the vice-president, and that there was an effort to leak her name to undermine her husband, Joe Wilson, for voicing public doubts about intelligence on Iraq's nuclear capabilities.

Mr Russert's testimony could be damaging to Mr Libby, who faces five charges, including obstruction of justice. Mr Russert said he first learned about the identity of Ms Plame from a newspaper article several days after he spoke to Mr Libby, who had called him in "a state of agitation" to complain about how the vice-president's office was being characterised on Hardball, a political programme on MSNBC.

"He was very firm and very direct. He had not liked what he had heard, saying 'What the hell is going on with Hardball, and damn it, I'm tired of hearing my name again and again'," Mr Russert testified. "It was not a natural phone call."

Mr Libby's defence lawyers sought to discredit Mr Russert by citing evidence he admitted having a faulty memory about an unrelated incident. They have been trying to prove their client simply forgot who first told him about Ms Plame.

Tim Russert, On The Uncomfortable Side Of A Question (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

From the moment he hobbled into the wood-paneled courtroom on a single crutch from an ankle injury, Tim Russert seemed very different from the familiar television figure of Sunday morning combat.

He was careful, sober and subdued. He spoke in a flat monotone. He offered responses such as "I don't recall saying that specifically, but I may have," and "You'll have to refresh my recollection on that." Gone was Russert's usual bombast and showmanship.

DOJ_NMG_0129337

With the perjury trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby hanging in the balance, the "Meet the Press" inquisitor -- the man who puts all those quotations up on the screen and presses politicians about contradictions and evasions -- found himself on the receiving end of a tough cross-examination.

Russert emerged relatively unscathed yesterday, except for a previously acknowledged memory lapse about a phone call unrelated to the Libby case. But it was a long afternoon for someone who much prefers asking the questions.

It was, at bottom, a case study in the importance of controlling the microphone. On the air, NBC's Washington bureau chief asks the questions, frames the issues or serves up political insight.

On the witness stand, by contrast, even the cockiest pundit is by definition on the defensive. Russert, a lawyer, measured his words and frequently answered the question he wished he had been asked rather than the query posed by Libby attorney Ted Wells.

Libby, who was Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, had called Russert in 2003 to gripe about MSNBC's Chris Matthews, who was hammering both Cheney and Libby on the handling of prewar intelligence involving Iraq's attempts to acquire illegal weapons. Libby says he learned from Russert that Valerie Plame, the wife of administration critic Joe Wilson, worked for the CIA. Russert said repeatedly that Wilson and Plame never came up during the conversation.

Russert likes to have all the documents at his disposal. At one point, Wells handed the witness a report on his interview with the FBI and directed him to review a brief section.

"I can't read the whole thing?" Russert asked.

The FBI summary said that Russert had not completely ruled out the possibility that he had talked about the Wilsons with Libby. "Those aren't my words," Russert insisted.

His apparent strategy was to remain low-key, regardless of the provocation -- precisely the opposite of what compelling television demands. Wearing a dark suit, white shirt and blue tie, Russert remained largely motionless, except when slipping on his glasses to look at evidence. As the questioning moved from special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald to the more tendentious Wells, the only signs of testiness that Russert displayed were a slight tightening of the voice and perhaps a whiff of impatience.

Even when recounting Libby's agitated words about the Matthews show -- "What the hell's going on with 'Hardball'? Damn it, I'm tired of hearing my name over and over again" -- Russert used a tone more suitable for reading a shopping list.

He showed a rare flash of emotion, putting his hand to his forehead, when he recalled reading the 2003 Robert Novak column that disclosed Plame's CIA employment -- which happened to underscore his contention that the subject never arose with Libby. "I said, 'Wow, look at this, this is really significant, this is really big.' "

He couldn't resist adding: "I wish I had known before then, but I did not."

Russert's unusual status was underscored when he recalled how the FBI agent sent to question him had first thanked him for speaking to the man's church group during a visit to the NBC bureau.

The newsman was not on trial, but in ways large and small, he defended his approach to journalism, even when that was off the point. Wells asked about a passage in Russert's book about his father, "Big Russ," in which he asserts how getting the news first is important.

"As long as you're accurate, yes," Russert said.

When asked about rumors that surrounded Wilson's mission to Africa to investigate alleged Iraqi efforts to obtain enriched uranium, Russert said: "We try to stay away from rumors. . . . Rumors don't make it on the air."

He said he assumes that phone calls from government officials, such as Libby, are confidential, and that if he wants to use some piece of information he warns the caller, "not to blindside anyone or try to trick them."

Since Libby's call turned out to be what Russert termed a "viewer complaint," not a whispered chat with a confidential source, why, Wells asked, had he initially resisted testifying? Russert used the occasion to deliver a journalism lecture on the "chilling effect" of subpoenas. "We do not want to be involved in a fishing expedition to find out who I talked to," he said.

Russert's most uncomfortable moments involved a 2004 Washington Post Magazine interview, which I conducted, in which he made an error. Russert said then that he challenged the accuracy of a Buffalo News columnist who had sharply criticized him for pressing Hillary Rodham Clinton, during a 2000 Senate debate that he moderated, about her remarks on the Monica Lewinsky uproar. Russert said in the interview that he had not called the columnist, Mark Sommer, to complain, but when Sommer said he had received two angry calls, Russert acknowledged to The Post: "I just plain didn't remember it."

Wells was using the incident to show that Russert's memory on the Libby call might be faulty as well, but the witness seemed more interested in defending his debate performance.

"I was very evenhanded, as I always try to be," Russert said. He is constantly criticized for his "Meet the Press" performance, Russert said, "and if I focused on that, I wouldn't be able to do my job."

DOJ_NMG_0129338

Wells sounded incredulous, but Russert, who always tries to get a rise out of his guests, gave the attorney precious little to work with.

How could he have forgotten the call? This was his hometown paper, and Russert was "one of the icons of Buffalo."

"I'm a citizen."

Wasn't he angry?

"Disappointed."

"Was it one of the more personal attacks you've experienced?"

"Probably not anymore," Russert said, and again returned to his role as moderator: "I stand by every question I asked. . . . The debate still stands up."

There was one question that Russert did not have to answer. "Does NBC pay you in excess of $5 million a year?" Wells asked. The judge sustained an objection.

Prosecutors Limit Russert Deal Details (AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 8, 2007

Prosecutors in the CIA leak trial on Wednesday sought to limit how much they must reveal about how they gained the cooperation of NBC News reporter Tim Russert, whose testimony is key to the case against former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The dispute came as jurors listened to the final 2 1/2 hours of Libby's audiotaped grand jury testimony which forms the basis of perjury and obstruction charges against him.

Once the tapes are played in their entirety, "Meet the Press" host Russert is expected to testify that he didn't talk to Libby in 2003 about the CIA employment of Valerie Plame, wife of war-critic and former ambassador Joseph Wilson.

Russert's much-anticipated version of the July 2003 telephone conversation is important to the case because Libby told the grand jury that his conversation with Russert was the first time the White House aide had heard about Wilson's wife. He later said he had forgotten that Vice President Dick Cheney had told him about Wilson's wife a month earlier.

Various witnesses have testified that they discussed Wilson's wife with Libby before the Russert-Libby conversation.

On Wednesday's playing of the grand jury audiotapes, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald asked Libby whether he had told Cheney, after hearing from Russert, that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

"No, sir," replied Libby.

Defense attorneys want to know who negotiated the agreement to get Russert's testimony and other details, including any interaction with Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan, who oversaw the grand jury that indicted Libby.

In a court filing, prosecutors said that nothing in the government's possession is inconsistent with Russert's statements in the investigation. Prosecutors said they've already provided Libby's lawyers with details of Russert's cooperation.

At the start of the trial, jurors were told that Russert was only questioned for 22 minutes, that he was not required to make a grand jury appearance and that prosecutors failed to ask Russert a number of important questions.

"You're going to see that Tim Russert had a deal," the jury was told by the defense during opening statements.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald says prosecutors' dealings with Russert had to conform to Justice Department guidelines, which require greater caution when dealing with journalists as opposed to other witnesses.

Fitzgerald says he expects Russert to be his final witness Wednesday in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial. Libby is accused of lying to authorities investigating the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Russert and Libby tell two very different stories about the 2003 phone conversation.

Both agree Libby called to complain about one of Russert's colleagues. Russert says the call ended there. Libby says Russert brought up the subject of an outspoken war critic, Joseph Wilson, a former ambassador who accused the Bush administration of doctoring prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife worked at the CIA?" Libby said Russert asked.

"No, I don't know that," Libby said he replied.

"Yes, all the reporters know it," Russert responded, according to Libby's grand jury testimony.

Russert Testifies He Didn't Tell Libby About Plame (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Laurie Asseo

Bloomberg, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129339

Feb. 7 (Bloomberg) -- NBC journalist Tim Russert testified he didn't tell Lewis ``Scooter'' Libby that an Iraq war critic's wife was a CIA official -- or discuss her at all in their conversation, disputing a key point in Libby's defense against perjury charges.

Libby told a grand jury under oath that, when the two spoke around July 10, 2003, Russert told him that war critic Joseph Wilson's wife was a Central Intelligence Agency official. Libby testified he didn't speak to any other journalist about the CIA official, Valerie Plame, until after his conversation with Russert, according to a recording played in court in Washington.

``At any time did you discuss with Mr. Libby the wife of Joseph Wilson?'' prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald asked Russert today after the jury heard the recordings.

``No, that would be impossible because I didn't know who that person was until several days later,'' Russert said. Under questioning by Fitzgerald, he also said he didn't tell Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA, or that all the reporters knew it.

``No, I wouldn't do that,'' Russert said. ``I didn't know that.'' He will return to the witness stand tomorrow.

Libby, 56, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, is accused of lying to investigators probing whether U.S. officials deliberately leaked Plame's identity in 2003 to retaliate against her husband, a former ambassador, for attacking the government's Iraq war claims. No one has been charged with the leak itself.

Learned From Cheney

Libby told a grand jury that, even though he first learned about Plame from Cheney in June 2003, he forgot about it and thought he was hearing it for the first time when he and Russert spoke. Prosecutors earlier today finished playing for jurors eight hours of recordings of Libby's grand jury testimony.

Prosecutors are near completion of their case in Libby's trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton told defense lawyers to be prepared to begin presenting evidence tomorrow.

Potential defense witnesses include Cheney, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward and other journalists.

Wilson wrote a column in the New York Times on July 6, 2003, that accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify invading Iraq. Wilson had gone to Niger a year earlier and reported that he found no evidence that Iraq tried to buy uranium there. He said his trip followed a query by Cheney's office about possible Iraqi efforts to buy uranium.

State of the Union

President George W. Bush's State of the Union address in January 2003 cited Iraqi efforts to buy uranium as a reason for going to war. Libby told the grand jury that Cheney was anxious to get the word out that his office wasn't responsible for Wilson's trip and didn't receive his report.

Russert told the jury today that he didn't learn anything about Wilson's wife until he read it in an article by syndicated columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003.

Russert said his conversation with Libby began when the vice presidential aide called to complain about a report on an MSNBC program. ``He was agitated'' and the two didn't discuss Wilson, Russert said.

Libby defense lawyer Ted Wells, in cross-examining Russert, questioned why he didn't ask Libby about Wilson.

``There is a story of great national import going on in which the office of the vice president is involved,'' Wells said. ``You didn't ask him one question about the Wilson issue?''

``It was very much a listening mode'' because Libby was ``not in a mood to talk,'' Russert said. Asked again by Wells why he didn't ask about Wilson, the NBC journalist said, ``What happened is exactly what I told you, sir.''

Faulty Memory

Wells sought to show that Russert has previously displayed a faulty memory, pointing to a letter he wrote to the Buffalo News acknowledging he forgot that he had called a News columnist to dispute an article about Russert's performance in moderating a debate by presidential candidates in 2000.

Wells also questioned how Russert could have talked to an FBI investigator in November 2003 about his conversation with Libby and later resisted a subpoena to testify before a grand jury.

In speaking to the FBI investigator, ``the focus was on my words, my words, not Mr. Libby's words,'' Russert said, adding that he didn't reveal anything Libby said in confidence.

In describing his July 10 conversation with Russert to the grand jury -- according to the recording played in court -- Libby had said the two were discussing Wilson and the dispute over whether Iraq sought to buy uranium.

`Taken Aback'

Russert then asked, ``Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife works at the CIA?'' Libby told the grand jury. ``And I was a little taken aback by that.''

``At that point in time, I did not recall that I had ever known this,'' Libby said on the recording. ``He said, `yeah, all the reporters know it.'" Libby said that, even after Russert mentioned Wilson's wife, he didn't remember that Cheney had told him about her the previous month.

Russert is NBC's Washington bureau chief and moderator of its Sunday program ``Meet the Press." He used crutches today and told the jury he is recovering from a broken ankle.

Libby is accused of obstructing the investigation and lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury. He would face up to 10 years in prison if convicted of obstruction, the most serious charge. Libby resigned after he was indicted in October 2005.

Fitzgerald said he plans to file an objection to defense plans to call as a witness Jill Abramson, the New York Times Washington bureau chief in 2003. Former Times reporter Judith Miller testified she recommended to Abramson that the newspaper pursue a story on Plame and that the paper didn't.

Defense lawyer William Jeffress said he will argue tomorrow that prosecutors didn't provide enough evidence to prove a charge related to one of Libby's interviews with Miller.

The case is U.S. vs. Libby, 05-394, U.S. District Court, the District of Columbia.

Cheney Surprised By Libby's Account (LVS/AP)

By Pete Yost

Las Vegas Sun, February 8, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney seemed surprised in 2003 when told where his chief of staff had learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame.

"From me?" Cheney asked, tilting his head, according to the grand jury testimony of the aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who is on trial on charges of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI.

Libby's account of the conversation came near the end of nearly eight hours of audiotapes of his 2004 grand jury testimony that prosecutors finished playing at his trial Wednesday.

Libby describes finding in his own handwritten notes a reference to Cheney saying in mid-June 2003 that the wife of war critic Joseph Wilson worked at the CIA. The reference by Cheney was more than a month before Plame was outed in a newspaper column.

Libby told the grand jury that before finding the note, at the start of the criminal investigation into the leak of Plame's name, he had thought it was NBC newsman Tim Russert who first told him about Wilson's wife.

Under questioning before the grand jury by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, Libby said he went to Cheney with the new information.

Libby said that before reading his own notes, he had told Cheney he first learned the information from Russert. And he wanted to set the record straight with his boss, he said.

"He didn't say much, something about 'from me?'" Libby told the grand jury. The vice president "tilted his head, something he does commonly, and that was that," Libby recalled.

Libby's conversation with Russert took place a few days before Plame's CIA identity was publicly disclosed in a column by Robert Novak.

Now that the tapes are finished, "Meet the Press" host Russert is expected to testify that he didn't talk to Libby in 2003 about Plame or Wilson.

Various witnesses have testified that they discussed Wilson's wife with Libby before the Russert-Libby conversation.

Fitzgerald says he expects Russert to be his final witness Wednesday in Libby's trial. Libby is accused of lying to authorities investigating the leak of Plame's identity.

Russert and Libby tell two very different stories about the 2003 phone conversation.

Both agree Libby called to complain about one of Russert's colleagues. Russert says the call ended there. Libby says Russert brought up Wilson, a former ambassador who accused the Bush administration of doctoring prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife worked at the CIA?" Libby said Russert asked.

"No, I don't know that," Libby said he replied.

"Yes, all the reporters know it," Russert responded, according to Libby's grand jury testimony.

RSA Panel Addresses Net Threats To Children (CNET)

By Erica Ogg, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 8, 2007

Panel discusses the depth of the problem and roots of sexual predation in online communities and ways to protect children.

SAN FRANCISCO--The amount of unwanted sexual material that teens and preteens are exposed to on the Internet has skyrocketed in recent years, yet only a fraction of those children are likely to report it to an adult.

DOJ_NMG_0129341

Those were among the concerns voiced Wednesday by members of a panel discussion here at the RSA Security Conference called "Pandora's Box: Youth and the Internet." The panel, which featured a journalist, pediatrician, federal law enforcement official and a security expert, threw out similarly scary statistics and invited the tech community to help find a solution to children's exposure to pornography as well as the prevalence of child pornography.

One in seven children between 10 and 17 have received an online sexual solicitation, according to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. In what may be even more disheartening to parents, NCMEC says only 27 percent of kids that received unwanted sexual material online are likely to report it to a parent or guardian. This can include receiving sexually explicit photos or videos, or an invitation to meet someone.

Biology is one reason children are susceptible to online predators, according to Dr. Sharon Cooper, CEO of Developmental and Forensic Pediatrics. Children and teenagers who are sexually mature are not yet mentally mature. Most people aren't completely mature until age 22, she said. "When kids are 13, 14, 16 years of age, making those decisions about whether I should or shouldn't meet someone online, their ability to detect true threats are not (fully) present," she said.

The type of material on the Internet and the threat of child sexual predation is increasingly dangerous, said Drew Oosterbaan, the Department of Justice's chief of the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section. The exploitation of children in the last eight to 10 years has seen "an amazingly scary escalation of abuse," Oosterbaan said. A decade ago, the content of child pornography his department worked to eradicate depicted children usually no younger than 13. "Now there is horrific, tortuous sexual abuse involving babies and toddlers," he said.

This escalation, he said, is partly due to the Internet's ability to bring communities together. Prior to the explosion of the Internet, pedophiles were relatively isolated. They've now found each other online, and the community's main commodity is child pornography, which if they can't find, they create themselves.

Myspace.com made national headlines last year, when it was discovered that the community contained hundreds of convicted sex offenders, including pedophiles. Last October, Wired magazine Senior Editor Kevin Poulsen's investigation into the prevalence of sex offenders with Myspace accounts led police to a 38-year-old convicted sex offender who was using the social-networking site to solicit young boys.

Poulsen investigated the problem by writing his own program that cross-referenced the Justice Department's National Sex Offender Database information with names and ZIP codes of Myspace members.

Even after the problem made national news, Myspace failed to directly address the problem, Poulsen told conference attendees. He said his takeaway from the experience was that Myspace wasn't doing enough to police its own site.

"They have enormous resources. They have people who do nothing all day but look for objectionable images on their site," Poulsen said. "Why couldn't they do the policing that I did--working part time with a relatively simple computer program--is hard to understand."

Panel moderator David Kirkpatrick took that opportunity to tell the audience that Myspace's chief security officer was originally scheduled to participate on the panel, but dropped out without explanation.

Reducing exposure to predators

FaceBook's chief security officer, Chris Kelly, a fill-in for his Myspace counterpart, talked about the steps his site has taken to reduce the risk of their members' exposure to sexual predators.

First, it's not as easy to sign up on Facebook as on other social-networking sites, Kelly said. College students must have an institution-issued e-mail address, and high school students must have a school-issued e-mail or an invitation from someone.

But they've also employed technology to help tackle the problem. Facebook employs algorithms that detect possibly problematic situations, such as someone making too many friend requests to users younger than 18, repeated denials of friend requests and reports of inappropriate photos, Kelly said.

Myspace is currently championing a bipartisan bill that would require sex offenders to list their e-mail addresses and instant messaging handles in the federal registry. Social-networking and other Web sites could then check their user database against that information. Poulsen said Myspace's backing of the bill seemed to him like "an easy way out."

"Any solution you're looking for should target behavior today," not just past criminal behavior, Poulsen said.

Lawmakers are looking at other ways to stamp out sexual material online, especially child pornography. Panel moderator Kirkpatrick brought up a bill proposed Wednesday by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would require Internet service providers and some Web sites to alert federal authorities of any illegal images of real or "cartoon" minors online.

The Justice Department's Oosterbaan said he would support "anything that can help."

"The design here is to seek out, find, filter and destroy, with the idea that eventually you would dry up the imagery if it can be found," Oosterbaan said. But, he added, the bill calls for recognizing the DNA of a photograph, which can be altered with a simple pixel change. Though it's far from perfect, it's a start, he said.

Dr. Cooper noted that McCain's bill does not address the problem of live Webcam sessions between children and adult predators. "We need to block these transmissions," she said, and invited the audience of technology experts to help figure out ways to combat that.

Myspace escaped a complete thrashing during the session when Cooper said the site should applauded for offering Zephyr, software parents can install on a home computer to see the name, age and location of any MySpace profile accessed from that PC.

Though FaceBook isn't offering Zephyr software, Kelly said the network is strongly supportive of education as the best way to protect young people in online communities.

"Education is part of the solution here, but it's not the be-all and end-all," he said. "There's going to be crime in any large community, offline and online. But you can put up lights in parks to prevent criminal activity."

Internet DOS Attacks Spur Exchange Between Government, Private Sector (GCN)

By William Jackson, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 8, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Tuesday's denial-of-service attacks against three of the Internet's root DNS servers did not rise to the level of a major cyberincident, but it did highlight the government's efforts to coordinate responses with private-sector infrastructure providers.

"There was some minor degradation of service," but no large impact, said Jerry Dixon, head of the Homeland Security Department's National Cyber Security Division.

Dixon was joined Wednesday by Chris Painter of the Justice Department and Mark Hall of the Defense Department, his fellow co-chairmen on the National Cyber Response Coordination Group, at the RSA IT security conference. NCRCG is the government's tool for organizing its response to the most serious cyberattacks, coordinating the efforts of federal departments and agencies with the private sector.

So far, "we haven't had a real crisis where we've had to stand up," Painter said.

On a scale of 1 to 10, this week's attacks on top-level Domain Name Service servers only rated about a 3, Dixon said. The NCRCG co-chairs met to discuss the incident and monitor its impact and progress, but hands-on response was coordinated by the US CERT.

The attacks lasted for several hours and directed up to 54Gbps of traffic at the .mil, .info and .bus DNS servers, said US CERT deputy director Michael Witt. The .mil server was the most heavily targeted, he said.

"The root level servers continued to do their jobs," Witt said. His organization worked with the North American National Operations Group, an industry organization of backbone network operators, to minimize the impact of the attacks.

US CERT also worked with industry-level Information Sharing and Analysis Centers to gather information about the nature of the attacks.

Dixon said investigators are following leads to determine the source of the attacks.

US CERT is the executive agency of the NCRCG and handles the day-to-day operations of monitoring cyberactivity, coordinating actions with the private sector and responding to routine events. But during a genuine emergency, the NCRCG would stand up in a joint operations center housed at DHS to coordinate activities between departments and agencies and the private sector. This central node is necessary because each agency approaches cyberincidents from its own mission perspective.

"We can't step all over each other as we try to respond as systems go down," Hall said.

"Despite pretty communications between government agencies, it wasn't really regularized," Painter said. NCRCG regularizes those communications.

The group also extends its lines of communications with foreign nations and has established a 50-country investigative network that it can work with.

"When you go to some other countries they have the same communications issues" as U.S. agencies do, Painter said.

Hall said he is about to sign an information sharing agreement with NATO on behalf of DOD, as part of the department's watch center capability with foreign partners.

The importance of coordinating responses to cyberincidents is magnified by the shortage of expertise government can bring to bear on the problem, Painter said.

"The bench isn't really very deep in cyberstuff," he said. "We have a limited amount of expertise."

The NCRCG took part in last year's Cyber Storm exercises, a kind of cyberspace wargame in which private companies participated with government agencies to respond to a mock cyberattack.

"We are in the planning stages of Cyber Storm 2, which will be held next year," Dixon said.

Fumo Pleads Not Guilty To Federal Charges, Surrenders Guns (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale

AP, February 8, 2007

PHILADELPHIA - State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges he defrauded taxpayers and a local nonprofit out of more than $2 million, and surrendered more than 200 firearms as a condition of bail.

The powerful Philadelphia Democrat declined comment during several hours at the federal building, when he was arraigned and processed by the FBI and U.S. marshals.

Fumo appeared confident in court, although his jaw twitched at times, as a clerk spent several minutes reading the 139 criminal counts lodged against him.

"Not guilty, your honor," he said, in answer to the charges.

Fumo, 63, later declined to discuss the cache of guns, which prosecutors said he kept at his Philadelphia mansion, his Harrisburg-area farm and at beach homes in New Jersey and Florida.

"We're not going to have any comment on that," said defense lawyer Mark Shepherd.

Fumo sat in court beside his lead defense attorney, Richard A. Sprague, a legendary 81-year-old former city prosecutor who plans a press conference on the indictment on Thursday.

Co-defendant Ruth Arnao, the longtime Fumo friend who ran the nonprofit, the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, also pleaded not guilty to the charges.

She was accompanied in court by her husband, Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission Chairman Mitchell Rubin. Rubin is not charged, but the 267-page indictment states that he joined Fumo on a 2001 trip to Cuba funded by the nonprofit and was paid for Senate contracts that involved little or no work.

The couple also enjoyed a sailing trip with Fumo at Martha's Vineyard on a yacht owned by the Independence Seaport Museum, the indictment charges.

Arnao, 51, of Philadelphia, obstructed the four-year investigation into Citizens' Alliance by helping delete years worth of e-mails, prosecutors said.

She is charged in 45 counts, including two counts of filing a false tax return for allegedly stating that the group did not engage in political activity. According to the indictment, Fumo ordered the charity to fund election polling, a politically motivated lawsuit against a Senate rival and other partisan efforts.

Arnao's lawyer, Edwin Jacobs Jr. of Atlantic City, N.J., declined comment after the arraignment.

Fumo and Arnao were each released on a $100,000 personal recognizance bond. Each was ordered to surrender passports and weapons, standard conditions of bail in federal cases.

Fumo's weaponry include collectibles and very large machine guns, prosecutors said. They will be kept in vaults at two firearms dealers.

Given its complexity, the case is not expected to be tried before the latter half of 2007, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said Wednesday.

The case has been consolidated with that of the two Senate computer technicians charged with obstruction last year. They allegedly carried out Fumo's demands to systematically destroy e-mails about the Citizens' Alliance.

Fumo, who has served in the Senate since 1978, stepped down this week as the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, as Senate rules require with an indictment. He remains in the Senate.

Fumo has beaten two previous indictments.

Fumo Surrenders To FBI, Pleads Not Guilty (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 8, 2007

State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo and a former Senate aide surrendered to the FBI today and pleaded not guilty before a federal magistrate judge to scores of fraud charges.

Neither Fumo nor the former aide, Ruth Arnao - nor their lawyers - spoke to reporters.

"Mum's the word," said Ed Jacobs, who represents Arnao.

Fumo, flanked by lawyers Richard Sprague and Mark Sheppard, arrived early for the brief but packed proceeding before U.S. Magistrate Judge Thomas J. Rueter.

Rueter's clerk read a list of charges: conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, conspiracy to obstruct justice, and aiding the filing of a false tax return.

"How say you to the charges?" the clerk asked.

"Not guilty, your honor," replied Fumo (D., Phila.).

A few minutes later, Arnao pleaded not guilty, too.

Fumo, 63, was freed on a routine personal recognizance bond, with a stipulation that he will forfeit $100,000 if he does not reappear for court proceedings.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John J. Pease said that Fumo must reside at his Philadelphia home on Green Street and not travel outside of Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, Florida and Manhattan. Fumo has already surrendered his passport.

Fumo, a gun collector, must also turn over the more than 100 firearms he owns. They will be stored in vaults controlled by two different firearms dealers, and a court official will maintain the keys to the vaults, Pease said.

A grand jury indictment returned Tuesday alleges that Fumo exploited for his personal and political use: his Senate budget and power; the South Philadelphia charity he helped fund, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods; and the Independence Seaport Museum.

The indictment charged that Fumo used taxpayer and charity money to pay for political polls, power tools, cars, farm equipment, personal errands, shopping sprees and more.

The indictment alleges more than $2 million in illicit spending and includes the sensational allegation that Fumo hired private detectives to tail ex-girlfriends and dig up dirt on political rivals - including Ed Rendell, when he first was running for governor.

Grand jurors said Fumo:

- Diverted more than $60,000 from the charity into an effort to block a dune-rebuilding project in South Jersey. Fumo allegedly feared that the project would ruin the ocean view at his Margate home.

- Assigned one Senate aide to oversee renovations at the senator's 33-room mansion in Spring Garden and paid another aide to clean the house.

- Put other taxpayer-paid aides to work organizing political fund-raisers; putting together campaign mailings; paying his personal bills; and packing boxes of Fumo bobblehead dolls.

- Doled out fat state contracts to political consultants and others who did little or no state work.

- Repeatedly cruised on museum yachts at a cost to the museum of more than $100,000.

Fumo arrived at the federal justice complex in Philadelphia shortly before 11 a.m. today to surrender to the FBI.

As he entered the building, Sprague cut off reporters' questions to Fumo. The lawyer said he would hold a news conference at noon tomorrow to talk about the indictment.

"So leave my client alone for the time being," Sprague said.

Fumo And Ex-chief Of Nonprofit Agency Are Released On 100G Bail After Feds Charge Conspiracy, Fraud, Obstruction Of Justice (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 8, 2007

STATE SEN. VINCE FUMO not only had political firepower, he had the real thing.

Fumo was ordered by U.S. Magistrate Thomas J. Reuter to surrender all his firearms yesterday as part of his agreement with the feds to remain free on bail.

A gun collector, Fumo had in excess of 200 firearms. The weapons are being turned over to two local firearms dealers for storage. A court official will have the keys to the vaults.

After a four-year investigation, a federal grand jury Tuesday charged Fumo, 63, with conspiracy, fraud, obstruction of justice and assisting in filing a false tax return.

Flanked by his attorneys, Richard A.

Sprague and Mark B. Sheppard, Fumo replied, "Not guilty, Your Honor," after a court clerk read him the charges.

Reuter released Fumo on $100,000 bail, ordered him to surrender his passport and restricted his travel to Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Florida, Delaware and Manhattan.

Before the brief arraignment, Fumo smiled and chatted amiably with his lawyers.

The grand jury alleged that Fumo had defrauded the state Senate and a charity his aides founded of more than $2 million by having Senate employees and charity workers do personal work for him.

Fumo also is alleged to have hired a private eye at taxpayers' expense to snoop on his former wife, ex-girlfriends and political enemies.

Fumo and a co-defendant, Ruth Arnao, are alleged to have skimmed from the charity, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

Arnao, 50, was once a top aide to Fumo and formerly executive director of Citizens Alliance.

The indictment alleges that Citizens Alliance paid for tools, cleaning equipment and vehicles for Fumo's personal use, and supplied laborers that Fumo used as personal servants to maintain his homes and a 100-acre farm near Harrisburg.

The charity also allegedly paid for summertime shopping sprees at the Shore for Fumo and Arnao so they could stock their Shore homes with household goods.

Before his arraigment, Fumo and his lawyers arrived at FBI headquarters yesterday morning to be fingerprinted.

When a reporter shouted, "Senator, you're worth millions. Why did you have to spend other people's money?" Fumo smiled but said nothing. Sprague said neither he nor Fumo would have any comment.

When the reporter pressed again, Fumo said: "Didn't you just listen to my lawyer's answer?"

Sprague said he would have a news conference today to address the indictment, and asked reporters to leave Fumo alone.

Fumo appeared to be in good spirits and frequently smiled as he ran a gantlet of photographers and TV cameras.

Fumo and his lawyers then entered the federal office building, where Fumo set off the security screener and was asked by security personnel to remove his black trench coat and suit jacket and pass through again.

About 30 minutes later, Arnao arrived with her lawyers and entered the federal building to be fingerprinted.

Neither she nor her lawyers made any comment.

Arnao has been charged with conspiracy, fraud, obstruction of justice and filing a false tax return.

She also pleaded not guilty yesterday to all charges and was released under conditions similar to Fumo's: $100,000 bail and ordered to surrender a firearm and her passport.

Arnao's travel was restricted to Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Florida and New York City.

Reuter set a trial date of May 21, when two Fumo computer aides charged with obstruction last June are scheduled to stand trial.

But prosecutors predicted yesterday that that trial date is likely to be extended to much later in the year, now that Fumo and Arnao have been added to the case.

Investigation Of Child Porn Site Hits 77 Nations (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Austrian government has provided the FBI with more than 200 U.S. Internet addresses identified in a far-reaching international child pornography investigation in which suspects allegedly paid to watch graphic videos of young children being sexually abused.

The investigation, which began last summer, has identified 2,361 Internet addresses in at least 77 countries, including the USA, where customers paid about $90 to view the abuse of infants and other children, Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter said Wednesday.

In Washington, Austrian Embassy spokesman Wolfgang Renezeder said the inquiry marked an extraordinary level of cooperation among law enforcement authorities throughout the world.

It was unclear how many suspects could be traced to the addresses because computer users frequently maintain multiple addresses, FBI and Austrian authorities said.

"This is an ongoing investigation," FBI spokesman Paul Bresson said. "The FBI is working closely with the Austrian authorities … to combat the proliferation of online child exploitation. Although the number of subjects may end up being significantly less … it will likely result in the identification of numerous individuals in the U.S."

Platter said no arrests had been made. The videos represented the "worst kind of child sex abuse," he said.

Law enforcement officials in Germany, Russia and France were also provided information about dozens of suspicious Internet addresses in those countries.

Videos were made available on a Russian website that no longer exists, Austrian authorities said.

During one 24-hour period, more than 8,000 hits were recorded on the site from 2,361 addresses across the globe.

Renezeder said explicit videos showing abuse of both girls and boys were seized by the Austria Federal Criminal Investigations Bureau.

Authorities are searching for an estimated 23 suspects in Austria. Austrian authorities said they were initially tipped to the suspicious material last summer by an unidentified Internet service business in Vienna.

Child Porn Ring Uncovered In Austria (NSDY/AP)

By Veronika Oleksyn, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 8, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- Austrian authorities said Wednesday they have uncovered a major international child pornography ring involving more than 2,360 suspects from 77 countries, including hundreds in the United States, who paid to view videos of young children being sexually abused.

The children were under the age of 14 and screams could be heard, said Harald Gremel, an Austrian police expert on Internet crime who headed the investigation.

Interior Minister Guenther Platter said the FBI was investigating about 600 of the suspects in the United States. German authorities were following leads on another 400 people, France was looking into about 100 others, and at least 23 suspects were Austrians, he said.

Platter said videos downloaded from the Internet and seized by Austria's Federal Criminal Investigations Bureau included images that showed "the worst kind of child sexual abuse."

Gremel said "girls could be seen being raped, and you could also hear screams." Although officials initially said the children ranged in ages from "0 to 14," Gremel later said no infants were seen in the videos.

No Austrian suspects were yet in custody, authorities said, adding that they shared their information with law enforcement in other countries in hopes that suspects could be investigated and charged. Gremel said he could not provide details about investigations outside Austria, but noted that cooperation with Russian authorities had intensified over the past two weeks.

The investigation began in July when a man working for a Vienna-based Internet file hosting service approached authorities at the Interior Ministry to say he noticed the pornographic material during a routine check, Gremel said.

The man blocked access to the videos while recording the I.P. addresses of people who continued to try to download the material, and gave the details to authorities. Neither the man nor the Vienna company were identified, and police said neither was implicated in the case.

Within a 24-hour period, investigators recorded more than 8,000 hits from 2,361 computer I.P. addresses in 77 countries ranging from Algeria to South Africa, Gremel told reporters.

The videos were posted on a Russian Web site, and users had to pay $89 to access the material, Gremel said.

He said investigators believed the videos, which included images of girls and boys up to age 14, were made in Eastern Europe and uploaded to the site from somewhere in Britain.

Germany had the largest single number of suspects in Europe, Gremel said.

Child Pornography On Vienna Computer Prompts Worldwide Hunt (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 7 — Austrian authorities have gathered information on more than 2,360 individuals from 77 countries who tried to view child pornography through a Russian Web site stored on a Vienna computer, the country's Interior Ministry said Wednesday.

The discovery, which has not yet yielded arrests, set off a pedophile hunt around the world. The F.B.I. is looking for as many as 600 suspects in the United States, the Austrian ministry said. Germany has been given about 400 names and France close to 100. The ministry says 23 of the suspects are Austrian.

Interior Minister Günther Platter said the videos included images that showed "the worst kind of child sexual abuse" of children of various ages, ranging up to 14.

"Girls could be seen being raped, and you could also hear screams," Harald Gremel, an Austrian police expert on Internet crime who headed the investigation, said at a news conference in Vienna, according to The Associated Press. He said the videos appeared to have been made in Eastern Europe and uploaded to the Vienna computer from Britain, and were accessible through a Russian Web site.

The Austrian case demonstrates the difficulty of tackling the growing problem of child pornography and the horrific abuse it entails without international cooperation.

Less than a month ago, Bernadette Chirac, the wife of the French president, held a meeting here of other leaders' wives, including Laura Bush, to urge international cooperation to fight child pornography and sexual solicitation of children online.

Mr. Gremel said the investigation began in July, when a man working for a Vienna-based Internet business spotted child pornography on one of the company's computers during a routine check. He blocked access to the videos but recorded the Internet Protocol addresses — coded numbers that identify computers using the Internet — of people who continued to try to download the material.

Within 24 hours, Mr. Gremel said, the man recorded more than 8,000 attempts from 2,361 computers in 77 countries. He turned the information over to the police.

Mr. Gremel said that the Austrian police seized 31 desktop computers, seven laptop computers, 1,232 DVDs and CDs, 1,428 diskettes and 213 videocassettes in subsequent raids on the 23 Austrian suspects, who range in age from 17 to 69.

The offending Web site has since been shut down, and Austria is cooperating with the Russian authorities to find its operators, Mr. Gremel said.

An aggressive effort by Britain's Internet Watch Foundation to shut or block access to child pornography sites resulted in a major decline in the percentage of child pornography sites based in Britain, to 0.2 percent last year from 18 percent in 1997, according to a recent Congressional report. A similar initiative began in the United States last year.

But laws on child pornography vary widely among countries. A report issued last year by the International Center for Missing and Exploited Children found that 95 countries had no legislation at all that specifically addressed child pornography. Operators of child pornography Web sites can use computer servers in different countries around the world and set up new sites at little cost when their sites on one server are shut down.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation announced last year it had assembled an international task force, with officials from Europol, the European Union's law enforcement organization, and 18 countries serving six-month rotations in the United States to help American child-pornography investigators.

Vienna Busts Huge Child Porn Ring (BBC)

BBC News, February 8, 2007

Austria has uncovered an international child pornography network involving more than 2,360 suspects from 77 countries, the interior minister said.

The suspects paid to view images that showed "the worst kind of child sexual abuse", Guenther Platter said.

The videos were posted on a Russian website, hosted by an Austrian company.

No arrests have yet been made but Austrian authorities are sharing their information with investigators in other countries including the US and Germany.

Austrian federal police said the case was "a strike against child pornography unprecedented in Austrian criminal history".

Girls could be seen being raped, and you could also hear screams

Twenty-three suspects were being questioned, Austrian officials said, and arrest warrants might soon be issued. Fourteen of them have confessed to downloading the material.

The youngest person implicated was 17 and the oldest was 69. They included students, government employees and retired people, Mr Platter said.

He said the FBI was investigating some 600 suspects in the US. German authorities were following leads on at least 400 people, France was looking into about 100 more and Britain was investigating 72 people.

Denmark's news agency Ritzau said 19 Danes were involved in the investigation, according to police sources.

Downloads of the illegal videos were recorded in countries ranging from Algeria to Iceland and Venezuela - those under investigation are suspected of distributing the material after watching it.

'Screams heard'

The inquiry began in July after an Austrian internet service provider notified police that unauthorised video files had been uploaded on to its server from London.

The material was accessible via a link to a Russian website that offered it for downloading - the site has since been closed down.

Within 24 hours, investigators said they recorded more than 8,000 hits on the video and DVD material from more than 2,360 computer addresses in 77 countries.

Harald Gremel, an Austrian police expert on internet crime who led the investigation, said the videos were made in eastern Europe and featured children of up to 14 years of age.

"Girls could be seen being raped, and you could also hear screams" Mr Gremel said, adding that users paid $89 (68 euros, £45) for three month's access to the material.

Under Austria law, the maximum prison term for possession of pornography involving children under 14 years is two years.

Production and distribution of child pornography is punishable by up to 10 years in jail.

Global Child-porn Ring Uncovered (CNN)

CNN, February 8, 2007

VIENNA, Austria (CNN) -- Austrian police have uncovered a massive child-pornography ring on the Internet, tracking downloads of sexually violent material to more than 2,300 people in 77 countries, a government official said.

"This is the biggest case of child-porn distribution ever discovered in Austria," Interior Minister Guenther Platter told reporters on Wednesday. "This is a very important crackdown, and it is dealing with the most disgusting criminal acts against the most helpless members of society."

"It is amazing that within 24 hours, more than 8,000 hits were recorded from 2,361 suspects from 77 countries," he said.

None of the people believed to have downloaded the porn have been arrested, said Gerald Hesztera, a spokesman for Austria's federal police service. But 14 of 23 people questioned in Austria have admitted to taking the material off a Russian-based file-sharing site, he added.

A site administrator in Austria tipped police off to eight digital-video clips that included scenes of children between the ages of 5 and 14 being sexually molested or raped, Hesztera said. Police monitored the site for several months beginning in July, he said.

Hundreds of the addresses tracked back to users in Germany, France and the United States.

The FBI said it was investigating suspects in the United States and working with authorities in Austria and other nations as part of the probe. About 600 of the suspects were being investigated in the United States alone, said Platter, according to a report from The Associated Press.

German authorities were following leads on another 400 people, and France was looking into more than 100 others, AP reported.

Austrian Child-Porn Bust Uncovers 2,360 Suspects; FBI Alerted (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Tirone

Bloomberg, February 8, 2007

Feb. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Austrian authorities alerted the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation and other national police agencies after Austrian police uncovered a child-pornography ring involving around 2,360 suspects in 77 countries.

Among the suspects are about 600 people in the U.S., 400 from Germany, 100 from France and 23 from Austria, Interior Ministry spokesman Gerald Hesztera said today in a telephone interview. No arrests have yet been made in Austria, he said.

The ring was discovered after videos showing child sex abuse were uploaded to an Internet server and received more than 8,000 hits within 24 hours, according to the Interior Ministry. Austrian officials began investigating the ring in July 2006, Hesztera said.

The Internet company hosting the videos didn't know about the content, which was uploaded by a hacker, the Austrian Press Agency reported. Austrian police have so far recovered around 8 terabytes of pornographic material, equivalent to around 4 million pages of printed material, APA said.

Canadians Investigated In Global Child Porn Ring (CTV)

CTV.ca, February 8, 2007

Austrian police have uncovered a major international child pornography ring that may involve at least 19 Canadians, and critics say Canada needs tougher punishments for those who traffic in the images.

"For simple possession, you're looking at a matter of days (for sentencing)," David Butt of Kids Internet Safety told CTV News.

"For trafficking in child abuse images, perhaps 90 days as a minimum. We routinely see sentencing in other countries that are in the years."

The child porn ring stretches across 77 countries and involves more than 2,360 Internet addresses.

Austrian officials said they have identified 103 Canadian IP addresses involved in the ring, but the RCMP says the number is much lower, at just 19.

"We don't know until we contact the Internet service providers whether those are Canadians or hosted in Canada or whether they're international, so that could lead to some of the confusion as to whether they're Canadians and the numbers between 19 and greater," Supt. Earla-Kim McColl told CTV Newsnet.

She said Austrian authorities have sent the RCMP the information and evidence that they believe pertains to Canadian involvement. Police here will now launch their own investigation.

"We go to the service provider and attempt to determine whether or not they still have the responsibility for that number and then which geographic address it's related to, and then we forward the investigation to the police of jurisdiction for a further investigation," McColl said.

CTV's Ottawa Bureau Chief Robert Fife said that although there are 19 suspicious IP addresses, "that does not mean that there are 19 suspects -- it could be one individual or several individuals using these addresses."

The Canadians are suspected of paying to access videos on a website of young children, aged 14 and under, being sexually abused.

Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter said the FBI was investigating about 600 Internet addresses in the United States, German authorities were looking at 400 addresses, France at 100 while his country was looking at 23.

Platter said the videos contained "the worst kind of child sexual abuse."

Austrian police are calling the case "a strike against child pornography unprecedented in Austrian criminal history."

"Girls could be seen being raped, and you could also hear screams," said Harald Gremel, an Austrian police expert on Internet crime who headed the investigation.

Gremel said no infants were seen in any of the videos and that authorities moved quickly to share their information with other countries to help apprehend suspects abroad.

He said the investigation was launched in July after a man working for a Vienna-based Internet file hosting service alerted authorities at the Interior Ministry to pornographic material he had discovered during a routine check.

In the span of 24 hours, the man recorded 8,000 hits from 2,361 computer IP addresses in 77 countries, confirmed Gremel. The man managed to record the IP addresses of those trying to access the material and gave the information to authorities.

In Austria, the youngest person implicated in the case is 17 and the oldest is 69.

Gremel said the videos were all posted on a Russian website that is now defunct. To access the material, users had to pay US$89.

Investigators believe most of the videos were made in Eastern Europe and uploaded somewhere in Britain.

Austrian authorities have so far seized 31 PCs, seven laptops, 1,232 DVDs and CDs, 1,428 diskettes and 213 video cassettes.

Though the most recent case has garnered a lot of media attention, McColl said similar offences are more common in Canada than most people think.

"It's a huge problem. And you know, this is a big case but I can say that we get a case like this just about every two weeks," McColl said.

"We have 14 on the go right now. In one instance we received 600 pages of information of addresses that we need to analyze, so there doesn't seem to be any stop to the appetite for this type of offensive and disturbing material."

Kid Porn Britons Tracked Down (UKSUN)

By John Sturgis

The Sun, February 8, 2007

THE names of 72 Britons caught downloading child porn have been passed to British cops by counterparts in Austria.

Experts traced 2,360 suspects in all from 77 countries who logged on to an Austrian internet provider to access the hard-core filth.

The material involved the “worst kind of abuse”, including child rape, said police spokesman Gerhard Hesterer.

The investigation began in July after the internet firm noticed eight unauthorised video files had been downloaded on to its server from London.

Computer users were paying £45 to access the material, believed to be from eastern Europe and involving children under the age of 14.

Within 24 hours, investigators had recorded more than 8,000 hits from 77 countries on the sickening material.

Austrian authorities have also passed 600 names to America’s FBI and 400 to the German authorities.

The youngest person implicated was 17 and the oldest 69.

Despite Bust, Internet Experts Say Child Porn Rings Can Remain Difficult To Track (AP)

By Brian Bergstein, Associated Press

AP, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129350

The numbers behind an international child pornography bust Wednesday were themselves disturbing: Nearly 2,400 suspects from 77 countries allegedly paid to view videos depicting sexual abuse online. But the nature of Internet traffic makes it sadly unsurprising that people would figure they could hide so much hideous material.

Finding and stamping out such content "is needle-in-a-haystack work," said Carole Theriault, a security consultant with Sophos PLC in London.

Austrian authorities said an employee of a Vienna-based Internet file-hosting service approached his national Interior Ministry last July with word that he had noticed the pornographic material during a routine scan.

The videos showed "the worst kind of child sexual abuse," said Austrian Interior Minister Guenther Platter, citing the rape and sexual abuse of girls and boys younger than 14. At times the children could be heard screaming.

Lead investigator Harald Gremel said the videos were online for at most a day before they were discovered. The Austrian Internet service employee blocked access to the videos while recording the computer addresses of people who tried to download the material, and gave the details to authorities.

Within 24 hours, investigators recorded more than 8,000 hits from 2,361 computer addresses in 77 countries around the world, including the United States, according to Gremel.

In another sign of the ring's international tentacles, Gremel said investigators believe the videos were shot in Eastern Europe and uploaded to the Web from Britain. A link to the videos was posted on a Russian Web site, which is no longer in operation, and hosted on a server in Austria. Some of the material was free, but the Russian site charged $89 for access for a "members only" section, Gremel said.

Why did finding this take what would seem a lucky break by network administrator? Because everything traversing the borderless Internet looks the same while in transit. Whether it's a mundane e-mail or videos as insidious as this, all traffic gets splintered into packets of data that don't identify what they contain.

Consequently, unless a nefarious Web site advertises itself with spam e-mails or shuttles an inordinate amount of traffic, several factors can conspire to keep it in the shadows.

For example, Theriault noted that the perpetrators could send footage over peer-to-peer networks or computers that had been surreptitiously co-opted by Internet worms.

"You could have this stuff on innocent machines and the owner wouldn't even know it," Theriault said. "It can get ugly and complicated, absolutely."

Search engines and other analytical programs regularly "crawl" the Web to capture what lurks out there, but generally they are in search of text. One cloaking mechanism – often seen in spam – is for a site to put salacious keywords inside images, out of the reach of text-based scans.

Even the fact that viewers had to pay $89 for some material would not necessarily increase the chances of detection.

While the major credit card carriers have programs to verify the validity of merchants in their networks, dozens of Internet payment processors use other methods to discreetly ferry money around, said Mike Petitti, senior vice president of marketing at AmbironTrustWave Inc., a data-security company. One way involves automated check-clearing services that route money from checking accounts and avoid the credit card networks, he said.

"There are a number of payment processors out there that have a 'Don't look and don't ask' policy," Petitti said.

Because cases like this are not uncommon – in 2003, German investigators said they broke up child-porn rings that involved 26,500 suspect Internet users around the world – industry and governments have proposed prevention methods.

In fact, on Wednesday, a bipartisan group of senators and congressmen introduced revised legislation that would require Internet companies to do more to report child pornography discovered on their networks. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has chided the industry for not being more aggressive on the subject, and last year called on Internet companies to lengthen the time they hold onto logs of their customers' Internet use.

Those comments churned up civil liberties concerns. But five top Internet companies did announce last June that they would be compiling a database of child-porn images and developing other tools making it easier for network managers and law enforcement to detect such material.

Hingham Man Arrested By Federal Agents (HINGJ)

By Mary Ford

Hingham (MA) Journal, February 8, 2007

Philip W. Herzberg, 50, of 243 South St., was arrested in Hingham last Thursday (Feb. 1) on federal charges of receipt and possession of child pornography, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Herzberg was one of three Massachusetts men who were the latest to be charged in a Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) nationwide investigation dubbed "Operation Emissary" targeting a Web site based in New Jersey that offers images and movies of hardcore child pornography.

Herzberg, who was arrested at the Hingham Police Department, is charged with six counts of receipt of child pornography and one count of possession of child pornography.

If convicted, Herzberg could face a minimum of five years in prison for each charge of receipt of child pornography and a maximum of 10 years in prison for possession of child pornography.

Federal agents had been monitoring Herzberg and others over the Internet for three months at the end of 2005 and 2006. In October 2006, more than 125 people in 22 states were arrested in the first wave of a nationwide sweep.

Lt. Michael Peraino, who is spokesman for the Hingham Police Department, said Hingham police assisted federal agents last September in executing a search warrant at Herzberg's home. They seized Herzberg's computers as a result of the federal investigation.

"Specials conducted a forensic examination of the computers," Peraino said. "Evidence taken from the computers was presented to a Grand Jury on Jan. 7 and then on Jan. 31, the Grand Jury indicted him on those counts."

Details contained in the indictment are allegations. Herzberg is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt in a court of law, the U.S Attorney's office said.

The indictment alleges Herzberg received visual depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct in violation of federal law. It also alleges that Herzberg knowingly possessed child pornography that he had downloaded on his computer.

Peraino said federal agents notified Hingham police that they would be coming to arrest Herzberg and requested assistance.

At 9:30 a.m. last Thursday, police called Herzberg and told him to come to the station regarding a gun permit.

"He came down to the station where he was met by detectives Robert Mansfield and David Galvin and two federal special agents," he said.

Peraino explained that during the search of his home last September, police found a fully loaded gun with no trigger lock; it was also not secured in a locked container. He said Chief Steven Carlson was notified that the gun was unsecured and Herzberg's license was immediately revoked. Subsequently police went back to the scene and removed all firearms from the house.

"He voluntarily gave up the weapons," Peraino said.

According to a press release from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston, Herzberg and two Methuen men, Matthew Wilson, 28, and Donald Banker, 64, allegedly purchased subscriptions to the child pornography Web site. A forensic examination of the computers and equipment revealed that they each allegedly possessed and/or received child pornography in interstate commerce.

Operation Emissary, which was initiated by ICE in New Jersey, focused on a commercial Web site offering access to videos and images of hardcore child pornography. The Web site alerted would-be subscribers that subscribing was illegal and warned them to be discreet about their purchase. Investigators targeted individuals who subscribed to the Web site over two to three months at the end of 2005 and 2006.

Peraino said federal agents transported Herzberg from Hingham to the Joseph A. Moakley Federal Building in Boston. He is still in custody of the U.S. Marshall's Service pending a detention hearing Monday (Feb. 12). Herzberg's lawyer could not be reached for comment. The case is being brought as part of Project Safe Childhood, a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse. Led by the U.S. Attorneys' Offices, Project Safe Childhood marshals federal, state and local resources to better locate, apprehend and prosecute individuals who exploit children via the Internet, as well as identify and rescue victims.

Delay Likely In Cunningham's Co-conspirator's Hearing (NCT)

By William Finn Bennett, Staff Writer

North County (CA) Times, February 8, 2007

NORTH COUNTY -- The sentencing of Randy Cunningham's co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, will likely be delayed again, as the former defense contractor continues to cooperate with federal prosecutors in the ongoing investigation into the Cunningham bribery case, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Washington said Wednesday.

News of the possible delay came on the same day that a separate tentacle developed in the case that forced Cunningham to resign his longtime seat in Congress.

On Wednesday, U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., wrote a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, urging him to name U.S. Attorney Carol Lam as outside counsel in the Cunningham case. Earlier this year, Gonzales asked Lam to resign from her appointed post, effective Feb. 15.

Lam's office was responsible for the successful investigation of Cunningham that led to his pleading guilty late last year to bribery and tax evasion. Lam's prosecutors also continue to investigate the former 50th District representative's co-conspirators.

Wade pleaded guilty in February 2006 to having bribed the now-imprisoned Cunningham with more than $1 million in a scheme to enrich himself through lucrative defense contracts. Wade faces up to 11 years in prison and remains free pending sentencing. He could have gotten up to 20 years, if not for a plea deal in which he promised to cooperate with prosecutors in their ongoing investigation.

In August, the U.S. attorney's office in Washington announced that it was postponing the presentencing hearing until early 2007 due to Wade's ongoing cooperation. And on Wednesday, Washington spokesman Channing Phillips said the hearing is likely to be put off for another six months, for the same reason.

"If he's going to get the full benefit of his cooperation, it makes no sense (to sentence him) before his cooperation ends," Phillips said in a Wednesday phone interview from his Washington office.

He said defense counsel and prosecutors generally work with the judge to negotiate decisions on whether to postpone a sentencing hearing.

Recent news stories reported that federal prosecutors are close to asking a San Diego federal grand jury to issue indictments against three other alleged co-conspirators in the Cunningham bribery case: Poway businessman and defense contractor Brent Wilkes; New York businessman Thomas Kontogiannis; and Kontogiannis nephew, John T. Michael.

When asked if Wade, who lives in the Washington area, has testified before the same San Diego grand jury, a source with intimate knowledge of the proceedings would only say he knew that Wade was in San Diego in early January. Grand jury investigations are secret.

Neither the Bush administration nor Gonzales have stated why Lam was asked to step down. On Wednesday, the Copley News Service reported that Lam had been targeted by members of Congress unhappy with the way she handled immigration enforcement cases.

In his letter to Gonzales, Emanuel implies that there may be more to the story of Lam's exit than illegal immigrants. In his letter, he reminded Gonzales that Lam was in the process of investigating whether or not the corruption involved other members of Congress or lobbyists, as well as current and former members of the national security apparatus.

"It is for this reason that the timing of her dismissal raises serious and troubling questions," Emanuel wrote.

"In fact, special agent in charge Dan Dzwilewski -- the FBI's top official for San Diego -- said, 'I guarantee politics is involved,' " Emanuel states in his letter to Gonzales.

ID Theft Tops Consumer Complaints In 2006, FTC Annual Report Says (AP)

By CHRISTOPHER S. RUGABER

AP, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - Consumers reported over 670,000 cases of fraud and identity theft in 2006 that cost them $1.2 billion in losses, the Federal Trade Commission said in its annual report Wednesday.

For the seventh straight year, ID theft was the most common complaint, the FTC said, accounting for 36 percent, or 246,035, of the complaints.

ID theft complaints have leveled off after a steep increase earlier this decade. The number of ID theft complaints jumped from almost 162,000 in 2002 to a record 246,882 in 2004, slightly higher than last year's number, the agency said.

Credit card fraud was the most common form of identity theft, the FTC said, making up 25 percent of the complaints, followed by phone or utilities fraud and bank fraud.

At least some of the credit card fraud came from data breaches at companies that track consumer information. ChoicePoint Inc., for example, which provides credit information and other consumer data to insurance and finance companies, agreed in January 2006 to pay the FTC a $15 million penalty to settle charges that its security procedures violated consumers' privacy rights after thieves infiltrated the company's massive database.

And TJX Cos., the parent company of retailers T.J. Maxx, Marshalls, and other stores, said Jan. 17 that hackers had broken into a computer system that handles its credit and debit card transactions. Credit card companies have told customers to watch for suspicious activity in the wake of the breach.

After identity theft, shop-at-home and catalog frauds were the second-leading cause of complaint, accounting for 7 percent or almost 47,000 complaints in 2006, followed by fraud in prizes, sweepstakes and lotteries, which made up 7 percent of complaints.

The next most common were Internet services and computer complaints, which accounted for 6 percent of the total, and 5 percent of complaints came from frauds at Internet auction Web sites, such as the popular one run by eBay Inc.

The amount lost in consumer frauds has increased steeply in recent years, jumping from $569 million in 2004 to $1.2 billion in 2006, the agency said.

The average loss reported was $3,257, the report said. And 184 consumers reported losing $1 million or more in 2006, the agency said.

The metropolitan areas with the highest rates of consumer fraud complaints in 2006 are Greeley, Colo.; Albany-Lebanon, Ore; and Napa, Calif.

Napa also experienced the highest rate of identity theft, the report said, followed by Madera Calif., and McAllen-Edinburg-Mission, Texas.

The FTC said it received 5,860 fraud complaints and 2,872 identity theft complaints from Minnesota consumers last year, ranking the state 33rd in ID-theft complaints per 100,000 people. The top fraud complaints for Minnesota involved prizes, sweepstakes and lotteries, which accounted for 12 percent of the state's total, followed by shop-at-home and catalog frauds at 10 percent, Internet services and computer complaints at 9 percent, Internet auctions at 9 percent and foreign money offers at 5 percent.

The annual report is based on data collected by the FTC and over 115 other organizations, including law enforcement agencies, such as the FBI, and private groups such as the Better Business Bureau.

It's Just What The Doctor Ordered: Paid Advice For The Prison-bound (SDUT)

By Elizabeth Fitzsimons, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 8, 2007

The client wore a $95 navy Burberry shirt tucked into jeans held up by a grosgrain ribbon belt, and blue socks with black penny loafers. He was freshly shaven, and his short, brown hair was shiny and stiff from the gel that held it in place.

In five days, he was going to prison.

He offered the men across the table a cup of coffee. Then he carried his oversized wallet to Starbucks and returned with a large cup and a muffin, which sat uneaten until an uncomfortable silence during their visit grew intolerable and peeling away its wrapper provided him with a diversion.

“How many fights you been in?” asked the man in the Chargers beanie, leaning forward. He wore sunglasses, though he was indoors and it was a rainy day.

“I'm not a fighter,” the client said. “I have a big mouth, but I'm not a fighter. I'm afraid to fight.”

The two men sat with that for a moment. But then they asked again. And they pressed their client, driving him into a corner until he admitted a misdemeanor conviction for spitting in a cop's face and an arrest for “going after” a co-worker.

And there was a lesson learned: In prison, the men said, always answer a question truthfully the first time. The client nodded his understanding.

Convicted of wire fraud and tax evasion, the client had been sentenced to 10 months in federal prison. He had only ever spent a few hours in jail.

That was why he had paid hundreds of dollars and come here, to a noisy food court in an East County shopping center, for advice from Dr. Prison.

Dr. Prison is a consulting business, based in La Mesa and run by a San Diego man, that coaches men and women who are about to serve sentences in jail or prison. Dr. Prison teaches them how to talk, how to carry themselves, how to make allies and how to avoid making enemies. Really, how to survive.

“Dr. Prison's mission is to help you avoid being physically hurt, extorted, or possibly killed in prison,” the business says on its Web site, www.drprison.com.

“Just because you didn't know you shouldn't walk into another person's open cell because you didn't ask permission doesn't mean you should get the crap beaten out of you,” said Steve Scholl, who started Dr. Prison about two years ago.

Scholl has never been to prison, but he works with 10 on-call ex-convicts. He carefully selects the right ones to match the client's background and crime. Each client – he sees about two a month – is charged a fee based on the amount of time and attention they need.

“They will always have directly across the table from them someone who has served time,” Scholl said.

DOJ_NMG_0129354

Advice for families Rates start with the phone/e-mail package, at $275 for jail preparation and $375 for prison. The personal visit package runs $375 for jail, $575 for prison, with the client paying for travel expenses; and the video teleconference deal costs $900 for jail and $1,200 for prison.

Dr. Prison also works with families of convicts, advising them how to best support their loved ones as they deal with the sentence from their side of the bars. This month, Scholl and his consultants will start hosting a national, online radio talk show Saturday nights on www.wsRadio.com. Listeners can call in for advice.

Scholl and his consultants usually meet their clients in a public place, the noisier and busier, the better. They want the client to be distracted, agitated. They want to mimic the stressful environment in prison, to tease out any weaknesses that might attract unwanted attention.

Clients contact Dr. Prison on the advice of their lawyers or bail bondsmen.

“They're generally middle-class people, people like you and me, people with $400 in their pocket,” Scholl said.

They aren't gang members, and certainly aren't people who have been in prison before.

“We are trying to help the person who probably is most vulnerable,” Scholl said.

A few years ago, Scholl was talking with a friend who had been released from prison.

“He was telling me stories about how things work in there, what you should and shouldn't do. I thought: this is valuable information,” Scholl said.

“It's a pretty fearful thing to think, 'My gosh, I'm going to go to prison.' Most of the stories you hear, they're true. And I thought, I'd pay someone to clue me in.”

Aura of science Based on interviews he conducted with released convicts, Scholl says a person who doesn't know how to act in prison has a 25 percent to 30 percent chance of getting killed; a 10 percent to 15 percent chance of being raped; a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of getting stabbed; and an 80 percent to 90 percent chance of getting beaten.

The numbers are hardly scientific.

“He plants the fear in people, if they didn't already have it, that something terrible is going to happen to them in prison,” said Paul Sutton, a professor of criminal justice at San Diego State University.

The percentages give the aura of science, Sutton said. But they're nonsense.

“The advice isn't necessarily nonsense,” Sutton said.

Although Dr. Prison may be preying on people's fears, and implying that the politics of maximum-security prisons apply to all levels of facilities, Sutton said the business does provide some sound advice.

“This kind of information, or at least useful survival information, needs to get to people somehow, and the prisons don't provide it,” Sutton said.

Upon entering prison, inmates are given a handbook that lays out the rules and punishments for infractions.

“It's important stuff, but it doesn't tell you how to survive or tell you how to get along,” Sutton said.

He recalled a visit with his students to a state prison, where the guards stopped in the yard and told the group how each public phone belonged to a certain race, and using the wrong phone would result in a beating from other inmates.

Sutton asked the guard whether they shared that tip with new inmates. The guard said no. It was up to the inmates to learn for themselves.

Scholl's goal is to give his clients a head start.

Recently, when he met with the client going to federal prison, he called in his consultant Tom, who served nearly two years for drug convictions.

Tom, in his beanie and sunglasses and gray Vandyke beard, frowned and stared at the client. Tom, an addiction counselor, asked that his last name not be used. The client's name was not given because he feared for his safety in prison. Scholl, in a Hawaiian shirt, read from an assessment questionnaire.

“I hate the cliché, but it's a good cop, bad cop thing,” Scholl said before the meeting.

Be straightforward In this meeting, the client kept fudging the truth. When Tom asked how long he had been sober, the client said 15 years, then backtracked. Well, it actually was five years, then five and another five, because he had a few lapses.

The men stared at their client. Wouldn't let the matter drop.

“Any inconsistencies, any hesitating, means something to a greater degree,” Scholl told him later.

Rather than blurting out something that isn't true, take a moment and think. Then answer truthfully, Scholl said. But don't give too much detail.

“Specific things are better than nothing because nothing means you're hiding things,” Scholl said. “Be more straightforward. Answer in straightforward generalities.”

DOJ_NMG_0129355

Later, they were reassuring. Tom encouraged the client to stick with his drug addiction recovery, and to make plans for his release.

"I think you will do well and one of the reasons is because you're a smart guy," Scholl told him.

"I thought you guys hated me," the client said. No, the men said. They were just trying to help him.

After the client shook their hands, thanked them and walked off, Tom pulled off his beanie and removed his sunglasses.

He had gray, receding hair and a kind, gently lined face. Going to prison could be a positive experience, he said. Like it was for him.

"It changed my life."

CIVIL LAW:

Air Traffic Controller Blamed In Radio Star's Crash (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 8, 2007

An aviation consultant testified Wednesday that an air-traffic controller's negligence led to the midair collision near Waukegan that killed radio star Bob Collins and two other people in 2000.

"There were a multitude of things he did wrong," Richard P. Burgess, who spent 32 years at the Federal Aviation Administration, testified at a federal trial into the cause of the crash.

Burgess, hired by lawyers for Collins' widow, also said that a 1997 midair collision at Chicago's Meigs Field that killed seven people was "a wake-up call" that should have prompted the FAA to install radar at the Waukegan Regional Airport in addition to installing it at Meigs.

The Waukegan airfield was busier than Meigs, yet only Meigs was equipped with radar after the midair collision at the lakefront airport, according to testimony.

Radar was installed at the Waukegan field five months after the crash killed Collins, his passenger, Herman Luscher, and student pilot Sharon Hock in the other plane.

In testimony Tuesday, Gregory Fowler, the air-traffic controller in question, admitted he had no idea of the precise location of Hock's Cessna when he instructed her to turn toward the Waukegan airport.

Less than two minutes later, Collins' Moravan Z242L rear-ended the Cessna 172P. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, and Hock's plane plummeted to a Zion street.

Lawyers for the victims have sued the U.S. government, contending that the FAA was responsible for the crash even though a private company operated the Waukegan tower. U.S. District Judge John Darrah is to decide the case.

Burgess testified that Fowler erred when he issued certain directives to the two pilots, including clearing Collins to land, even though he had neither plane in sight.

The sky was hazy, making visibility difficult on Feb. 8, 2000.

Burgess also faulted Fowler for not requesting additional reports from the pilots on their positions.

Moments before instructing Hock to turn toward the airfield, which is located near Lake Michigan, Fowler had asked if she had passed the shoreline. "Gettin' there," she replied. On the witness stand Tuesday, Fowler admitted he should have followed up to obtain a more precise location.

On cross-examination of Burgess, Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, suggested he had a vendetta against the FAA after he had been suspended and reassigned to a nonsupervisory position late in his career. Burgess denied any hard feelings.

Rosa also contended that in the last four years Burgess had found 32 air-traffic controllers at fault in 18 lawsuits in which he testified.

In other testimony Wednesday, Dr. Frank Weschler, Collins' physician, who briefly examined him the day before the fatal crash, said he didn't believe Collins' vision or cognitive abilities were impaired by his diabetes.

In opening statements Monday, the government contended that Collins caused the collision by misreporting his position to the tower and argued that diabetes impaired his ability to see and react.

Also Wednesday, media lawyer Joel Weisman, testifying as an expert, estimated that Collins, Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality, might have earned as much as $14 million from his next five-year contract and signing bonus if he had survived. At the time of his death, Collins was in the first year of a five-year contract that paid him about $9.5 million, bonus included.

LPD Beard Report Due Out Today (LN&A)

By Aaron Lee

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, February 8, 2007

Two more investigations into the death of Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr. are complete and the findings will be released at a news conference today.

Beard, a 46-year-old Lynchburg man, died in police custody last year after a struggle with two Lynchburg police officers.

Today's findings come a little more than three weeks after Lynchburg's top prosecutor said he would not bring criminal charges against officers Michael Eagle and Michael Huntsman.

Commonwealth's Attorney Mike Doucette's findings were based on a Virginia State Police investigation. His report focused on whether or not the officers committed a criminal act.

Today's report is based on two internal investigations begun and almost immediately shelved by the Lynchburg Police Department after the state police started its outside investigation.

Lynchburg police have said they would release their findings once the state police inquiry wrapped up.

One of the Lynchburg Police Department's investigations is looking into whether the officers acted legally during their encounter with Beard, while the other is to determine whether they followed department policy.

Eagle and Huntsman have been on administrative leave since September.

Beard was in his James Crossing apartment around 3 a.m. Sept. 24 when the officers knocked on his door looking for a wanted woman.

Beard, who had no criminal record, was likely arguing with his fiancée, Roxanne Brown, when Huntsman and Eagle arrived, Doucette said in his 34-page report.

The officers had heard arguing in the apartment before they knocked on the door and asked Beard if they could search the apartment. Beard said they could, the report said.

After that, the report said, Beard used his forearm to strike one of the officers.

After using pepper spray to subdue him, the officers hauled Beard out of the apartment and laid him on the sidewalk outside, the report said. A short time later an officer noticed Beard had stopped breathing. He was pronounced dead at Lynchburg General Hospital a short time later.

A state medical examiner's report showed Beard was suffering from advanced coronary artery disease and that there were no drugs in his system when he died.

Atlanta Cops Said To Face Murder Charges (AP)

AP, February 8, 2007

ATLANTA (AP) -- Prosecutors intend to seek murder charges against three Atlanta police officers involved in the shooting death of a 92-year-old woman in her home, according to a letter sent to an attorney for one of the officers.

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard sent a letter that said he will ask a grand jury on Feb. 26 to deliver a murder indictment against officers Gregg Junnier, J.R. Smith and Arthur Tesler, said Rand Csehy, Junnier's attorney.

Kathryn Johnston died and three officers were wounded in the Nov. 21 shootout when police used a no-knock warrant to search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home.

When officers entered her home without first announcing their presence, police say Johnston fired a handgun and officers returned fire, killing her. An autopsy concluded she was shot five or six times.

Narcotics officers said an informant had claimed there was cocaine in the home, but none was found.

A copy of the letter obtained by The Associated Press said that prosecutors would ask the grand jury to indict Junnier on charges of felony murder, as well as counts of violation of oath, burglary, criminal solicitation, aggravated assault and false imprisonment.

"I expect an acquittal across the board," Csehy said. "I don't think there's any evidence supporting any of these charges."

DOJ_NMG_0129357

A spokeswoman for Howard declined to comment on the letter.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, Patrick Crosby, said his office and the FBI have not been contacted by Howard's office "regarding the issuance of such notices."

John Garland, an attorney for Smith, declined to comment on the letter, while William McKenney, an attorney for Tesler, did not immediately return several calls to his office seeking comment.

Junnier, 40, was hit in the leg, the face and his bulletproof vest in the shootout. Two other officers also suffered bullet wounds, one in the leg and one in the arm.

The shooting has brought renewed scrutiny to the police use of no-knock warrants, with which officers are allowed to raid homes where criminal activity is suspected without first announcing their presence.

Civil rights leaders, including the NAACP, have called on politicians and judges to restrict how often and how easily the warrants are issued, and for cities like Atlanta to create citizen review boards to oversee police actions.

Atlanta Officers To Face Murder Indictment Fulton DA Seeks Charges In Shooting Of Elderly Woman In Her Home (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 7, 2007

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard will seek criminal charges, including felony murder, against three Atlanta narcotics officers involved in a botched drug raid that resulted in the shooting death of an elderly woman, according to a proposed indictment.

The proposed indictment drawn up by the prosecutor's office names officers Gregg Junnier, Jason R. Smith and Arthur Tesler. Howard accuses them of felony murder, aggravated assault, false imprisonment, burglary, making false statements and violation of oath.

Defense attorney Rand Csehy, who is representing Junnier, said he received an e-mail from Howard's office Wednesday including the proposed indictment and saying the prosecutor would go before a grand jury Feb. 26 to seek charges against his client.

Those three officers were involved in securing a search warrant on Nov. 21 for the home of Kathryn Johnston. Shortly before the raid, Smith told a magistrate he and Tesler had a confidential informant buy $50 worth of crack at 933 Neal Street from a man named "Sam."

But, according to the proposed indictment, no informant went to the house.

Smith's attorney had no comment on the matter, and Tesler's could not be reached.

Eight officers were put on administrative leave after the shooting. The incident prompted an investigation that has included state and federal authorities.

Csehy responded angrily to the threat of an indictment against his client, saying, "It's an overbroad indictment."

He complained Howard's office acted prematurely without consulting with the FBI, which is still investigating.

"Paul Howard is no longer part of a joint investigation," Csehy said. Patrick Crosby, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Howard had not informed his office about plans to seek indictments.

FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett said, "We did not know this was taking place prior. The FBI has been charged with leading this investigation. And to date, this investigation has not been completed."

Csehy conceded his client may have made mistakes, but he said Junnier didn't commit murder. "There was no malfeasance here. It was sloppy police work," Csehy said. "It was cutting corners."

Lyn Vaughn, spokeswoman for Howard, said the district attorney would not comment on the prospect of seeking indictments. However, Howard expressed outrage over the shooting in a letter this week to Markel Hutchins, spokesman for the Johnston family.

"The death of Mrs. Johnston constitutes one of the greatest tragedies ever to occur in Fulton County," Howard wrote. "I will not rest until every person responsible for her death is held accountable. ...

"When homicides occur in Fulton County, whether committed by a civilian or a law enforcement official, it is the obligation of the District Attorney's Office to take the appropriate legal actions."

On Nov. 21, narcotics officers went to Johnston's home in northwest Atlanta to execute a "no knock" search warrant. Johnston was killed and three officers were injured in an ensuing shootout.

No-knock warrants are frequently issued so police can get inside before suspects can dispose of drugs.

Her friends and family members contended Johnston, who kept the gun for her protection, was a feeble and frightened woman who rarely ventured outside after dark. Her family says she was 92, while authorities say she was 88.

DOJ_NMG_0129358

Hearing her door being kicked in, the elderly woman fired on the officers. Officers Gary Smith, Cary Bond and Junnier were wounded by either "friendly fire" shrapnel or by Johnston. No cocaine was found in her house.

Junnier later told federal investigators that officers had lied to a magistrate judge about sending a confidential informant to Johnston's house to purchase drugs in order to get the warrant.

And, if the warrant to enter Johnston's home was based on deceit, all actions that occurred after police broke down the door could be considered criminal, legal experts said.

Junnier and Smith allegedly tried to cover up the botched raid by trying to persuade Alex White, a confidential informant they had previously used, to lie to investigators, according to proposed indictment. White came forward shortly after the shooting to say officers told him to lie and say he purchased crack cocaine at the home.

Police apparently were led to the house that day by an alleged small-time dealer who was arrested nearby on drug charges.

According to a report by Tesler, the suspect "wanted to take us to a house that had a kilo of cocaine. [He] directed us to 933 Neal Street N.W. where a buy of crack cocaine was later made and a search warrant drawn up for that location."

Atlanta police Sgt. Scott Kreher, president of the International Brotherhood of Police Officers, called reports that prosecutors would seek indictments against the officers "sad."

"I think any time law enforcement officer is accused of a crime, we all sit back and wonder what went wrong and look within ourselves in what we do day to day," Kreher said. "Hopefully, if it's presented to a grand jury and there isn't enough evidence, they will send back a no bill."

Johnston's family was angry that Howard was bringing the case to the grand jury, spokesman Hutchins said.

"The family of Kathryn Johnston is extremely unhappy and disappointed with today's turn of events. Mr. Howard's move today of pressing charges would effectively limit the scope of and the potential charges of a federal investigation, and borders on tampering with a federal investigation."

Staff writers Rhonda Cook, Ernie Suggs, Bill Rankin and Jeffry Scott contributed to this article.

Fulton D.A. To Seek Murder Charges (WXIA)

WXIA-TV,, February 7, 2007

The Fulton County District Attorney will seek murder charges against the three Atlanta police officers involved in the shooting death of 92-year-old Kathryn Johnston.

D.A. Paul Howard said he will take the case to a Grand Jury later this month.

The D.A. has told the officers' attorneys that he plans to take the case to a Grand Jury on February 26.

An attorney for Officer Gregg Junnier said the charges the D.A. plans to take to the jury include felony murder, aggravated assault, false imprisonment, burglary, and other charges.

Kathryn Johnston was shot and killed inside her Neal Street home in northwest Atlanta when narcotics officers tried to serve a no-knock search warrant. Johnston, armed with a handgun, thought the officers were intruders and in an exchange of multiple gunshots, she was killed.

Monday, at the Fulton County Courthouse, Rev. Markel Hutchins -- a spokesperson for Johnston's family -- asked Howard to recuse himself from the investigation.

In a terse letter, Howard refused.

Hutchins said the case is more far reaching that the state can go. He said Johnston's death can only receive justice from the federal civil rights division.

"This case has been solved," Hutchins said. "The case was not solved by local authorities. If we had relied merely on local authorities, we would still not know the truth. This family would still be hurting without any answers."

Hutchins was instrumental in getting the FBI involved in the investigation. It was originally a joint one, including the FBI, the U.S. Attorney's office, the GBI and the Fulton County District Attorney's Office. But it is clear that there is a rift between the federal investigation and the D.A.

Patrick Crosby, a spokesperson for U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said, "The U.S. Attorneys Office and the FBI have not been contacted by the district attorney regarding the issuance of such notices."

D.A. To Seek Indictments Against Officers (WSB)

WSB-TV,, February 7, 2007

ATLANTA -- Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard plans to ask a grand jury to consider murder charges against three Atlanta police officers.

The big news is not only the notice of the indictment itself, but also an FBI action indicated to Channel 2's Mark Winne that the action by the Fulton County D.A.'s Office came without any notice to either the FBI or U.S. Attorney's Office. The official suggested the FBI investigation has not been completed and the FBI had not been notified of what he indicated was a unilateral action taken by the District Attorney.

Dramatic new developments relating to the November shooting on Neal Street -- Rand Csehy, attorney for retired Atlanta police officer, Greg Junnier, says Junnier has been notified that Fulton County D.A. Paul Howard will present a proposed indictment of Junnier and two other Atlanta police officers to a grand jury on February 26 in connection with the shooting of 92-year-old Kathryn Johnston during a drug raid in November.

Csehy says the proposed indictment is 17 counts -- 10 of them applying only to his client.

He says the most serious charge is felony murder against all three.

He says Junnier staunchly maintains his innocence. He said, "This is an overbroad and premature indictment." He is extremely disappointed but not surprised Paul Howard broke with the joint investigation and is apparently no longer cooperating with the federal government in this investigation.

The Rev. Markel Hutchins say as spokesman for the family of Kathryn Johnston, he has twice spoken with U.S. Attorney Dave Nahmias and FBI Special Agent in Charge Greg Jones and other federal authorities in face to face meetings. He says Ms. Johnston's niece, Sara Dozier, and others also attended one of the meetings.

He says federal authorities briefed him and Ms. Dozier. In the end, Hutchins says he and Ms. Dozier expressed their desire federal authorities handle prosecution of issues arising from the fatal shooting of Ms. Johnston in an encounter with Atlanta Police in November if charges are brought.

A statement from the U.S. Attorney's Office was released Wednesday evening. The spokesman told Channel 2, "The U.S. Attorney and the FBI have not been contacted by the District Attorney regarding the issuance of such notices.

Channel 2 has been unable to reach D.A. Paul Howard for comment.

D.A. Paul Howard, in a letter to Markel Hutchins, said the death of Mrs. Johnston constitutes one of the greatest tragedies ever to occur in Fulton County.

Nashville Makes English Its Official Language (AP)

AP, February 8, 2007

NASHVILLE, TENN. — Nashville's city council has voted to adopt English as its official language, following similar moves by several smaller cities around the country.

After months of debate, the city's Metro Council voted 23-14 on Tuesday to approve the measure requiring all government communications to be in English, except when multilingual communications are required by federal rules or are needed "to protect or promote public health, safety or welfare."

The exceptions were added after the city attorney contended that the bill's original language was unconstitutional. Some supporters and opponents of the measure said the exceptions mean the law would have little effect on city business.

The measure moves on to Nashville Mayor Bill Purcell, who hadn't said by today whether he will sign it, veto it or allow it to pass into law without his signature.

Bill sponsor Councilman Eric Crafton and his supporters said the change offers an incentive for immigrants to learn English.

"This bill says we'll simply do the governmental business in English," Crafton said. "If we shouldn't do it in English, I'd like for somebody else to stand up and tell us what language we should conduct our business in."

Opponents contend the new law would hurt the image of Nashville, which bills itself as "Music City USA."

"From our perspective, the job just got a little tougher to prove to the world that Nashville is the inclusive city it is," said Ralph Schulz, president of the Nashville Area Chamber of Commerce.

Nashville, a city of more than 600,000, is home to the nation's largest Kurdish community and has been a resettlement site for refugees from Africa and Southeast Asia. The Hispanic immigrant population also has boomed, and researchers say Nashville's foreign-born population has grown 350 percent since 1990.

Gregg Ramos, a Nashville attorney and first-generation American who opposed the measure, said Nashville is the largest city and the only state capital to pass such a law.

Smaller communities including Pahrump, Nev.; Taneytown, Md.; the Dallas suburb of Farmers Branch and the Atlanta suburb of Cherokee County all recently passed similar laws or resolutions.

Twenty-eight states have adopted English as their official language, including Arizona, where voters approved a law last year, according to U.S. English Inc., a Washington-based advocacy group.

The U.S. Senate's version of last year's failed immigration bill would have made English the national language, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the measure would have been purely symbolic.

Nvidia Faces Age Discrimination Suit From Former GC (LAW)

By Jessie Seyfer, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 8, 2007

Stephen Pettigrew built Nvidia Corp.'s legal department from a one-man-show -- himself -- into a full-fledged public-company team.

But when he got too old, executives demoted and fired him. That's what Pettigrew, who was 64 when he left Nvidia, alleges in an age discrimination lawsuit filed last month against the Santa Clara, Calif., graphics-chip company.

Pettigrew also accuses the company of retaliating because he voiced his concern that one of the company's top executives may have committed sexual harassment and gender discrimination.

"Steve Pettigrew is an outstanding attorney who served this company loyally and very skillfully, and he didn't deserve this," said his attorney, Allen Ruby of San Jose's Ruby & Schofield.

A Nvidia spokeswoman declined to comment on the ongoing litigation as a matter of policy.

The suit is the latest legal shadow cast on the company, which remains the subject of a Securities and Exchange Commission probe into stock-option backdating as well as a Department of Justice antitrust investigation. The DOJ probe is looking into whether the company monopolized the market for two kinds of graphics products.

In a Nov. 29 SEC filing, the company conceded that it deliberately backdated a number of stock option grants, mostly in 2000, 2001 and 2002. Nvidia stated that its previously undocumented expenses from stock options amounted to $199.6 million.

In his lawsuit, Pettigrew says he was Nvidia's acting general counsel from 1999 until the summer of 2002 when he was replaced by David Shannon. At that time, Pettigrew became the company's director of litigation and risk management until his firing in June, according to the suit.

Ruby declined to comment on whether Pettigrew was involved in backdating. "I have nothing to say about stock options," he said.

Pettigrew has undergraduate and graduate degrees in electrical engineering from Columbia University and received his J.D. from Hastings College of the Law. Before joining Nvidia, he had a long career as a business and litigation attorney and worked for several large firms, according to his complaint.

The complaint does not identify the three executives who had a hand in his firing, but it describes a string of inconsistent treatment, where he was repeatedly passed up for jobs while still receiving full bonuses and good performance reviews.

Pettigrew did not identify the executives because he is "very mindful not to disclose any materials that even arguably could be protected by attorney-client privilege," Ruby said.

In 2002 Pettigrew applied for the general counsel job, but it was awarded to Shannon. San Jose attorney William Priest Jr., a longtime friend of Pettigrew's, said Pettigrew had actually run the search for a new GC in 2002, but nonetheless "readily" accepted it when he wasn't chosen for the job.

"He was perfectly happy as patent counsel," Priest said. "He liked his job and he liked the company."

In 2005, an executive gave his work an overall positive review but said he wanted a "newer and more recent litigation skill set," the suit alleges.

Later in 2005, the same executive asked Pettigrew to take an early retirement. Pettigrew said he would take it if he could get accelerated vesting of his stock options, according to the suit. The executive allegedly told him he would get back to him.

In the meantime, Pettigrew says he told that executive that another top manager may have committed sexual harassment and gender discrimination. He also told the executive about possible wage-and-hour violations at the company, according to an affidavit Pettigrew supplied to the state Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

In February 2006, Pettigrew received his full performance bonus, according to the suit. Later that month, the executive told Pettigrew it wouldn't be possible to accelerate his stock option vesting and asked him to retire in August. Pettigrew allegedly told him he wanted to stay.

On May 4, Pettigrew sought "emergency medical attention for severe nervous tension and anxiety as a direct result of the unlawful actions of Defendants," according to the complaint. Nvidia continued pressuring Pettigrew to sign agreements about his work schedule, and on June 26 he was fired.

Company managers also teased Pettigrew about his age up until his termination, going so far as displaying a picture of an "old codger" that resembled him at an off-site meeting attended by 200 employees, Pettigrew claims.

A case management conference has been set for June 5 before Santa Clara County Judge Kevin Murphy.

American Civil Liberties Union Sues For Removal Of Ten Commandments From US Courthouse Steps (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 8, 2007

(AP) - CROSS CITY, Florida-The American Civil Liberties Union is suing to force a conservative Christian county in Florida to remove a hulking Ten Commandments monument from the courthouse steps.

The 5-foot-tall (1.50-meter-tall), 6-ton black granite monument stands in front of a building for the courthouse, the elections supervisor office, the tax collector and other public offices in Dixie County. The lawsuit filed in federal court Tuesday said the monument heaps on its religious message with the inscription "Love God and Keep His Commandments" in large capital letters at its base.

The lawsuit says the monument violates two amendments to the U.S. constitution because it is not part of a historical display and because the uniquely Christian message of the Ten Commandments on a government building could intimidate people with different religious beliefs.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that religious displays are not inherently unconstitutional and must be considered on a case-by-case basis. Last year, the high court allowed the Ten Commandments to be displayed outside the Texas state Capitol but not inside two Kentucky courthouses, where the justices said the displays promoted a religious message.

The Dixie County Commission approved the monument, donated by a local businessman, in January 2006 and it was placed on the courthouse steps in November. Dixie County, a rural county where churches outnumber traffic lights, is on the Gulf Coast north of Tampa, Florida.

"Dixie County is, in effect, thumbing its nose at the Constitution by putting up this display," ACLU attorney Glenn Katon said.

Dixie County commissioners and the county attorney did not return several phone and e-mail messages left by the Associated Press on Wednesday.

"It's a great thing," Commission Chairman James Valentine told the St. Petersburg Times last month. "I believe in the Ten Commandments. I stand for it. It didn't cost the county a dime."

The suit was filed on behalf of the organization, not an individual plaintiff. The ACLU said it has "half a dozen" members in the north Florida county, but declined to name any residents who might testify in the case.

"This lawsuit is likely to be very unpopular lawsuit within Dixie County," said Florida ACLU Executive Director Howard Simon.

An initial effort to challenge the legality of the Dixie County monument fizzled because activists could not find a resident willing to sue.

The lack of an individual plaintiff may doom the case, said Brian Rooney, a spokesman for the nonprofit Thomas More Law Center, which has offered free legal aid to the Dixie County Commission. Commissioners had not yet asked the center to represent them Wednesday afternoon.

"It's interesting that they don't seem to have a plaintiff," Rooney said. "Once we get involved in the meat of the case, that's the first thing we're going to find out. Is there a case or controversy at all? That's a big hurdle for them to get past."

Wal-Mart Suit Shows Glass Ceiling Still An Issue (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 8, 2007

A lawsuit against America's largest employer is serving as a reminder that concerns about gender discrimination persist, despite four decades of focus on equal workplace rights.

Wal-Mart hasn't been found guilty of sex discrimination – and it may never be, in part because class-action cases on this issue are often settled out of court.

But the very fact that such a large case against the retailer has made it this far – with a federal appeals court giving the go-ahead Tuesday for a class-action lawsuit involving more than 1.5 million women – puts the issue back in the national spotlight more than at any other time in recent years.

The case revolves around wage issues – equal pay for equal work. But it also alleges that Wal-Mart shortchanged female employees on opportunities for promotion.

It's that issue – the proverbial glass ceiling – that studies find is the most intractable gender inequity in US industries today, despite the gains women have made since the equal-rights era.

"There actually has been tremendous progress.... Women are so much more visible," says Vicky Lovell of the Institute for Women's Policy Research, a nonpartisan research group in Washington. "Yet we do see [discrimination] continuing."

DOJ_NMG_0129362

The issue matters not just for women but the whole economy, because the underlying question is whether businesses are making the most productive use of the talent available. Gender discrimination represents a failure involving nearly half the workforce.

Women face a significant gap with men in promotion opportunities, according to research published last year by Cornell University economists Francine Blau and Jed DeVaro.

Their data covered 3,500 employers in four US cities. The study found that 10.6 percent of men had received promotions during a four-year period versus 7.6 percent of women – a gap of 3 percentage points.

Even after sifting out a range of possible explanations, including education, skills, and seniority, that gap narrowed a bit, but the promotion rate remained 2.2 percentage points apart.

Interestingly, this study, which drew on survey data from the 1990s, found no solid evidence that those women who were promoted got smaller pay raises than men.

But some experts say that important pay gaps remain – albeit not as wide as those that existed four decades ago.

"Comparable worth ... remains a very big question," says Ms. Lovell. She says this isn't just getting the same pay for the same job, but equalizing pay scales across different careers that are comparable in skills and other respects.

In the Wal-Mart case, the plaintiffs allege more basic concerns that the company failed to pay the same rate for women as men in the same jobs.

"I was layaway manager, getting $7.50 an hour" in Vacaville, Calif., says Patricia Surgeson, one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. When the company moved her to a new post in the cashier's office, her replacement made nearly twice that much, she recalled in an interview this week.

She also says Wal-Mart made it hard for her to find out about opportunities for promotion. "They would never post the [open] management position," she says. Eventually, in 2001, she left the company and worked as a manager in a clothing store.

It remains to be seen whether the details of her experience, and those of other plaintiffs, are borne out in a court of law. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled 2-1 to allow the suit to go forward, said it had no position on those claims, stressing that the decision only affirmed a US district court's ruling to certify Dukes v. Wal-Mart as a class-action suit. Wal-Mart, which says it did not discriminate against its female employees, has several legal options.

But the case hints at the factors – some of them unconscious assumptions by both men and women – that makes a gender gap persist even after years of consciousness-raising and diversity workshops.

Ms. Surgeson says her bosses often assumed she wasn't interested in jobs that might require her, as a young mother, to relocate. They would say "you have a family, you can't do that," she recalls.

Some experts say the pay gap may involve factors other than overt discrimination. But many say it's in companies' interest to devote more top-level leadership to the issue.

"If we're going to be competitive, we can't afford to lose women's talent" by failing to promote them on their merit, says Sharlene Hesse-Biber, a Boston College sociologist and author of "Working Women in America: Split Dreams."

Wal-Mart says it will challenge Tuesday's ruling by asking the Ninth Circuit to rehear the case. "The panel's decision contradicts numerous decisions from the Supreme Court and the Ninth Circuit itself," attorney Theodore Boutrous Jr., Wal-Mart's lead counsel for the appeal, said in a statement. "The plaintiffs' lawyers persuaded the panel to accept a theory that would force employers to make decisions based on statistics, not merit, and would deny employers their basic due process rights."

Critics of the class-action suit also question, among other things, the unprecedented scale of this workplace gender-rights case.

"It's basically extortionist," Robin Conrad, a vice president with the US Chamber of Commerce, told the Associated Press. If it stands, she said, it likely would force Wal-Mart to settle out of court than risk losing at trial.

Most large discrimination cases are settled out of court. Home Depot settled a sex-discrimination class-action suit in 1997 for $104 million. That same year, Publix Super Markets paid $81.5 million for discriminating against female workers.

400 Years After Jamestown (WP)

By Stephanie Robinson And Cornel West

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

To think of America in 2007, it is impossible not to consider the contributions of African Americans -- many of whom have laid the foundation for American culture, democracy, freedom and equality.

Indeed, as we approach the 400th anniversary of the Jamestown Colony, African Americans occupy a civic space that would have been unimaginable even 30 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0129363

Jamestown is as much an idea as a place. There the promise of our founding ideals lived alongside slavery and racial domination. It is nothing short of remarkable that the sons and daughters of those who arrived in shackles now excel in the broad range of American life.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) is poised to make a legitimate, not merely symbolic, run for the presidency. The current and most recent secretaries of state are African American. Ruth Simmons recently became the first African American president of an Ivy League university. Last weekend, for the first time in NFL history, an African American coach earned a Super Bowl title. When many of these luminaries were born, African Americans could not use the same bathrooms as whites, let alone participate in civil society as equals.

Amid the celebrations commemorating the Jamestown anniversary, thousands of African Americans will convene in Hampton this weekend for the annual State of the Black Union. While the stage will be populated by the extraordinarily successful, the purpose of the State of the Black Union is to not only showcase our success but also to discuss the staggering numbers of African American citizens in poverty, those who are incarcerated, undereducated, underemployed and otherwise outside the reach of the American Dream.

But, while the factors that conspire to create subcommunities characterized by unemployment and marginal literacy are debated often, and with vigor, rarely do we discuss the factors that led to the successes of millions of African Americans.

So what does it mean that a country so flawed in its founding nonetheless produces such an accomplished population of African Americans?

First, that when given the opportunity, African Americans, like all Americans who work hard, who have talent, ambition and desire, and who possess the complex of values that make up the "Protestant Ethic," can make the most of the American Dream.

Second, the impact of this work ethic is animated by and contingent on another core American value -- equality of opportunity. Opportunity in America, particularly as it relates to African Americans, had been systematically denied until the civil rights movement ushered in state-sponsored programs to ensure that qualified African Americans could participate fully in civil society.

Liberals and conservatives talk past one another, with some bemoaning the structural deficiencies that impede the promise of equal opportunity and others proselytizing the values of a good work ethic as the sole predictor of success. In truth, both structure and behavior are essential ingredients for success in America.

Structurally guaranteed opportunity alone does not guarantee success, nor should it. Beneficiaries of such opportunity must be prepared to capitalize on it. One does that through prudence, hard work, delayed gratification and similar values that have withstood the test of time. An unqualified incompetent cannot much benefit from, say, affirmative action -- no matter how robust the program.

Similarly, hard work alone does not guarantee success if one is structurally barred from realizing one's potential. There are numerous accounts of smart, talented and driven African Americans of generations past who were affirmatively prevented from realizing their potential. Not coincidentally, marvelously accomplished African American conservatives such as Condoleezza Rice and Clarence Thomas benefited from race-conscious programs designed to ensure equal opportunity for minorities. We can only speculate as to whether either would have reached their professional heights without such structural assistance.

The point is that the current political vocabulary, which treats structural aid and work ethic as either-or propositions, is wrongheaded. Both are important. Both make real the promises of democracy.

This changing face of leadership also says something important about the nature of our democracy. While American history is full of contradictions such as racial apartheid in a country founded on ideals of human equality, this democracy continues to work to overcome this failing.

We are reminded that democratic life is an ongoing project, an unfinished masterpiece. Our democracy is a process whereby its citizens continue to try to make it better. It can work if we are humble enough to recognize our failings and courageous enough to do the hard work of remedying them. As we celebrate the founding of Jamestown, we must be ever mindful of both the promise and the problems of our democratic experiment.

Stephanie Robinson is the founding president and chief executive of the Jamestown Project. Cornel West is a professor of religion at Princeton University and a member of the Jamestown Project Advisory Board. The writers will be panelists at the 2007 State of the Black Union on Saturday.

ANTITRUST:

Blackstone Wins Buyout Fight For Equity Office As Vornado Exits (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0129364

By David Cho

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

The battle to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office landlord, came to an end after Vornado Realty Trust dropped out of the bidding yesterday, leaving the private-equity firm Blackstone Group as the all-but-official winner of the biggest buyout deal in history.

Equity Office's board had tried to get Vornado to sweeten its bid throughout the week, but Vornado said that the price had soared beyond its tastes.

"The company concluded that the premium it would have to pay to top Blackstone's latest bid . . . would not be in its shareholders' interest," Vornado said in a statement.

Vornado closed yesterday at $135.75 per share, up $8.75, or 7 percent. Equity Office closed at $55.45 per share, down 60 cents, or 1 percent.

The high-stakes bidding war compelled Blackstone to up the ante several times. After initially offering $48.50 per share last fall, Blackstone is to pay $55.50 per share for Equity Office and assume about $16 billion of Equity's debt, bringing the total value of the deal to $39 billion.

Blackstone's offer was approved by shareholders yesterday.

Blackstone's victory puts on display the formidable advantages that private-equity firms have in such deals. With the ability to close the deals quickly and lower the cost of borrowing, private equity seems to have the advantage in such battles, analysts said.

Vornado chief executive Steven Roth, 65, had been trying to acquire Equity Office since last summer to form a real estate powerhouse that would have owned some of the most valuable buildings in major cities, including New York, Washington, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

The pockets of private equity proved deeper, however. Blackstone's real estate group, which is led by Jonathan D. Gray, 37, has become a major player in real estate in the past few years. It made big splashes last year, paying $4.8 billion and assuming $4.1 billion in debt for Trizec Properties of Chicago and acquiring CarrAmerica Realty of the District for $5.6 billion.

Blackstone was able to offer a quick closing for Equity Office partly because it did not need the approval of shareholders, as Vornado did. Private-equity firms can generally borrow money at lower rates and more favorable terms than public companies. The private firms also can change the financial structure of the acquired company to obtain higher returns for their investments. These strategies helped Blackstone make an all-cash bid for Equity Office.

"Blackstone doesn't have the public market pressures that Vornado would have had in terms of delivering performance as soon as possible and as best as possible," said David AuBuchon, an analyst at A.G. Edwards & Sons.

The Blackstone deal exceeds the landmark $31.3 billion private-equity buyout for RJR Nabisco in 1988.

Several analysts say the high price paid for Equity Office was justified, given the soaring commercial real estate market. With the performance of Equity Office's stock less than that of its peers before news of the buyout, the stock value may rise higher than the stock of other real estate investment trusts after the buyout.

"I would be very surprised if we look back on this a year from now and view that Blackstone overpaid," said Kevin Lindemann, director of the real estate group of SNL Financial. "Blackstone probably has already identified who the buyers are for a good chunk of this portfolio" of buildings.

The real winner in the deal may be billionaire Sam Zell, 65, founder of Equity Office, who did a masterful job of playing his suitors off each other, analysts said. Estimates vary on his personal take from the deal, but it likely stands to be more than $1.8 billion, the analysts said. Data from several financial institutions show he personally owns more than 326,000 shares of Equity Office, aside from investments he may have made through institutions.

Zell, 65, acquired the nickname "the grave dancer" for his propensity for buying distressed commercial properties, fixing them up and selling them for huge gains.

Zell, meanwhile, is looking into buying the troubled Tribune Co. media empire, the Chicago Tribune reported yesterday. Lindemann said the purchase would fit Zell's buy low, sell high strategy -- the value of Tribune stock has dropped by half over the past seven years.

"He bought office buildings and apartment buildings . . . when everyone else was selling, and certainly the newspaper business has had its challenges over the last few years," Lindemann said. "Maybe he just sees this as another undervalued investment."

Blackstone Wins EOP In $39bn Buy-out (FT)

By James Politi And Francesco Guerrera In New York

Financial Times, February 8, 2007

The determination of private equity groups to own ever greater swathes of the global economy was highlighted on Wednesday as Blackstone emerged with a winning $38.9bn bid in the bitter takeover battle for Equity Office Properties, the biggest commercial property group in the US.

The deal, which was approved by EOP shareholders after Vornado Realty Trust dropped out of the bidding, ranks as the biggest leveraged buy-out on record, exceeding the $33bn takeover of HCA, the US hospital chain, by a consortium of firms.

Blackstone had reached a $36bn agreement to acquire EOP in November, in what was already a massive bet that commercial real estate values would continue to rise – contrary to predictions that the market was peaking. After Vornado swooped in last month, Blackstone raised its bet, increasing its offer twice to fend off its competitor, one of the biggest publicly traded US property groups.

As it threw in the towel on Wednesday, Vornado said the price it would have to pay to trump Blackstone would not benefit its own shareholders.

Blackstone's victory confirmed its status as one of the most powerful actors in global finance. It comes in the same month as Steve Schwarzman, who founded the firm in 1986, will celebrate his 60th birthday by throwing what is already expected to be one of the most glamorous parties in New York history.

"This is a great period for buy-out firms," said Matthew Rhodes-Kropf, professor of business at Columbia Business School in New York.

"These private equity firms have a chance to make large changes at major companies in corporate America. The question is whether they will be able to do it.

"This deal may not be the high-water mark, but it is part of a peak and when [this takeover wave] ends people will look back at these kinds of deals."

By agreeing to a takeover by Blackstone, EOP will join the string of big companies in the US that have chosen to go private in the past few months. These include Clear Channel Communications, the largest US radio station, and Harrah's Entertainment, the biggest US casino owner.

Based in Chicago, EOP was established in 1976 by Sam Zell, a veteran property investor known as the "grave dancer" for his ability to scoop up distressed properties. Mr Zell retains a small stake in the company.

The EOP deal, which is expected to close on Friday, is not only unusual for its size and the eruption of a bidding war, but also because Blackstone acted without the backing of any other private equity group. The biggest buy-outs have all been clinched by consortia.

Vornado shares 5.9 per cent to $134.48 in New York as investors appeared to reward the company's decision not to raise its bid. EOP shares, which were trading at $30 one year ago, fell 1 per cent to $55.46.

Blackstone Deal May Jolt Market For Office Space (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth, Henny Sender And Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

Blackstone Group's $23 billion buyout of the owner of the biggest portfolio of U.S. office buildings will send ripples through the real-estate world, with a good chance it will raise the ceiling on already-record prices.

With office buildings in red-hot demand as investment vehicles, Blackstone's control of prime properties likely will put it in position to demand prices on its individual buildings high enough to make the private-equity firm's bid pay off. The deal, approved yesterday by Equity Office Properties Trust after rival bidder Vornado Realty Trust bowed out following weeks of bidding, also cements Blackstone's clout as one of the most powerful investors on Wall Street.

Blackstone's final price of $55.50 a share was a 14.4% increase from its original bid of $48.50 in November, and reflects optimism that commercial-property demand will remain torrid. The private-equity outfit got a chance to hedge a bit, too: After Vornado entered the race in mid-January, Equity Office -- also known as EOP -- gave Blackstone permission to hold concrete talks with potential buyers about specific asset sales.

"The ability to talk to potential buyers gave us confidence that we had enough of a cushion," says Jonathan Gray, Blackstone's senior managing director in charge of real-estate investment activities.

To be sure, even though Blackstone can sell off the property, whoever buys the buildings could be burned if rents don't keep pace with rising price tags. "I don't know how long it can continue," says Peter Hennessy, president of the New York office of Staubach Co., a real-estate firm. "When things like this start to go wild like the last 12 months, how long can they sustain themselves?" he asks.

DOJ_NMG_0129366

Losing out was a bitter disappointment for Vornado Chief Executive Steven Roth, who gave up for the second time in six months on his hope of acquiring Equity Office and its coveted office buildings in markets from Manhattan to San Francisco.

And for Equity Office founder and Chairman Sam Zell, who chatted with his longtime friend Mr. Roth after the shareholder vote, the deal represents a big payday. Factoring in stock options and other payments, Mr. Zell stands to make more than $800 million from the sale, according to proxy statements.

In the second-largest leveraged buyout ever -- factoring in Equity Office's debt of $16 billion -- after Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.'s 1988 buyout of RJR Nabisco Inc., shareholders of the nation's largest publicly held office landlord overwhelmingly agreed to the all-cash offer. Vornado's final $56 bid was 50 cents higher than Blackstone's, but the Equity Office board considered Blackstone's offer superior to Vornado's, which was 45% stock.

The deal closes at the end of the week, but Blackstone already has agreed to sell -- or is close to lining up buyers for -- a substantial piece of Equity Office's holdings, including much of its prime Manhattan portfolio. Demand for such buildings has been frenzied. Sales of U.S. office buildings rose 32% in 2006, with relatively modest new construction. The investors include foreign oil magnates seeking a haven to park cash, pension funds looking for reliable returns and private-equity firms wanting a percentage of their portfolio in real estate. If Blackstone scares off some potential customers by demanding higher prices, it is confident others will queue up to take their place.

Market observers say Blackstone's win is a vivid illustration of how private-equity firms now have a leg up in the battle for control of companies and assets such as commercial real estate in the U.S. and elsewhere. Among the reasons: the closely held investment firms are more comfortable putting loads of debt on their targets than publicly traded buyers at a time when the debt market is willing to provide massive amounts of money at record low prices. In addition, private-equity firms can move more quickly, with no need for messy shareholder votes.

Equity Office and Vornado are both publicly traded real-estate investment trusts, or REITs, which invest in real-estate assets and aren't subject to corporate income tax as long as they pay out at least 90% of profits as dividends.

Blackstone "executed with surgical precision," says Tom Barrack, founder of Los Angeles-based Colony Capital, a large private-equity real-estate firm with close links to Equity Office, Blackstone and Vornado. Blackstone is expected to move quickly to sell off many of the office buildings in Equity Office's portfolio. By doing so, it will generate cash it can then use to pay down some of the debt it is taking on, lowering the risk that market conditions could change and leave it exposed. (See related articles on pages C1, C3 and C18.)

Already, Blackstone has agreed to sell an Equity Office portfolio of New York office buildings to Macklowe Properties, a private New York landlord, for around $7 billion, according to several people briefed on the deal. The sale would include around 6.5 million square feet of so-called Class A, or top-rated, Manhattan office space. The price would value the space at more than $1,000 a square foot. People familiar with the matter say other buyers could be involved in the deal. William Macklowe of Macklowe Properties declined to comment.

Equity Office's properties in New York are concentrated in midtown Manhattan, the most expensive office market in the U.S. Average per-square-foot sales prices for Manhattan were $611 in 2006, up 48% from the year before, according to Real Capital Analytics, a New York research firm. Prices tend to be higher in midtown, where several buildings sold for more than $1,000 a square foot last year.

Mr. Zell's strategy at Equity Office was to build a national collection of real estate whose broad reach would ride out the ups and downs of local markets. But he ended up paying too much for some buildings and owning in too many weak markets. Meanwhile, companies such as Vornado, with assets concentrated in hard-to-penetrate markets with strong economies such as Washington, D.C., flourished.

Paul Adornato, senior real-estate investment trust analyst for BMO Capital Markets, says the sale of Equity Office shows private-equity firms can swallow even behemoth publicly traded real-estate investment trusts.

Even Blackstone's original $48.50-a-share bid was a shock to Chicago-based Equity Office. "It started to get at a price that even exceeded our own estimates," Chief Executive Richard Kincaid said in an interview yesterday. Mr. Kincaid said its board favored the quick closing promised by Blackstone's all-cash bid over the uncertainties of Vornado's stock-and-cash bid, in part because of Equity Office's own uncertainties about how long the office-building market would enjoy falling vacancies and rising rents. "We weren't going to necessarily assume that the market was going to stay like this forever."

By coincidence, Mr. Zell and Mr. Roth ran into each other yesterday morning at separate breakfast meetings unrelated to this deal at the Carlyle Hotel in New York -- before Vornado announced it had given up. "He walked in and of course I'm not allowed to talk to him so I just told him I loved him," Mr. Zell said in an interview after the shareholder vote.

Mr. Zell said Mr. Roth didn't say whether Vornado would try to raise its bid and Mr. Zell said he didn't ask. "Then, when I got out of my 10 o'clock meeting, I got a call telling me that they had withdrawn."

DOJ_NMG_0129367

Vornado executives declined requests for interviews but issued a public statement that said, "The premium it would have to pay to top Blackstone's latest bid, protected by a twice-increased breakup fee, would not be in its shareholders' interest." The company declined to comment further.

The company's shares closed up $8.75, or 6.9%, to $135.75 yesterday in New York Stock Exchange trading. Equity Office closed at $55.45, down 60 cents, or 1.1%, in NYSE trading.

Takeover Battle Ends With Sale Of Big Landlord (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Terry Pristin

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

"Roses are red, violets are blue; I hear a rumor, is it true?"

That strained line of poetry set off the fiercest buyout battle since the epic contest for RJR Nabisco in the late 1980s, a struggle that was captured in the book "Barbarians at the Gate."

The line, written by the real estate mogul Samuel Zell in an e-mail message last month, invited a rival bid topping a $48.50 a share offer for his Equity Office Properties, the biggest office landlord in the nation, with buildings in Manhattan, Chicago, Atlanta and other major cities.

The reply: "Roses are red, violets are blue. I love you Sam, our bid is 52."

The rhyme was true, but the comeback was not good enough.

The private equity giant Blackstone Group, which was the initial bidder, won the bidding war for Equity Office yesterday with an offer of $55.50 a share, or $39 billion.

The takeover battle, perhaps the most entertaining of recent years because of the big financial players — and big egos — involved, was called "New York at the Gate," because it pitted two very different New York financiers against each other: Stephen A. Schwarzman of Blackstone, the leading figure in Manhattan's financial and charity circuit in recent years, and Steven Roth of Vornado, the onetime strip mall king of New Jersey.

The deal for Equity Office encapsulates two of the hottest trends in deal-making: the wave of capital flooding into commercial real estate and the growing power of private money.

While residential real estate has slowed, commercial real estate, office buildings in particular, looks more attractive as the market finally shakes off the effects of the burst technology bubble in 2000. Many investors expect office vacancy rates to continue to decline in the next couple of years, with a corresponding rise in rents.

And private equity firms like Blackstone have been among some of the most aggressive investors in commercial real estate. These firms have accumulated huge war chests: even now Blackstone is raising a new $10 billion real estate fund. The surge in buyouts — which accounted for a fifth of the record $3.8 trillion in deals last year — shows no sign of slowing.

The Equity Office deal is the biggest leveraged private equity buyout ever, surpassing last summer's $32 billion deal for the hospital chain HCA, which itself was the first to surpass the previous high-water mark, the $30 billion deal for RJR Nabisco.

Memories of that earlier contest were much on the minds of the bidders for Equity Office. At internal meetings when Blackstone would debate how to counter Vornado, Mr. Schwarzman would remind his bankers: "We don't want to be K.K.R.," referring to the buyout of RJR Nabisco that turned out a disappointment to Mr. Schwarzman's archrival, Henry R. Kravis of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company.

"We need to remember this is just another deal," Mr. Schwarzman said, according to people close to the firm.

Blackstone had a huge incentive to make the deal. The firm will pay itself an "acquisition fee" worth about half of 1 percent of the deal — the equivalent of about $200 million just for winning the auction, no matter how well the investment turns out. (Blackstone is not alone. Its advisers, Goldman Sachs and the law firm Simpson Thacher & Bartlett, will also earn millions of dollars in fees.)

And Blackstone will waste no time disposing of some of its newly acquired assets, taking advantage of the hot Manhattan real estate market. All but one of Equity Office's eight buildings in New York — the Verizon building at 42nd Street and the Avenue of the Americas — are expected to be sold to Harry Macklowe for about $7 billion, some simultaneously with Friday's closing.

Blackstone was a winner, but Mr. Zell, 65, a raspy-voiced tycoon with a penchant for doggerel, music boxes and Ducati motorcycles, was an even bigger one. Even his detractors are saying he ran a masterly sale, encouraging a bidding war that drove up the price for Equity Office by $3 billion. Mr. Zell stands to make more than $130 million on his shares and options in the company.

DOJ_NMG_0129368

"When Sam steps into the prime decision-making role," said Timothy H. Callahan, a former chief executive of Equity Office, "no one is better able to be strategic. That's what shareholders have seen in the past, and that's why he will continue to wear the mantle as one of the leading lights of real estate."

It may have helped that Mr. Zell knew the bidders so well. As he said in an interview yesterday, "This was like a family outing in the Turkish bath."

The son of Jewish immigrants who fled Poland hours before the Nazi invasion, Mr. Zell grew up in Chicago. He showed an entrepreneurial streak at an early age, buying issues of Playboy magazine from newsstand vendors and selling them at a marked-up price to his friends.

Mr. Zell first made his fortune in the 1970s by buying distressed real estate and fixing it up, earning him the nickname "the grave dancer." In contrast to real estate moguls like Donald J. Trump, he shied away from trophy buildings, preferring strong financials to prestige. With his branding and financial acumen, he was one of the first to transform commercial real estate from a local affair to a national business.

But a year ago, his company was selling for $29 a share. After several missteps, including buying $7.2 billion worth of Silicon Valley property just before the technology bust, Mr. Zell's reputation as the sage of the real estate industry was in serious jeopardy. Now the sale has restored his reputation.

The battle for Equity Office started much earlier than any headline suggested. Last July, Mr. Roth secretly proposed merging Vornado with Equity Office to Mr. Zell. The two friends began negotiating back and forth for months.

Not long after, Jonathan D. Gray, a 37-year-old rising star within Blackstone's real estate group, took Equity Office's president, Richard D. Kincaid, for breakfast at the Peninsula New York hotel in Midtown Manhattan. After small talk, Mr. Gray, who looks even younger than his age despite a 5 o'clock shadow, asked whether Equity Office's board would ever consider selling the company.

Mr. Kincaid told him: "If you came with a 'Godfather' price the board would have to listen."

Two months later, Mr. Gray, calling from his wood-paneled office on the 32nd floor of Blackstone's headquarters on Park Avenue, asked Equity Office's banker at Merrill Lynch, Douglas W. Sesler: "What would a Godfather price be?"

A price that could not be refused, he was told, would be at least $45 and closer to $50.

In November, Blackstone reached a deal with Equity Office for $48.50 a share, and the assumption of $16 billion in debt, for a total of $36 billion. The deal by Blackstone floored Mr. Roth, who had been kept in the dark.

Despite the huge price tag, industry insiders thought it was remarkably low. Barry S. Sternlicht, the founder of Starwood Hotels and chairman of Starwood Capital, called the deal "the greatest heist of all time" on a panel at a Bear Stearns conference last fall. Vornado's president, Michael D. Fascitelli, was also on that panel.

Mr. Roth decided to mount a new bid. He reached out to several possible partners, including General Electric and Cerberus Capital Management, among others, according to people involved in the process. Vornado was interested in owning Equity Offices properties in major markets, but was looking to sell properties in ancillary markets.

Mr. Sternlicht and Neil Bluhm, a Chicago real estate mogul who was Mr. Sternlicht's mentor in the late 1980s, approached Mr. Roth before Christmas about working together and buying those ancillary properties.

They declared war on Jan. 18, lobbing in a bid of $52 a share. Mr. Schwarzman and Mr. Gray scrambled to salvage their deal. They negotiated to increase their offer to $54 a share if Equity Office would raise the breakup fee to $500 million, from $200 million.

Mr. Roth, holed up in his office above Penn Station with expansive views of Manhattan, plotted return fire. A week later, Vornado bid $56 a share in cash and stock. While it was a higher offer, it also was much less certain because some of the payment was in stock and it would take months to be completed compared with Blackstone's bid, which could be completed this week.

Equity Office, which was advised by Merrill Lynch and the law firm of Sidley Austin, said it would still back Blackstone and set a shareholder vote for yesterday.

Mr. Roth spent the weekend considering his options. He did not want to raise his bid, thinking that paying more than $56 a share was too much. And Blackstone had exercised its right to prevent Vornado from talking to Equity Office or having access to electronic data about the company. But he needed to do something.

Flanked by his advisers, including James. B. Lee of JPMorgan Chase and Mark G. Shafir of Lehman Brothers, they decided to fire another shot on Sunday night. Vornado would not pay more, but it agreed to pay a larger cash portion and pay it much more quickly, making its bid more attractive.

DOJ_NMG_0129369

The new offer hit the tape just as the Super Bowl started. Mr. Gray of Blackstone, a Chicago native who had given up his seats to the game to stay in New York, missed seeing a remarkable kickoff return by the Chicago Bears as he jumped on the phone to strategize about what to do.

The next day, Blackstone went to Equity Office with a new bid of $55.25 a share. Mr. Zell asked for another 25 cents; in exchange, the breakup fee was increased to $720 million.

And then everyone waited for Mr. Roth's response. But there was none. Blackstone had won.

By chance yesterday morning, Mr. Zell and Mr. Roth found themselves having separate breakfast meetings at the Carlyle Hotel on Manhattan's Upper East Side. It was 7:30 a.m., nearly two hours before Vornado would say that it was out of the race.

Barred by Equity Office's agreement with Blackstone from having a conversation before the vote, Mr. Zell said he smiled at Mr. Roth. Mr. Roth smiled back.

"I love you, Stevie," Mr. Zell said.

FTC Settles Antitrust Charges With MiRealSource MLS (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, February 8, 2007

Litigation continues with Realcomp II MLS

The U.S. Federal Trade Commission this week announced a settlement with MiRealSource Multiple Listing Service in Michigan over rules that blocked some property listings from the MLS and set restrictions for other property listings based on the type of real estate contracts.

MiRealSource is the sixth MLS to settle similar antitrust allegations brought by the FTC in October -- the federal agency is proceeding with an antitrust lawsuit against Realcomp II Ltd., another Michigan MLS, over its listings policies.

In each of the cases, the federal government charged that the MLSs engaged in anticompetitive activity by placing restrictions on a category of property listings that could ultimately lead to reduced choices for consumers in real estate services.

Representatives for MiRealSource, which is a broker-owned MLS with about 7,000 members, announced in November that the MLS had agreed to settle the FTC complaint, and the agreement was subject to review and approval by members of the FTC.

"Under the FTC consent order settling the complaint, MiRealSource has agreed to abandon ... collusive conduct and provide its services to all member brokers representing potential home sellers, regardless of the type of listing contract that they choose," FTC officials announced in a statement Monday.

The FTC complaint against MiRealSource, issued Oct. 10, charged that the MLS violated antitrust law "by adopting rules or policies that limit the publication and marketing of certain sellers' properties, but not others, based solely on the terms of their listing contracts. Specifically, the FTC alleges that MiRealSource favored exclusive right to sell listings and disfavored exclusive agency listings by, among other things, adopting a rule to exclude the latter entirely from the MLS."

Under the most common listing agreement, called an "exclusive right to sell listing," property owners agree to pay a listing broker for representing the sale of the property, regardless of whether the seller or the broker causes the sale.

An exclusive agency listing contract, meanwhile, typically provides that the seller is not obligated to pay the real estate broker if the seller directly locates a buyer. Under this form of agreement, the listing broker "often charges an up-front fee, but may receive a reduced commission or no commission at all, if the owner sells the property without the broker's further help," according to the FTC announcement.

The FTC complaint also stated that certain rules adopted by the MLS "limit the acceptance, publication and marketing of certain residential real estate listing contracts, thereby limiting the sellers' ability to choose a listing type that best serves their specific needs."

The consent order approved by the commission prohibits MiRealSource "from adopting or enforcing any rules or polices that deny or limit the ability of MLS members to enter into exclusive agency listings, or any other lawful listing agreements, with property sellers," according to the FTC and requires the MLS to make necessary changes to its rules within 45 days of final approval.

The Commission voted 5-0 to approve the consent order, and the order is subject to a 30-day public comment period, which will expire March 7. After that date, the commission will decide whether to make the order final. Comments can be sent to: FTC, Office of the Secretary, 600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W., Washington, DC 20580.

Virginia Blatt, CEO for MiRealSource, told Inman News in a November interview, "There is no point in spending a significant amount of resources, time and energy to litigate with the FTC. We'd rather spend our energies ... in service to our members." The MLS board made a decision to settle the FTC complaint after meeting several times to discuss the issue, she also said.

The Realcomp II MLS, meanwhile, continues to fight the FTC's charges. That group has issued a "call to action" at its Web site that asks subscribers to convey their support to the FTC and to members of U.S. Congress for an MLS policy that prevents the MLS from forwarding exclusive agency listings for display on several public Web sites.

"To our knowledge, the FTC has received only a few complaints against Realcomp regarding this specific policy. We now suggest it's time they hear from Realcomp Realtors who agree with the policy and stand behind it," according to the announcement.

Karen S. Kage, CEO for Realcomp II, told Inman News that Realcomp and the FTC are taking depositions of potential witnesses and the trial is scheduled for June. "Many of our broker and agent customers have communicated with the FTC expressing their support for Realcomp," she said, and the MLS has not rescinded any of the challenged rules. She said she could not discuss whether there have been any settlement discussions.

Shareholders for Realcomp II include the Dearborn Board of Realtors, Detroit Association of Realtors, Eastern Thumb Association of Realtors, Livingston Association of Realtors, Metropolitan Consolidated Association of Realtors, North Oakland County Board of Realtors, and Western-Wayne Oakland County Association of Realtors.

It is the largest Realtor-owned MLS, with about 15,000 members in southeastern Michigan.

The federal government is also engaged in a separate real estate-related antitrust lawsuit with the National Association of Realtors -- the U.S. Justice Department filed a lawsuit against the trade group in 2005 charging that the group adopted overly restrictive policies for the online sharing and display of property listings information.

Web Real Estate Firms Shake Up Home Economics (LAT)

By Annette Haddad, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

Challenging the commission system, they are giving rebates to buyers who hunt for houses on their own.

Recent Chicago transplants Pieter and Beth van Es have recovered from their sticker shock and are ready to buy a house in Southern California. Now, the Irvine couple have a new incentive.

When they buy their home through an online broker, they will get a nice chunk of their money back.

The Van Eses are using Seattle-based Redfin, one of several new brokerage services that hope to revolutionize home buying by rebating part of their commissions back to buyers. The challenge is aimed at traditional firms that charge full commissions, which often total tens of thousands of dollars in today's high-priced Southland market.

Although these upstarts have yet to make a major dent in nationwide sales volume, they are raising eyebrows and causing traditional brokerages to worry.

Redfin, which launches today in Southern California, offers rebates because buyers do much of the groundwork of finding homes via the Web. The brokerage handles the paperwork and conducts negotiations, usually over the phone or via e-mail or fax.

"If I can find a house myself, then I don't need the help of a [full-service] agent," said Pieter van Es, 39, who hadn't even met his Redfin agent. "And I can get 2% back."

Typically, the commission totals 5% to 6% of the sale price, which is then split between the buyer's agent and the seller's agent. The industry is prevented by law from setting commission rates. As a buyer's broker, Redfin rebates more than half of its cut to the buyer.

Cutting customers in on commission fees isn't a trend the brand-name, more established brokerages are exactly cheering about. The industry is mired in a slowdown, and the number of brokerages and agents is expected to shrink as firms consolidate or go out of business.

What's more, after growing fat on fees that totaled more than $60 billion in 2005, the industry finds itself under attack for alleged anti-competitive practices. The Justice Department has sued the National Assn. of Realtors for trying to limit the availability of property-listing data to upstart online firms such as Redfin and others.

Such data are at the core of the burgeoning rebate movement. As consumers access the same information that brokers have long controlled, a growing awareness of the costs of buying and selling a house is taking hold.

"Regular folks resent what agents charge. Soon the industry will be seen as bad as Big Oil or the tobacco companies," said Glenn Kelman, Redfin's chief executive. He has made few friends in the industry for his take-no-prisoners style and a business model that relies on other brokerages' listing agents to show homes to Redfin's clients.

DOJ_NMG_0129371

Having made a bundle on a software business during the dot-com boom, Kelman saw the real estate industry as ripe for the kind of technological changes that transformed the travel and securities brokerage industries. Redfin entered the Bay Area market last summer, after debuting in Seattle a year ago. It has transacted 242 deals but has yet to turn a profit.

Yet the rise of new models like Redfin suggests that "the agent's role is greatly diminished because they are not doing as much of the legwork as before," said Greg Sterling of online consulting and research firm Sterling Market Intelligence. "Now, the consumer is picking up much of the slack."

Tom Phillips and his wife were working with a full-service agent when they were in the market for a house in San Diego last summer. But it dawned on him after two weekends trailing her around town, viewing homes in neighborhoods he had little interest in, that he could do a better job on his own.

"I was following her Jaguar around and got to thinking, 'How many payments on her car will I be helping her make?' " Phillips said.

He then called BuySide Realty Inc., a Chicago-based online brokerage that entered the California market last year, and got a $15,000 rebate when he bought a house.

Many industry innovators are counting on independent, tech-savvy customers who prefer being hands-on. And thanks to so-called mash-up technology developed by Google and others, many of these brokerages' websites provide not only a given market's listings but also the means to plot them on an interactive map, along with comparative market data and historical price trends.

"The mapping technology changed the game for consumer search," said Michael Davin, executive vice president of Cata List Homes, a Hermosa Beach-based realty firm that charges sellers a 3% commission. CataList recently began giving rebates to buyers.

Although the dominant players have ceded some ground to the newer firms, they are quickly regaining their footing and have adopted an if-you-can't-beat-'em-join-'em mentality, confident that their name recognition and market positions will carry the day.

"These start-up companies that are doing innovative things are great," said Thomas Kunz, chief executive of Century 21 Real Estate, the nationwide brokerage based in Parsippany, N.J.

"But you don't have to be the innovator in every one of these areas because the one piece they don't have is the people on the street and the brand name."

And in a slow market, Kunz contends, consumers are more inclined to request a higher level of service.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Drops In For Parks (HDNR)

By Jamie Turner

Harrisonburg Daily News Record, February 8, 2007

BIG MEADOWS — President Bush's helicopter touched down midmorning Wednesday on a mountaintop meadow, blasting waves of newly fallen snow along a line of black Suburbans awaiting his arrival.

Upon the president's arrival at the Shenandoah National Park, Secret Service agents and sharpshooters spread out across Big Meadows, which was closed to the public. The motorcade left behind five helicopters, which landed in front of the Byrd Visitor Center to travel only a few hundred feet.

The two lead Suburbans, each sporting U.S. and presidential flags, kept the president and first lady Laura Bush shielded behind tinted windows.

Centennial Initiative

The president, along with Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne, made the brief trip to the Shenandoah Valley to push an initiative Bush says is geared toward restoring America's national park heritage.

"I just want to thank everyone for being here today to talk about our national parks," Bush said. "Especially, those who cleared the roads."

Bush and Kempthorne led a round-table discussion on the president's National Parks Centennial Initiative, which he revealed earlier this week as part of his proposed 2008 budget.

DOJ_NMG_0129372

Bush is proposing to spend $2.4 billion on the National Park Service in the next federal budget, $230 million more than he requested last year.

Coupled with additional funding from public-private investments, the park service could receive up to $3 billion over 10 years to prepare for its 100th birthday in 2016.

Visit Starts Campaign

The president's visit began with a few opening remarks on why he's attempting to persuade Congress to support his initiative. Then Bush engaged in a discussion with national parks officials and representatives of organizations with a vested interest in the nation's parks.

"Our national parks are really one of America's great treasures," Bush said. "And the fundamental question is, 'Are we wise enough to treat them as such?'"

The president and first lady shared what they said was their love for spending time in national parks.

"The National Park's Centennial Initiative is a way to fully honor the park system," he said. "It will allocate $1 billion now for operational expenses, adding more rangers to the park service.

"Let's face it, those guys have a pretty cool job," he quipped. "But one person who has a lot of say in this initiative is Laura. She loves the outdoors."

The first lady spends time each summer visiting at least one national park as part of an annual vacation with a set of childhood friends.

"We spend a lot of time hiking and camping," Laura Bush said. "The part I like is the wilderness and the opportunity to be in the backcountry and run into a bear every once in a while, which we have."

Effect On Shenandoah

Kempthorne said he was eager to get the initiative off the ground by partnering with various divisions within the National Park Service and charitable organizations.

"What you have done has infused such an energy with this bold initiative," Kempthorne said. "And I think Theodore Roosevelt would be proud of you."

The initiative emphasizes three key goals:

n Preserving heritage and history;

n Building capacity for critical park operations and facilities by adding 3,000 new seasonal employees to the system; and n Reconnecting the public with the parks.

Shenandoah National Park Superintendent Chas Cartwright told the president this funding could dramatically affect operations locally.

"Shenandoah National Park has experienced a serious decline in visitation over the last several years," Cartwright said. "This funding for Shenandoah would mean $1.6 million for operations. This would truly be a big deal for Shenandoah."

"Chas, why are people not coming to the park?" Bush asked.

"It's a competition of what people want to do with their leisure time," Cartwright said. "I have five grandchildren, and if I asked them if they wanted to go for a hike on the park or play a video game, they are going to choose the video game. But we don't give them a choice."

A Quick Valley Stop

Following the round-table discussion, Bush made a final statement about how he intends to see his initiative carried out.

"I am calling upon our government and all Americans to be invested in our initiative," Bush said. "Our national parks are important, and we really do want individuals to feel they own a piece of this strategy.

"I urge all our fellow citizens to use the parks and to bring their families to the parks."

Within minutes of his closing statement, the president and first lady slipped out the back of the Byrd Visitor Center, on their way to the helicopter waiting in the meadow.

The only sign that the president had visited the Shenandoah Valley was the dozens of Secret Service agents and sharpshooters left on the ground to wrap up the visit.

Bush Seeks To Boost Spending On National Parks (KCS)

By Ron Hutcheson

The Kansas City Star, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - The brochures are coming back to national parks. So are the park rangers, if President Bush has his way.

Park supporters say Bush's proposed federal budget for fiscal 2008 would make a big difference at the 390 federally owned parks, monuments and other sites controlled by the National Park Service. In an otherwise lean domestic budget, Bush wants to boost park funding by $230 million - the first installment in an ambitious plan to spend as much as $3 billion on America's natural treasures over the next 10 years.

Of course, first Congress must go along, and it's not clear that it will. The plan includes a controversial proposal to leverage federal funds with matching private donations.

Insiders see the influence of first lady Laura Bush, an avid hiker who visits a national park with her Texas pals at least once a year. She and the president will travel to Virginia's Shenandoah National Park on Wednesday to promote the parks-improvement plan.

"They've put a lot of new money on the table," said Ron Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association, a private group that pushes for more parks funding. "Every park in the system, for the first time ever, would get a real dollar increase. It would make a real difference."

Tipton said park visitors would see the results by the summer of 2008.

Harry Truman's former home would get new drapes. The Great Smoky Mountains National Park would get 55 more park rangers. Everglades National Park would be able to better protect its aquatic specimen collections.

The park service plans to hire 3,000 more park rangers and 44 additional volunteer coordinators. Some visitor centers would get extended hours. About $1 million would be used to make sure the park system has enough brochures.

Park service officials say the extra cash would also improve campgrounds, restroom cleanliness, trash removal and trail maintenance.

"People are smiling in the hallways here today," said Jeffrey Olson, a spokesman at the agency's Washington headquarters.

It's no secret that the parks have been squeezed for years. The addition of new national parks in the 1970s and the 1980s, coupled with an increase in visitors, strained parks across the country. The park system gets about 270 million visitors annually, including repeat visits.

As a presidential candidate in 2000, Bush pledged to eliminate the maintenance backlog, but his previous increases in the park service budget failed to meet the needs. Now Bush wants to try a new approach.

His 2008 budget includes $100 million for a new parks program that would match private contributions, dollar for dollar. The goal is to come up with $3 billion in public and private money by the time the park service celebrates its 100th anniversary in 2016.

Critics dismissed Bush's plan as a gimmick that seeks to avoid government responsibility for public land.

"Our national parks are national treasures, and their funding is a national responsibility," said Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., the chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee. He called the funding plan "an illusion."

But Tipton, the parks advocate, thinks it could work - if Congress is willing to give it a try.

"I don't think it's pie in the sky," he said. "It will not be easy to find $100 million (in donations) every year, but I don't think it's an outrageous figure either."

And no one would be surprised if Laura Bush helps shake the money tree. She was the star attraction at a $1 million fundraiser last October for the National Park Foundation, a private group formed to raise money for the parks. Regan Gammon, one of the first lady's best friends and a hiking companion, serves on the foundation's board.

Laura Bush and her friends have been traveling to national parks every year since her 40th birthday 20 years ago. As first lady, she's hiked at Yosemite, Yellowstone, Death Valley, the Grand Canyon, Denali, Glacier, Olympic and Mesa Verde.

White House aides said they weren't sure how much influence she had on the budget, but there's no doubt that she approves of the plan.

"It's definitely something that has been personally important to her," said Susan Whitson, the first lady's spokeswoman. "It is definitely something that she cares about."

EDITORS: To localize, see specific parks at http://home.nps.gov/applications/budget2/fy08toc.htm. Also, while OMB documents put Bush's park funding increase at $250 million above fiscal 2006 levels, the National Park Service says it's $230 million above a pending fiscal 2007 funding bill to be passed soon by Congress. We use the NPS figure.

Bush Rallies Support For Park Initiative (LVS/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

Las Vegas Sun, February 8, 2007

President Bush came to the snow-topped Blue Ridge Mountains on Wednesday to rally public support for a plan to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into national parks.

"Congress needs to hear loud and clear how important this initiative is," Bush said at Shenandoah National Park.

DOJ_NMG_0129374

The president's National Parks Centennial Initiative, which he announced in his budget proposal on Monday, aims to generate up to $3 billion over 10 years. That combination of public and private money would serve as a run-up to the National Park Service's 100th birthday in 2016.

"I hope the citizens' groups who are concerned about the parks beat a hasty trail to the Congress and remind the Congress about what we have done, and what we need to do as good stewards of the parks," the president said.

Bush flew in Marine One to the park, where he and first lady Laura Bush participated in a roundtable with park service employees and spoke about his spending initiative.

Bush's 2008 budget would give the National Park Service its largest-ever funding increase.

In all, Bush allots $2.4 billion for the National Park Service for the budget year that begins Oct. 1 - $230 million more than he requested last year. That includes $150 million more for daily park operations. The plan would add 3,000 new seasonal employees and increase money for park maintenance - two areas that advocates say have suffered for years.

To spur private donations, Bush also called for $100 million in federal money to be spent to match citizens' contributions to national park operations - a move that critics said reflects a troubling reliance on private funds to pay for park operations.

Conservation and environmental groups generally applauded the parks money in Bush's budget proposal.

Ron Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association, said the president's proposal would be a significant step toward solving some of the parks' major problems, including crumbling facilities, growing pollution and lack of staff.

But House Natural Resources Committee Chairman Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., said the new funding is largely the result of shifting money from existing important park programs, such as construction, into a new budget column with a new label.

Bush Seeks Public-Private Funding Boost For Parks (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

President Bush traveled to Shenandoah National Park yesterday to tout his proposal to increase funding for national parks by $258 million next year, the first step in a plan to spend as much as $3 billion in public and private money on the popular attractions over the coming decade.

Bush's proposal, which critics called a sharp turn for a president whose previous budgets did not address maintenance and staffing problems at parks across the country, targets one of the few domestic areas where he has called for funding significant new initiatives in his fiscal 2008 spending plan.

The plan would pump $1 billion into the nation's 390 national parks and monuments by 2016, the park system's centennial. The proposal, which must be approved by Congress, would also call on private donors and philanthropies to donate as much as an additional $1 billion. The donated funds would be matched by the federal government.

"It's a bold program that calls upon the government to do its part, as well as our citizens to become invested in a campaign to really enhance the parks," Bush said. "The funding starts with a billion-dollar request over the next 10 years that I'll send up to Congress. It's really to enhance the operating missions of our parks. I'm looking forward to working with both Republicans and Democrats to get this initiative passed."

Bush's proposal, unveiled with his budget earlier this week, was applauded by parks advocates who say it is a much-needed boost for a park system straining to provide services for 270 million visitors a year.

"This budget proposal is a victory for all Americans who cherish our heritage and homeland. The Administration has responded to the diminished condition and serious needs of America's national parks and proposed a dramatic and unprecedented significant investment to help restore our parks before their centennial," National Parks Conservation Association President Tom Kiernan said in a statement.

But some critics were leery of Bush's idea of relying in part on private donations to fund major improvements in the nation's parks.

"While many Americans value the role of private philanthropy in supporting our National Park system, the administration's increasing reliance on the private sector in this capacity is troubling," said Rep. Nick J. Rahall II (D-W.Va.), chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee. "Our National Parks are national treasures -- and their funding is a national responsibility."

As Bush was campaigning for his parks initiative in the Blue Ridge Mountains, press secretary Tony Snow was challenging the notion that the administration's interest in the parks -- and the environment more generally -- marks a change for the president. Snow noted that last year Bush created the largest protected marine reserve in the world when he set aside as a national park an island chain spanning 1,400 miles of the Pacific northwest of Hawaii.

Snow also countered suggestions that Bush had denied that global warming has a large human component. The White House later released an open letter citing statements dating to 2001 in which Bush had said global warming was largely man-made.

"This is not new. Just as many people have been saying, 'Wow, isn't the president -- isn't it nice that the president has finally agreed that global warming has man-made components,' only to find out, because we've been telling you, that he first started talking about it in June of 2001," Snow said. "There's been a lot of misreporting, or perhaps it just hasn't -- perhaps folks have not taken notice of the fact that this is an administration that's been keenly committed both to environmentalism and conservationism from the start."

The President Shows His Environmentalist Colors (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Felicity Barringer

New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — After six years in the Oval Office, George W. Bush may have found his inner Teddy Roosevelt.

At a time when his policies on global warming are under scrutiny from environmentalists, President Bush this week cloaked himself in another environmental issue: conservation. He used his budget, and his bully pulpit, to announce a 10-year, $1 billion commitment in taxpayer money to enhance national parks, which have been limping along with limited money.

Most environmentalists would not say George W. Bush and Theodore Roosevelt in the same sentence, unless making an invidious comparison. Roosevelt, of course, created a collection of national preserves that helped form the foundation of the current park system. Mr. Bush, his detractors say, has let the national parks slide into decline — until now.

“This is real,” said Bill Wade, a former park superintendent and a persistent critic of the administration’s parks policies. “There’s a lot more focus in this budget for the operational funding that parks need.”

The turnaround came at the urging of Dirk Kempthorne, the former Idaho governor who is Mr. Bush’s new secretary of the interior. Two years ago, when Mr. Kempthorne was still governor, he and his wife spent two days with the president and Laura Bush, fishing, hiking and cycling in the Idaho outdoors.

“I saw up close and personal what the outdoors meant to this couple,” the secretary said in an interview Wednesday.

Once he became interior secretary, he said, he told the president that the 90th anniversary of the parks system, in 2006, should prompt planning for the centennial.

“Let’s not just light a candle for the one day of the 90th,” Mr. Kempthorne recalled saying. “The centennial needs to be spectacular.”

On Wednesday, the two men and Mrs. Bush traveled to Shenandoah National Park, 75 miles west of Washington, to talk to private supporters of the parks about the new twist in their initiative: a challenge to the private sector to raise an additional $1 billion for park enhancement, which the government would match dollar for dollar for a maximum $3 billion at the end of 10 years.

With attendance at national parks declining, recreation companies said the initiative makes business sense.

“It’s good business and it’s good policy,” said Gary Kiedaisch, president and chief executive of The Coleman Company, a leading manufacturer of camping equipment. In an interview after appearing with Mr. Bush on Wednesday, Mr. Kiedaisch said his company had not “put actual hard dollars down” but would support the initiative.

The initiative comes less than a year after Mr. Bush offered another gift to environmentalists: creating a marine reserve in the Northwest Hawaiian Islands.

“We’re quite enthusiastic about it,” Gene Sykes, chairman of the board of the National Parks Conservation Association, who participated in Wednesday’s event, said.

That enthusiasm, however, has yet to infect critics of Mr. Bush’s environmental record. Despite the praise for its effort on parks, the administration found itself on the defensive Wednesday — so much so that the White House felt compelled to issue an “open letter on the president’s position on climate change.”

In the letter, Mr. Bush’s top science and environmental advisers challenged news media reports that suggested that his concern about climate change was new. “Beginning in June 2001,” they wrote, “President Bush has consistently acknowledged climate change is occurring and humans are contributing to the problem.”

The letter cited a June 2001 statement in which Mr. Bush quoted the National Academy of Sciences saying an increase in Earth’s temperatures was “due in large part to human activity.” But it failed to finish the quotation, in which he went on to say it was unclear how much “natural fluctuations in climate” played a role, whether further climate change was inevitable and what, if anything, could be done about it.

The issue came up at the daily press briefing, where Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, insisted there was nothing new about the president’s commitment to parks or his recognition of global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0129376

"There's been a lot of misreporting," Mr. Snow said. "Perhaps folks have not taken notice of the fact that this is an administration that's been keenly committed, both to environmentalism and conservationism from the start."

At the suggestion that Mr. Bush was awakening to the environment, Mr. Snow said it was reporters who were waking up. "The long national slumber," he said, "may be approaching an end."

But Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, a group that has conducted assiduous and unfriendly analyses of the administration's environmental record, had a slightly different take.

"When presidents come to the end of their terms, they always look for great places to save," Mr. Clapp said, adding, "As for the rest of President Bush's environmental record, I'm still snoring."

One not snoring is Secretary Kempthorne, who has a statue of Teddy Roosevelt in his office, a constant reminder of that president's commitment to conservation. At the Shenandoah park on Wednesday, he invoked a comparison between the first President Roosevelt and the second President Bush.

Turning to his boss, he said, "I think Theodore Roosevelt would be very proud of you."

Bush Seeks More Park Money (RTD)

By Rex Bowman

Richmond Times-Dispatch, February 8, 2007

LURAY - President Bush came to the snow-topped Shenandoah National Park yesterday to rally public support for a plan to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into national parks.

The plan would add $1.6 million to the Shenandoah's $10 million annual budget and $1.5 million to the Blue Ridge Parkway's $14 million budget, new money the parks' supporters have been clamoring for after years of restrained spending.

In the Shenandoah, the extra money would allow the park to restore ranger-led programs, lengthen the hours of some attractions, increase enforcement patrols, reopen information centers and even mow the grass more frequently, said park spokeswoman Julena Campbell.

Bush's 2008 budget would give the National Park Service its largest-ever funding increase.

In all, Bush allots $2.4 billion for the National Park Service for the budget year that begins Oct. 1 - $230 million more than he requested last year. That includes $150 million more for daily park operations. The plan would add 3,000 seasonal employees and increase money for park maintenance, two areas that advocates say have suffered for years.

"Congress needs to hear loud and clear how important this initiative is," Bush said.

The president's National Parks Centennial Initiative, which he announced in his budget proposal Monday, aims to generate up to $3 billion over 10 years. That combination of public and private money would serve as a run-up to the National Park Service's 100th birthday in 2016.

"I hope the citizens groups who are concerned about the parks beat a hasty trail to the Congress and remind the Congress about what we have done, and what we need to do as good stewards of the parks," the president said.

Catharine Gilliam, Virginia program manager for the National Parks Conservation Association, said the organization is "incredibly pleased" with the proposed boost in funding for the nation's 390 parks and monuments. She also lauded Bush's pledge to match private donations of up to $100 million with federal money.

"We see that as a good thing," she said. "The Shenandoah National Park Trust was created several years ago and raises private money for the park. This [initiative] is a substantial boost to those efforts."

Others said the initiative reflects a troubling reliance on private funds to pay for park operations.

Judith Cariker, interim director of the Shenandoah Valley Travel Association in New Market, said she supports any effort to improve the Shenandoah National Park.

"The National Park and Skyline Drive are certainly two of the greatest assets of this area."

Ron Tipton, senior vice president for programs at the National Parks Conservation Association, said the president's proposal would be a significant step toward solving some of the parks' major problems, including crumbling facilities, growing pollution and a lack of staff.

But House Natural Resources Committee Chairman Rep. Nick J. Rahall II, D-W.Va., said the new funding is largely the result of shifting money from existing important park programs, such as construction, into a new budget column with a new label.

Bush Would Boost Park Package (RMN)

By M.E. Sprengelmeyer

Rocky Mountain News, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129377

President Bush has proposed an extra $5.1 million for National Park Service lands in Colorado, and that could be just the tip of the iceberg if Congress backs a plan to match private donations.

The president has asked Congress to give the park service its biggest budget increase in history - $258 million more than in his 2006 budget request.

The hope is to jump-start public lands projects to get ready for 2016, the 100th anniversary of the agency.

In Colorado, this year's budget request would mean an extra $3 million for Colorado's four national parks: Rocky Mountain, Mesa Verde, Black Canyon of the Gunnison and the Great Sand Dunes. Meanwhile, historic sites, monuments and recreation areas in the state would get increases of more than $2 million over 2006 levels.

Combined, Colorado's sites would get $34.5 million, compared with $29.4 million in fiscal year 2006, the last time Congress approved federal budget.

"This is the most significant increase I've seen in my 30 years with the park service," said Vaughn Baker, superintendent of Rocky Mountain National Park.

There, an extra $1.35 million would be used to hire 27 seasonal workers, including rangers, patrol officers and maintenance personnel, and chip away an estimated $65 million to $70 million worth of deferred maintenance, Baker said.

Congress still has to approve the spending, along with a plan for the federal government to match up to $100 million per year worth of private donations for park-related projects.

The hope is that over the next decade that means an extra $1 billion in federal spending to match at least $1 billion in private contributions.

That plan will take shape between now and the end of May, after Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, who oversees the park service, leads a series of "listening sessions" around the country about projects members of the public and would-be donors would like to see.

17 percent increase for Colorado sites

President Bush's proposed budget would pump $2.4 billion into the National Park Service in fiscal year 2008. The budget proposal includes a 17 percent increase for parks, monuments and other sites in Colorado.

Budget increase Percent change

Rocky Mountain National Park $1,347,000 12

Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park $569,000 53

Dinosaur National Monument $491,000 17

Colorado National Monument $434,000 38

Florissant Fossil Beds National Monument $130,000 17

Hovenweep National Monument $32,000 6

Yucca House National Monument $1,000 1

Sand Creek Massacre National Historic Site $198,000 43

Curecanti National Recreation Area $772,000 25

Bent's Old Fort National Historic Site $80,000 7

Total $5,139,000 17

Bush Offers Park $1 Million Boost (BJ)

By Bob Downing

Beacon Journal, February 8, 2007

Bush offers park $1 million boost Extra funds would restore cuts By Bob Downing Beacon Journal staff writer

The Cuyahoga Valley National Park would get a major boost under President Bush's 2008 federal budget, and park visitors would see a big difference with the 10 percent funding increase.

The additional $1 million proposed for the Cuyahoga Valley would enable the park to hire six full-time staffers and 16 seasonal employees and to restore cuts in interpretive, educational programs and services that were made because of tight budgets in recent years, said Superintendent John P. Debo Jr.

The additional funding, if approved by Congress, would have ``an absolutely enormous impact on this park," Debo said.

Bush has proposed a $2.4 billion budget in fiscal year 2008 for national parks, and that represents a $258 million increase over 2006 funding approved by Congress. That's the biggest increase ever for park programs and operations, said Mary Bomar, director of the National Park Service, in a Tuesday teleconference.

DOJ_NMG_0129378

The 33,000-acre federal park between Akron and Cleveland is expecting $10.1 million for operations in the federal fiscal year that began last October. Congress has not yet appropriated those funds.

That number would jump by just over $1 million to $11.1 million in the 2008 federal fiscal year that begins next October.

The bulk of those funds will be used in the Cuyahoga Valley to sustain and boost the park's core operations including maintenance, interpretation, education and law enforcement, Debo said. That ``will enable us to regain lost ground in the last few years," he said.

The additional funds proposed by Bush represent ``a huge turnaround in the budget fortunes of the National Park Service," Debo said. ``We're just delighted."

The full-time staff in the Cuyahoga Valley had dwindled from 128 to 96 in recent years, and positions have not been filled because of tight budgets, Debo said.

The additional funding would include:

• $314,000 for maintenance. The park has 240 historically significant structures plus 20,000 acres of federally owned land.

• $260,000 for interpretive and education programs led by rangers. The park also will look at using technologies to reach park visitors and to boost their park experiences, he said

• $85,000 for hiring eight seasonal law-enforcement rangers to boost patrols and public protection, especially during the busy summer season.

• $48,000 to augment what the park already is doing to promote and organize volunteers.

• $298,000 for pay increases in 2008.

In the past, Congress would approve pay increases but not allocate the needed funds.

Parks like the Cuyahoga Valley had to absorb the added costs of pay raises out of their operating funds, and that's been tough, Debo said.

He said he was ``very pleased with the money level for the Cuyahoga Valley," noting that only 131 of the national park system's 390 units got additional operating funds.

The additional funds mean the Cuyahoga Valley won't have to operate in ``a reduction mode" like it has for the last five years or so, Debo said.

The Cuyahoga Valley and other national parks could be in line for even more funding under Bush's National Parks Centennial Initiative.

Under that proposal, Bush wants to provide $1 billion over the next 10 years to national parks as the park system approaches its 100th birthday in 2016. An additional $1 billion would be available to match donations, possibly leveraging a third $1 billion for national parks.

The Cuyahoga Valley intends to work closely with the Cuyahoga Valley National Park Association, a friends-of-the-park group, to develop plans for new programs and to fund financial support from outside parties, Debo said.

A Centennial Challenge (WT)

By John Bridgeland And Curt Buchholtz

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

As our nation prepares for the centennial of its national park system, we should take stock of our past and future stewardship of these natural, historic and cultural treasures that attract 287 million visitors a year. This week, the president's release of a multibillion-dollar centennial plan will be an important step in determining what national park system we celebrate in 2016.

Nearly 100 years ago, President Theodore Roosevelt welcomed governors to a White House conference on the conservation of natural resources to prevent "the advent of the woodless age." Economic progress threatened to exhaust our natural resources, prompting government to place large tracts of land in federal custody. By 1916, Congress had created the National Park Service to ensure that parks such as Yellowstone and Glacier would remain unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations. By 1933, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt had added more than 50 military parks and monuments such as Yorktown and Gettysburg to the system.

A decade before the 50th anniversary of the park service, President Eisenhower launched a 10-year, billion-dollar project to enable more Americans to utilize our national parks. His "Mission 66" resulted in the inclusion of 78 additional park units, the completion of the Gateway Arch; the Blue Ridge, Colonial and George Washington Memorial Parkways; and the construction of more than 100 new visitor centers to promote tourism. At the 50th anniversary of the National Park Service, there were achievements to celebrate and lessons to be learned.

Today, the national park system consists of 390 areas covering more than 84 million acres in 49 states and territories. Yet this system suffers from a significant funding shortfall every year that affects the preservation of historic buildings, cultural artifacts, native species and beloved park rangers that give families guided tours of places like Mammoth Cave, Antietam and the Grand Canyon. We can do better as a nation and help is on the way.

In a tight budget environment during a costly war, President Bush and Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne are nevertheless coming forward with an ambitious 10-year, $3 billion "Centennial Initiative & Challenge" that renews the nation's commitment to our parks and fosters accountability, innovation and partnerships. The federal government will make a significant new investment of $258 million for park operations, challenge private philanthropy with the lure of additional federal support and launch signature initiatives that connect citizens and communities to our national parks in innovative ways.

Park business plans with clear metrics will ensure new federal investments are made wisely to protect natural and historic resources, maintain facilities and provide more rangers. These will include 3,000 more seasonal rangers, who enhance the educational and recreational experience of visitors. On top of a strong new federal commitment, the centennial plan challenges philanthropy to attract an additional $100 million each year for 10 years with a dollar-for-dollar match. This is a match worth making.

National parks are dramatic outdoor classrooms and new technologies can deepen educational experiences. Imagine students visiting Gettysburg National Military Park downloading lectures on their iPods from historian David McCullough to learn of Joshua Chamberlain's textbook maneuver at Little Round Top that saved the Union Army; paleontologists teaching awestruck schoolchildren the scientific method as they take them on a hands-on or virtual dinosaur dig; or park visitors learning how bacteria from the bubbling pools of Yellowstone made mapping the human genome possible.

New efforts will strengthen the call to action to encourage up to 1 million volunteers every year to join the more than 125,000 volunteers who work in our parks to help maintain trails, catalogue species and further enhance visitor experiences.

The idea to create a national park system is one of America's greatest innovations. It prompted more than 100 nations to create 1,200 national parks and preserves worldwide.

What we do with our parks over the next decade will affect how our children and grandchildren enjoy and learn from them and how America's evolving story and heritage are safeguarded. Let's hope our generation meets the challenge to preserve this collective consciousness of our nation and has something grand to celebrate at the 100th anniversary of our national park system.

John Bridgeland is vice chairman of the Earth Conservation Corps and CEO of Civic Enterprises. Curt Buchholtz is president of the National Park Friends Alliance and executive director of the Rocky Mountain Nature Association.

Interior Dept. Gets Reprieve On Its Decision On Bald Eagle (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — With a court-ordered deadline looming for removal of the bald eagle from the endangered species list, the Interior Department, rejecting the advice of its staff wildlife biologists, tried to limit a separate set of protections for the majestic bird that has served as a national symbol for centuries.

Public reaction, however, to its December proposal was so sharp that the department had sought a reprieve from the deadline, which it received Wednesday. It now has until June 29 to make its final decision on the eagle's status and the extent of its continuing protections.

Rebounding from a historically low population in the early 1960s, the eagle has become a symbol of the success of the 1973 Endangered Species Act. In 1963, there were barely more than 400 breeding pairs in the lower 48 states. Today, the Fish and Wildlife Service at the Interior Department estimates there are more than 7,000 breeding pairs.

But even before the widespread use of pesticides in the 1940s and 1950s caused the drop in the population, the eagle had been a target for people coveting its feathers, so Congress passed a law preventing the "taking" of any eagle. This word was broadly defined to include everything from hunting the bird to simply disturbing it.

Now, the department has proposed regulatory language narrowing that definition and making it harder to prove that human actions disturbed the bird. Under the new language, landowners and developers could cut down trees, build and engage in other activities in the vicinity of the bird and its nest as long as eagles were not killed or injured and did not abandon their nests.

DOJ_NMG_0129380

But two months before the department adopted that language, H. Dale Hall, director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, sent his superiors a memorandum arguing for a more protective approach.

The internal proposal advocated by wildlife biologists, the memorandum said, “does not require actual injury, death or nest abandonment” — merely the likelihood of such an outcome.

Mr. Hall, in an interview on Wednesday, said, “I have never been overruled” by top officials at the Interior Department on the extent of protections. He said he “stands behind” the December proposal from the department, which gave the eagles less protection.

The earlier memorandum, seeking greater protections, he said was part of a continuing conversation within the department as it struggled to find “the right point” along a continuum of options. Conservationists favor tight protections; many landowners seek less stringent ones.

John Kostyack, a senior counsel at the National Wildlife Federation, said in a comment to the department that the time lag between “human activity” and the severe impact on the bird means the activity “would likely never be linked to the impact.”

Coast Guard Failed To Properly Oversee Contracts, Officials Say (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Even as contractors built patrol boats with buckling hulls and a large new cutter with structural flaws, a U.S. Coast Guard review gave their performance high marks last year, extended their deal for nearly four years and paid them a multimillion-dollar bonus, government investigators said.

Coast Guard analysts evaluated only boats, aircraft and equipment systems that had been delivered under its troubled $24 billion, 25-year fleet-replacement program, known as Deepwater, disregarding defective ships under development by companies led by Northrop Grumman and Lockheed Martin, Homeland Security Department Inspector General Richard L. Skinner said at a congressional hearing Tuesday.

Investigators called the awards the latest example of breakdowns in the federal government's handling of a complex contracting experiment for the Deepwater project. The Coast Guard turned over to a private "systems integrator" the main responsibility for planning, designing and producing a fleet to meet its needs after concluding that it lacked such expertise in-house.

As a result, investigators said, Coast Guard officials at times failed to protect taxpayers' interests.

"We are relying on contractors in more areas, and we are giving them more discretion. And where there's more discretion, there's more risk," said David M. Walker, head of the Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm. In testimony to the House, he and Skinner called for more aggressive oversight. The hearing Tuesday was conducted by the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security.

Despite Deepwater's problems, the Northrop-Lockheed partnership received a rating of "good" from a Coast Guard evaluator last May and had its term extended by 43 out of a possible 60 months.

A separate evaluation gave the partnership, Integrated Coast Guard Systems, $3.1 million in incentive and award fees, Walker said in an interview.

"I mean, that doesn't pass the straight-face test," he told the panel.

The disclosures come as Congress and government experts have stepped up scrutiny of the Pentagon's and DHS's use of the private sector to design and deploy next-generation technology such as the Army's Future Combat Systems initiative, and DHS's "virtual fence" at the border, called SBInet.

"The Deepwater and SBI contracts are extreme examples of giving government functions to the private contractors," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which is holding a hearing into Deepwater and SBInet today ."In each case, the government appears to be abdicating oversight and giving private companies a virtual blank check."

Mary Elder, a Coast Guard spokeswoman, said retired Rear Adm. Patrick M. Stillman, who was then Deepwater manager, was aware of "facts relating to the production" of the cutter and other vehicles when he extended the deal last May. But he and a Coast Guard review panel were bound by criteria set in the initial five-year contract, signed June 2002 , that cited "operational effectiveness, total ownership cost and customer satisfaction."

New rules put in place for the second 43-month phase, which starts June 25, "are considered more objective," Elder said.

Adm. Thad W. Allen, Coast Guard commandant, met with Lockheed and Northrop executives Jan. 19 to negotiate terms for the contract renewal and has reorganized the service's contracting staff to beef up and unify their authority.

DOJ_NMG_0129381

Allen is seeking to set new performance guidelines, toughen rules that an outside entity certify boats and planes produced under Deepwater, and take a bigger role in determining the work done by subcontractors, Skinner said.

"He recognizes we, the Coast Guard, need to get a grip over these contractors," Skinner said.

Skinner's office reported on Jan. 29 that the Coast Guard's new, 418-foot National Security Cutter -- the largest ship the service has ever commissioned and the cornerstone of its new fleet -- suffers from design flaws that even when corrected will curtail its operating days by as much as 20 percent. The errors also helped nearly double the cost of the first two of eight planned vessels, from $517 million to about $1 billion, depending on negotiations and repairs ultimately required. None of the cutters has yet entered Coast Guard service.

The ship's "design and performance deficiencies are fundamentally the result of the Coast Guard's failure to exercise technical oversight over the design and construction of its Deepwater assets," the report said.

In December, the Coast Guard also docked eight 123-foot cutters retrofitted under the program and based in Key West, Fla., after determining they were not seaworthy. That came after the Coast Guard had spent nearly $100 million.

Meanwhile, the Coast Guard's plan to fill the gap by accelerating development of the next-generation, 140-foot Fast Response Cutter has stalled because of technical glitches.

Skinner said the Integrated Coast Guard Systems extension was based mainly on other boats and aircraft it delivered, not on the Fast Response Cutter, National Security Cutter and the 123-foot patrol boats.

"We said, 'You've got to fix that, because if you'd included that, they probably would have gotten an F,' " Skinner said. Despite the troubles, the Coast Guard has paid the partnership incentive awards totaling $16 million since 2002, Elder said. She said the awards were for meeting targets on other systems.

Integrated Coast Guard Systems spokeswoman Margaret Mitchell-Jones declined to comment, referring questions to Elder.

Ex-agent Wins Lawsuit Against FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 6, 2007

Jurors said the FBI retaliated against the female agent, who filed a discrimination complaint in 1998.

Federal jurors hugged former FBI agent Jane Turner on Monday after awarding her $565,000 in damages and finding that the agency had retaliated against her for filing a 1998 sex-discrimination complaint.

"I think you were the very best FBI agent," juror Mashima Dickens told Turner, who investigated child sex-abuse crimes. "Looking at the way you were treated, I just said you were screwed left and right," Dickens said, tears rolling down her cheeks.

"I just want to tell you I have nothing but the utmost respect for you," juror Renee Anderle said as she hugged Turner in the hallway outside Chief U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum's courtroom in Minneapolis.

"This is vindication," said Turner, 55, of St. Paul. "We spoke truth to power, and we won."

But Turner said she could never repair the damage done to her by her colleagues in the FBI, an organization she had dreamed of joining since she read Nancy Drew detective novels at age 12.

"I'm dead in their eyes because I betrayed them. And that's what's so sad," Turner said.

The government's attorneys declined to comment on the verdict in the trial, which began Jan. 24.

Stephen Kohn, one of Turner's attorneys and president of the National Whistleblower Center in Washington, called it historic. "I think it's the largest jury verdict in a civil rights case against the FBI for an individual plaintiff," he said.

The jury of six women and four men awarded Turner damages of $60,000 in lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress, loss of reputation and similar injuries.

Rosenbaum will reduce the non-wage damages to the statutory limit of $300,000, said Robert Hill, of Eden Prairie, another of Turner's attorneys.

Turner had a noteworthy career. After joining the FBI in 1978, she helped capture Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy, and solved some horrendous child-sex abuse and murder cases on North Dakota Indian reservations.

Records show that she received superior or exceptional job ratings until after her supervisor, Craig Welken, was interviewed in 1999 about a sex-discrimination complaint she had filed the previous year. Her ratings plummeted, which led to a transfer from Minot, N.D., to a desk job in Minneapolis.

Jurors decided that the negative job reviews were retaliation for filing the internal discrimination complaint, but that the transfer was not.

About a month after Turner filed the complaint against Welken, a task force was being formed to investigate a child pornographer who had confessed in an Internet chat room to murdering his 7-year-old daughter. The killer, Larry Froistad, recanted his confession, and the U.S. attorney in North Dakota at the time, the late John Schneider, wanted Turner's help. Welken resisted initially, but said he gave in because Schneider was "unrelenting."

Schneider later credited Turner in an e-mail with solving the Froistad case.

Martha Fagg, one of two assistant U.S. attorneys from Iowa who represented the FBI, argued that Turner had basically stopped working after the Froistad case, and that the transfer to Minneapolis was designed to help her get back on track.

"In my opinion, she was using the EEO [Equal Employment Opportunity] process not as a shield, but as a sword," Fagg said.

However, Turner's attorneys introduced evidence that she kept up her casework and solved some especially tough cases while she was being downgraded on her reviews. Two assistant U.S. attorneys testified that they never saw Turner slack off.

Turner's attorneys plan to file for compensation. Kohn said the final bill will be "well over $1 million to taxpayers in a case that should have been resolved at a fraction of the cost years ago."

Turner still has a complaint pending against the FBI with the U.S. inspector general's office. She reported that a fellow agent had brought back memorabilia from the World Trade Center in Manhattan after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Turner said she was being run out of the FBI after that, so she retired in 2003.

Correction: FBI Whistleblower Story (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 8, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS - In a Feb. 5 story about the outcome of a sex discrimination complaint brought by former FBI Agent Jane Turner, The Associated Press erroneously described Nikki Carlson. She was a jury consultant for Turner, not the defense team.

Jury Awards FBI Agent Cash In Report-retaliation Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

A longtime FBI agent who claimed she was subjected to "continued hostility" after reporting another agent's removal of a Tiffany crystal globe from ground zero at the World Trade Center has been awarded $565,000 by a federal jury for lost wages, damage to her reputation and emotional distress.

A Minneapolis civil jury of six women and four men unanimously held that the FBI illegally retaliated against Jane Turner, a 25-year veteran FBI agent, by downgrading her performance reviews. She was awarded $60,000 in lost wages and $505,000 for punitive damages.

Mrs. Turner's right to have the case heard before a jury was ordered by the 8th U.S. Court of Appeals in Minneapolis after a lawsuit she filed in 2001 was dismissed in 2004.

Among FBI officials named in court documents as participating in the retaliatory actions were James Burrus, the assistant director of the FBI's criminal division, and James Casey, a high-level official in the FBI's counterterrorism program.

The $565,000 judgment is expected to be reduced by Chief U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum, who heard the case, to the statutory limit of $360,000.

"The buck stopped here. Jane Turner is an American hero," said Stephen M. Kohn, one of her attorneys and the president of the National Whistleblower Center. "She refused to be silent when her co-agents stole property from ground zero. She paid the price and lost her job.

"The jury did the right thing and ensured that justice will take place in her case," he said. "... The FBI misused its performance review and inspection process to justify vicious retaliation against an award-winning agent."

Mrs. Turner's performance had been attacked by FBI managers after she filed her lawsuit and disclosed what the appeals court described as serious FBI misconduct in its handling of child-abuse cases. Her complaint in the World Trade Center matter led to an investigation by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General, which confirmed Mrs. Turner's accusations.

In the Minneapolis lawsuit, the court said the timing of performance rating downgrades for Mrs. Turner by the FBI "strongly supports an inference of causation."

The court said Mrs. Turner wrote a memo to her second-line supervisor, Mr. Burrus, referring to her equal employment opportunity complaint and accusing her immediate supervisor, Craig Welken, of discriminatory treatment. It said Mr. Burrus forwarded the memo to Mr. Welken and five days later, Mr. Welken wrote an interim performance review downgrading Mrs. Turner from "superior" to "minimally acceptable/unacceptable" in all rated areas.

DOJ_NMG_0129383

"The fact that it was not a regularly scheduled performance review and occurred less than two months after the regular annual review in April ... is further circumstantial evidence that the performance rating downgrade was motivated by Turner's complaints," the court said.

Mrs. Turner was then transferred to the Minneapolis field office and resigned in October 2003 after the FBI had initiated termination proceedings.

Report: Obama Plans To Skip Public Funding (USAT)

USA Today, February 8, 2007

Following the lead of his chief rivals, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., will not accept public campaign financing for the Democratic presidential primaries or the general election if he's the nominee, an official close to the campaign told the Associated Press on Wednesday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the campaign had not yet announced the decision.

The move would allow Obama to raise and spend unlimited private money. He would join Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and former North Carolina senator John Edwards, fellow Democrats who decided to forgo public financing. Obama, who established a presidential exploratory committee last month, plans to announce his candidacy Saturday.

ATF transfers two of bureau's top officials

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has replaced two of its leaders. Edgar Domenech, the No. 2 official at the agency, has been transferred to head the bureau's field division in Washington, D.C., ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell said. The assistant director, Michael Bouchard, will leave to oversee field operations nationally.

Mixell would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of a Justice Department audit alleging mismanagement and questionable spending decisions at ATF that led to Director Carl Truscott's departure last August. Domenech was replaced by Ronnie Carter, supervisor of the Dallas field division, and Bouchard by William Hoover, head of the bureau's D.C. field division.

Emanuel calls for special counsel in probe

A House Democratic leader is calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to name Carol Lam as a special counsel so she can continue to oversee a political corruption investigation. Lam, who was a chief federal prosecutor in San Diego, was among seven prosecutors fired last year by the Justice Department. Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said Lam should continue to manage the probe that led to the conviction of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., on bribery charges. Georgia lawmaker entering hospice

Rep. Charles Norwood, R-Ga., is going home to Augusta for hospice care, forgoing further treatment for lung cancer that has spread to his liver, spokesman John Stone said. The seven-term congressman is not resigning, Stone said. "He said, 'Let me go back home, stop all the treatments and just see how I can do there,' " Stone said. Norwood, 65, had a lung transplant in 2004. He suffers from idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis, a chronic lung disease. Last year, doctors found a cancerous tumor on his other lung. They removed the tumor, but found cancer on his liver in November.

ATF Replaces 2 Top Leaders In Shake-Up (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has replaced two of its leaders, the latest shake-up since reports surfaced of financial and management problems surrounding the agency's former director.

Edgar A. Domenech, the No. 2 official at the Justice Department agency, has been transferred to head the bureau's field division in Washington, D.C., a spokeswoman said.

The assistant director, Michael Bouchard, will leave to oversee field operations nationally. He has been named special assistant to the bureau's acting director, Michael J. Sullivan.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell said the two will be replaced with what she described as veteran special agents who "bring a combination of leadership experience and great respect from colleagues that is critical to the ATF's success at the executive level."

Mixell would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of mismanagement allegations and questionable spending decisions that led to the departure last August of Carl J. Truscott as director.

An audit by the Justice Department's inspector general in October found that Truscott ordered his staff to help with his nephew's high school homework, wasting the agency's time and violating ethics rules. The report also concluded that Truscott's leadership, hiring practices and financial decisions were troubling, including his plan to spend $100,000 on gym equipment for the ATF's new headquarters.

Domenech was replaced Wednesday by Ronnie A. Carter, 53, a special agent since 1980 who supervises the Dallas field division. Bouchard's post was filled by William J. Hoover, who is in charge of the bureau's Washington, D.C., field division.

US, Latin American Police Chiefs Meet In LA For Gang Summit (AFP)

By Paula Bustamante

AFP, February 8, 2007

Police chiefs from Latin America and the United States opened a three-day summit aimed at forming a strategy to crack down on violent crime gangs.

Latino gangs which originated from Los Angeles have been blamed for smuggling drugs and weapons as well as murders, rapes and robberies.

"Gang violence is a problem of international scope, and we must face it on a international scale," Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa told reporters.

"We must coordinate with our international counterparts in a smart and effective way."

Delegates from Mexico, Belize, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras attended Wednesday's conference along with several US police chiefs and officials from the FBI and Justice Department.

The conference aims to agree ways of increasing information-sharing among law enforcement agencies and look at how best to fight gangs thought to be responsible for trafficking drugs and illegal weapons.

FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said the conference's focus was to "fight gang violence in all its forms."

Central American nations have seen a sharp uptick in gang-related crimes, Eimiller said. El Salvador, with a population of 6.8 million people, saw an average of 10 homicides a day in 2006 -- about 70 percent committed by gangs.

"That trend needs to stop before it comes here," Eimiller said.

Lee Baca, a Los Angeles County Sheriff, said many Los Angeles-based Hispanic gangs had now evolved into slick criminal syndicates.

"They have become sophisticated in communications and travel, and have set-up networks to carry out their criminal enterprises," Baca said, noting that many gang members were able to travel across borders with ease.

US authorities first attacked the threat of cross-border gangs by agreeing to work together in 2004 to stem violence committed by the 10,000-strong Los Angeles-based Mara Salvatrucha gang, known as MS-13.

The crackdown has led to the arrest of 3,400 gang members, 1,300 of whom were identified as members of MS-13, according to Kevin Kozak, of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement's (ICE) Los Angeles office.

"It's a recognition that this is not something any one agency can do on its own," Kozak said. "We need to share information, we need to collaborate and we need to work together with as many agencies as we can."

Kozak said the shooting of two police officers in Long Beach, southern California last December by a member of the city's 'Eastside Longos' gang had highlighted the need for greater intelligence sharing.

The gang member, who had entered the US illegally and who already been deported from the country to Mexico once before, was later shot dead by police in Santa Ana, California.

"Ever since that shooting, we've turned 100 percent of our efforts to find which of those Eastside Longos gang members are here illegally, and who we can simply remove from the streets," Kozak said.

About 671,832 criminals were deported from the United States between 2003 and 2006, but it is unclear exactly how many were gang members, according to ICE statistics.

An ICE spokeswoman denied the crackdown on gangs was being used as a pretext to root out illegal aliens.

"This is not an immigration issue, this is a public safety issue," said ICE spokeswoman Virginia Kice. "In many cases, the victims of violent street gangs are immigrants themselves."

Los Angeles Names And Targets City's Worst 11 Gangs (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

Mayor and police chief vow to pursue the groups with local-federal law enforcement teams. Experts question the strategy.

Launching a counteroffensive against organized street thugs, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and police officials took the unusual step Wednesday of identifying the city's 11 worst gangs, then promising to go after them with teams of police, federal agents, probation officers and prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0129385

Facing 720 identifiable gangs with 39,000 members, the city's plan would target the most dangerous groups, which total at least 800 members. Those gangs are thought to be responsible for a disproportionate amount of mayhem.

The gangs on the list are believed to have committed 6% of the violent crime that occurred in the city last year.

How many local and federal officers will be committed to the anti-gang push remained unclear, however. And given the complexity of what has been a long-standing social problem, some experts questioned whether the plan would be any more effective than past police crackdowns.

Overall, serious crime declined in Los Angeles last year, but violent, gang-related crime increased 14%.

Gang crime was even higher in areas such as South Los Angeles, where it increased 25%, and a section of the north San Fernando Valley where it grew by nearly 160%.

"Street gangs are responsible for the majority of all the murders in Los Angeles and nearly 70% of all the shootings," Villaraigosa said Wednesday at a previously scheduled international summit on gang issues in Universal City. "We must work to address gang violence in a truly comprehensive way."

Although the police had identified certain gangs on occasion, especially when they appeared to be involved in high-profile crimes, the LAPD historically has not called out their names "because of the widely held perception that doing so elevated the criminals' influence and standing in the gang community," the mayor's plan says.

"This new strategy abandons the earlier posture and challenges these menaces by exposing their corrosive behavior to the scrutiny of a more informed and confident community," the plan says.

But Wes McBride, executive director of the California Gang Investigators Assn. and a retired Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy, said he was "not sure" that identifying the gangs was a good idea.

"These guys keep the clippings, and I don't know if you can really say which are the most dangerous gangs on any one day," he said. "It is the kind of advertising you don't need."

McBride said he feared that some gangs would feel slighted if not named and might try to up the ante with more violent crimes.

Najee Ali, a community activist and former gang member, said he also was opposed to any ranking system. "The mayor and chief shouldn't be legitimizing the gangs," he said. "To the gang members it is a badge of honor."

The list of targeted gangs includes the 204th Street gang in Harbor Gateway, which is believed to be responsible for recent racially motivated attacks and will be the subject of a special abatement effort. The list also includes Canoga Park Alabama, whose members' recent violent acts have contributed to gang crime skyrocketing 43% in the San Fernando Valley.

The other gangs on the list include 18th Street Westside in the LAPD's Southeast Division; the Avenues gang in the Northeast Division; the Grape Street Crips in the Southeast Division; Black P-Stones in the Southwest Division; the La Mirada Locos in the Rampart and Northeast divisions; the Mara Salvatrucha in the Rampart, Hollywood and Wilshire divisions; the Rollin' 40s and Rollin' 30s Harlem Crips, both in Southwest, and the Rollin' 60s in the 77th Street Division.

The Mara Salvatrucha gang has up to 50,000 members in six countries, but police will focus on cliques that operate in a few local high-crime neighborhoods.

The LAPD already has shifted 18 additional officers to the 204th Street gang turf and is expected to double that amount soon. Smaller deployments are expected for other gang-infested neighborhoods.

An additional 50 officers will be assigned to a Community Safety Operations Center in the Valley, which will analyze real-time crime data to rapidly and strategically deploy officers, including high-visibility patrols, in crime-ridden regions of the Valley.

The mayor and chief are set to formally unveil their plan at 2:30 p.m. today at the Valley's Mission Community Police Station.

Most of the gangs on the list already have been hit with injunctions that restrict their movements and ability to socialize, and some have been in the crosshairs of local and federal authorities for years.

But Villaraigosa said that the new plan is not as piecemeal as previously, and that the FBI, the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, county probation agents, county and city prosecutors, and the U.S. attorney's office have signed on to step up pressure.

"We, the police, law enforcement, can do a great deal working collectively together, with force magnification, to reduce this problem," said Police Chief William J. Bratton on Wednesday.

But, Villaraigosa added, the gang-suppression plan was only the first step in stabilizing crime-ridden neighborhoods. He said the city would later provide prevention and intervention programs to keep young people out of gangs.

The chief acknowledged that with a police force already stretched thin and expansion occurring slowly, he would have to redeploy existing officers to hot spots in the immediate future.

McBride, the gang expert, cautioned that plans without resources often fall short.

DOJ_NMG_0129386

"Until everyone hires a bunch more cops, you are shoving sand in the wind," he said.

In addition to releasing a list of targeted gangs, the LAPD has submitted the name of a fugitive gang member for placement on the FBI's most wanted list and will submit another name when the first fugitive is captured, officials said.

The submissions will come from the LAPD's own list of its 10 most wanted gang fugitives, which also was released Wednesday. It includes Merced "Shadow" Cambero, from the Avenues gang, and Kody "Monster Cody" DeJohn Scott, from the 8-Trey Gangster Crips.

Also, the plan includes the appointment of an LAPD gang coordinator, creates a South Bureau Criminal Gang Homicide Group, designates additional patrol officers in gang territories to enforce injunctions and warrants, and proposes community symposiums on gang awareness in affected neighborhoods.

Malcolm Klein, a professor emeritus at USC and a gang expert, said the city's gang plan would appear to use a "tip of the iceberg" strategy.

"Targeting hot spots for gangs — that is not much different than the past," Klein said.

He also questioned the methods used to choose which gangs belonged on the worst 11 list.

"The level of violence generated by a gang makes sense to me. But the interracial conflict [at the root of the 204th Street gang murders] is not common, and shooting at police officers also isn't common. The last two are more political than rational."

However, the idea of focusing on the most violent gangs was supported by Alex Alonso, an academic who studies gang territories in Los Angeles and runs the website streetgangs.com.

"What they did under [former Police Chief Daryl F.] Gates didn't work: Suppress everyone. Now they want to be more focused on the most hard-core gang members, that 10% who are really responsible for violence," Alonso said.

Latino Gang Study Finds Few Links To Overseas Groups (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman
The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

A study of Latino gangs in the Washington area and five Central American nations debunks the popular belief that the gangs are engaged in a systematic, organized effort to spread their influence.

Although the gangs have significant membership, the study found that their crimes are largely limited to petty theft and neighborhood extortion rather than some of those traditionally associated with organized crime -- drug trafficking, prostitution, human smuggling and arms sales.

The report, conducted by Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico and the nonprofit advocacy group Washington Office on Latin America, comes as U.S. and Central American authorities are coordinating intelligence in the belief that the gangs have a networked structure.

"Yet this idea that gangs are like an infection spreading from country to country through a process where the leaders send out missionaries to colonize new areas is fundamentally untrue," said Geoff Thale, one of the researchers from the Washington Office on Latin America.

For instance, in interviews with 316 gang members in a major Salvadoran prison conducted as part of the study, although a little more than half said they knew fellow gang members in North America, the vast majority said they had no contact with them, and few had traveled to the United States or Mexico.

Recent testimony in Washington area courtrooms has pointed to occasional cooperation between local gang members and counterparts in other regions. A 19-year-old Hyattsville man pleaded guilty in federal court last week to collecting dues and sending wire transfers to members in Los Angeles as treasurer of a cell of Mara Salvatrucha. And in an earlier trial, a Salvadoran police officer testified that gang leaders in El Salvador instructed Maryland gang members on how their organization should be run.

But Connie McGuire, who conducted the Washington area component of the study, said her interviews with law enforcement, community groups and 15 former gang members found no sign of transnational coordination among gang members.

"We shouldn't pretend that gangs aren't a big, scary problem," Thale said. "But we shouldn't misunderstand what the problem is and misdirect resources for solving it."

Researchers said the current misconceptions may stem from the transnational nature of the gangs' origins. The two most powerful Central American gangs, 18th Street, also know as Eighteen, and Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, emerged in Los Angeles in the 1980s when Salvadoran, Honduran and Guatemalan immigrants fleeing their region's various civil wars joined Chicano gangs or started gangs to protect themselves from African American gangs in the same neighborhoods.

After the wars ended in the mid-1990s, many gang members chose to return or were deported to their home countries, where they fueled the rise of sister gangs modeled after the Los Angeles groups that now have 30,000 to 60,000 members, according to Central American government and FBI estimates.

Then, as those members began migrating back to the United States, MS-13 and Eighteen were in turn exported to new regions of the United States -- including the Washington area, where a law enforcement task force estimates there are now at least 3,600 Latino gang members.

MS-13, in particular, has garnered headlines in the Washington area for dozens of killings and attacks in recent years, including the gang rape of two teenage girls in Prince George's County in 2003 and the shooting by an MS-13 member of an 18-year-old member of a rival Latino gang in Arlington last spring.

But McGuire concluded that Central American gangs are a relatively minor problem in the D.C. area compared with other threats. The principal danger they pose is to people living in the particular communities where gang members live and "especially . . . the youth themselves who get drawn into the gang life."

By contrast, gang violence is a major political issue in El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras, where violent shootouts between rival gangs have driven up national homicide rates, and extortion is common in many urban neighborhoods.

A 'Surge' On Gangs Alone Won't Help (LAT)

By Constance L. Rice, Constance L. Rice Is A Civil Rights Attorney In Los Angeles.

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

Violence-plagued neighborhoods need real reform, not just more cops walking the streets.

CHERYL GREEN died Dec. 15 because she was black in the wrong gang-dominated neighborhood. Like innocent Latino children who are terrorized by black gangs in Watts, the 14-year-old was allegedly gunned down by members of the Latino 204th Street gang because she rode her scooter too close to the no-blacks Mason-Dixon line that gang members had drawn in her Harbor Gateway neighborhood.

L.A. politicians and law enforcement leaders have reacted forcefully to her death. Amid enough satellite dishes to remind one LAPD officer of the O.J. Simpson trial, officials at a January news conference declared war on 204th Street.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa proclaimed that no one should fear losing his or her life for being the wrong color. He vowed to put the gang out of business. Police Chief William Bratton, Sheriff Lee Baca and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III announced weapons of mass crackdown: combined LAPD-Sheriff's Department patrols; cooperation with neighboring Torrance police; targeting of the gang's guns and drugs by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; dragnet operations; electronic surveillance; observation posts; intelligence sharing; early-release exclusions and a "most-wanted list" of the 10 worst gangs.

DOJ_NMG_0129388

The U.S. attorney brandished stepped-up use of federal hate crime laws, death penalty enhancements, civil rights laws and RICO prosecutions. The city attorney added the use of "stay-away orders," which ban gangs from the neighborhood, on top of existing injunctions that forbid gang members from congregating.

Two days after this display, 204th Street shot another innocent black resident waiting in his car for his daughters.

"We've done this before," the LAPD officer at the news conference recalled. He was referring to a similar crackdown on the 204th Street gang in 1997, when members killed another African American youth. Then, as now, politicians threatened zero-tolerance, the LAPD increased patrols and arrested everyone in the gang they could. Officers galvanized the community against the gang. Politicians held community planning meetings. "And then, the focus shifted," the officer said, "we went back to normal deployment levels, and while we probably abated it for a while, new gang members refilled the ranks. Nothing on the ground changed. All of the conditions in that neighborhood continued."

Bingo. The "surge" in 1997 was temporary and, more important, the city never reversed the neighborhood conditions that fuel 204th Street. For the last nine years, the gang has continued its ethnic terrorism, with the murder of Cheryl Green as one of its latest acts of violence.

Let's be clear here: Strategic suppression is essential, a strong response to violent gangs such as 204th Street is necessary, and the effort will need more resources. But it is unclear whether the city has learned that suppression must be coordinated with comprehensive prevention and intervention strategies. And, right now, the prevention and intervention side of the equation is mostly missing. Law enforcement is doing its part; it's the rest of us who are AWOL.

What needs to happen in Harbor Gateway? Concerned politicians must connect with the right experts, who can diagnose the unique neighborhood factors that fuel the gang's dominance. They must authorize county, state and school district staff to jointly close the entrance ramps into the gang and open the exit ramps out of it. Effective violence reduction requires a sustained community organization that forms a 24/7 shield against gang violence.

In Harbor Gateway, that planning has to begin with the area's isolated, "Galapagos Island" configuration, the diaspora of gang members who return on weekends to enforce 204th Street's sovereignty, and Harbor Gateway's unconnected and intimidated residents.

In addition to tough-on-crime tactics, the region's leaders will have to use political capital to reset priorities and redeploy the millions in tax dollars spent every year on anti-gang programs but with no sustained violence reduction to show for it.

And after determining that gangs do not get to take our children, Angelenos must launch a "cultures and values" campaign to end the violence and killing of la vida loca.

Without the political will to change business as usual, politicians will be back again before the cameras, declaring yet another suppression surge with no long-term effect. In the meantime, Cheryl Green's mother, Charlene Lovett, and her black neighbors say they have been told by police that the only way to be safe is to stay inside their homes — or move.

Newark: Man Sentenced For Drug Dealing (NYT)

By John Holl

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

A man who prosecutors said controlled much of the city's heroin trade for years was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to life in prison without parole, prosecutors said. The man, Hakeem Curry, 31, of Newark, was convicted of drug charges and money laundering in July, said Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey. Mr. Curry's organization is believed to have supplied nearly 85 percent of the heroin dealt on the streets of Newark and roughly 50 kilograms of cocaine a week for the last several years, Mr. Christie said.

Newark Drug Lord Gets Life, $8M Fine (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, February 8, 2007

Federal sentence means no parole for kingpin who ruled by violence

Hakeem Curry, the notorious kingpin who ran an unparalleled drug empire in Newark for years and kept out of jail by marking those who threatened it with death, was sentenced to life in prison and fined $8 million by a federal judge yesterday.

U.S. District Judge Faith Hochberg said she'd never seen a drug organization "even remotely comparable" to the one Curry ran with "incredible skill, acumen and intelligence," but also "extreme violence."

She marveled at the longevity of the Curry organization, which prosecutors said had flooded northern New Jersey with tons of cocaine and heroin over more than a decade to earn millions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0129389

"Mr. Curry is smart, goal-directed and ruthlessly ambitious," Hochberg told a Newark courtroom filled with Curry's family and friends and federal agents. "He knew exactly how to manage his drug conspiracy so it would last ... by letting all those beneath him do the dirty work."

Curry, 31, will never be free again because there is no parole in the federal system.

According to testimony, Curry tried to hire a hitman to kill the prosecution's star witness against him. He also ordered the murder of a rival and the execution of another government witness who was supposed to testify in a case against an ally, the testimony showed.

U.S. marshals were in full force at the sentencing, and spectators were required to walk through a metal detector immediately outside the courtroom.

As Hochberg was in the middle of announcing the punishment, the defendant stood silently in his green prison jumpsuit and shackles, but some of his supporters gasped. Curry's father jumped up from the back row.

"People kill people at Seton Hall College and you don't give them life," he shouted. "Ya'll gonna put my son away for life? ... Goddamn!"

Marshals ushered the defendant from the courtroom through a back door. Hochberg banged her gavel and called for order, but Curry's other supporters stood up to watch the commotion.

Marshals tried to calm Curry's father, but he continued to shout and got into a scuffle with them as they escorted him out. Marshals signaled to the judge to leave for her own safety and she quickly exited into her chambers.

Officials cleared the courtroom, asking the family members and the more than a dozen Drug Enforcement Administration agents who had worked the case to leave.

However, after a long break, Hochberg consulted with defense attorney James Plaisted and assistant U.S. attorneys John Gay and Robert Frazer and resumed the hearing. Curry's father was not allowed back in.

Curry, convicted of conspiracy, money laundering and drug trafficking by a jury last year, faced a mandatory minimum prison term of 20 years. Federal sentencing guidelines had recommended at least 30 years.

After the hearing, U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie called Curry "among the most brutal, dangerous criminals we've ever prosecuted."

"If anyone ever has earned a life term in federal prison, it's Hakeem Curry," Christie said.

Rakim Baskerville, Curry's co-defendant and cousin, was convicted of conspiracy. Hochberg sentenced him to life in prison last week. The judge also has accepted a dozen guilty pleas from other related defendants.

During the hearing, Plaisted, the defense attorney, argued for leniency, saying Curry had tried to go straight in recent years by moving to the suburbs and opening a clothing store. Curry had been living in Pine Brook in Morris County with his wife and son.

"There is no question that Mr. Curry did go through a change at a certain point and was evolving as a person," Plaisted said.

When given the opportunity to address the court, Curry turned toward his family before glancing down at a yellow scrap of paper.

"I'm very sorry that all y'all have been put through all of this," he said. "I want all y'all to know there were a lot of things said in this courtroom that were not true."

Gay, the prosecutor, said Curry's store was only a front to launder money for his drug organization, which kept him in high style by financing luxury cars, diamond-studded jewelry and a junket to an NBA all-star game.

Hochberg said violence coupled with Curry's use of an attorney to represent and arrange for bail for defendants when they were arrested helped ruthlessly enforce a "code of silence" for years.

"Nobody ratted on Mr. Curry because they knew the rules," Hochberg said. She said a term of life in prison was "vital" to deter others from trying to replicate Curry's business model.

As Curry was led away, he waved and smiled to his family. His attorneys promised an appeal.

Heroin, Cocaine Trafficker Gets Life In Prison (WNBC)

WNBC-TV,, February 8, 2007

A federal judge has sentenced a heroin and cocaine trafficker to life in prison without parole following his conviction last July on drug conspiracy and money laundering charges, federal prosecutors said.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said that Hakeem Curry, 31, led the Curry Organization, which sold thousands of pounds of drugs in Essex and Union Counties.

DOJ_NMG_0129390

Curry and co-defendant Rakim Baskerville -- identified by prosecutors as a street level manager for the Curry Organization -- were both found guilty of drug trafficking conspiracy.

Curry was also convicted of money laundering and other crimes.

According to prosecutors, the Curry Organization was estimated to supply approximately 85 percent of the heroin in Newark while also supplying 30 to 50 kilograms of cocaine a week through its network of street level distributors.

Cooperating witnesses testified that millions of dollars in drug profits were generated by the criminal organization.

Testimony at trial also revealed Curry drove a $120,000 Mercedes Benz and an $80,000 Land Rover, lived in a luxury apartment, took lavish trips and bought custom-made jewelry.

Curry had faced a minimum sentence of 20 years in prison but the judge took into consideration evidence that Curry and Baskerville tried to hire a hit man to murder a government witness.

Baskerville was sentenced to life in prison last week.

Christie said, "Curry is among the most brutal, dangerous criminals we've prosecuted. If anyone ever has earned a life term in federal prison, it's Hakeem Curry."

Prosecutor Details Killings In Case Against Alleged 'M Street Crew' Enforcer (WP)

By Paul Duggan, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Prosecutors say murder was Larry Gooch's job. As an enforcer for a violent drug-dealing crew in Northeast Washington, authorities allege, he pulled the trigger in four slayings and aided in a fifth. He sold crack, PCP and ecstasy, according to an indictment, and tried to shoot a D.C. police officer to prevent a fellow gang member's arrest.

From the late 1990s until he was locked up in 2003, Gooch, now 27, was one of about two dozen young men in the heavily armed "M Street crew," which controlled the drug trade along 18th and M streets in the Kingman Park neighborhood, prosecutor Darlene Soltys said yesterday in her opening statement to a U.S. District Court jury.

As she spoke, describing the piles of cash that the gang allegedly raked in, Gooch sat a few feet away, expressionless, dressed in a preppy V-neck sweater and dark paisley necktie, his hair trimmed, his hands folded, his life in the balance.

In a city where public sentiment runs against capital punishment -- where voters rejected executions in a nonbinding 1992 referendum -- the U.S. attorney's office is trying for the third time in recent years to obtain a death sentence in the District under federal law. The move has angered some, including D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D).

"I have no quarrel with your vigorous prosecution of these cases," Norton told Interim U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor in a letter Jan. 8, the day jury selection began for Gooch's trial. But in "this strongly anti-death penalty jurisdiction," she said, "there are a number of reasons to question the stepped-up death penalty prosecutions."

The U.S. attorney's office, barred from commenting on the Gooch case by a court-imposed gag order, sought the death penalty for convicted drug-gang killer Tommy Edelin in 2001. After jurors said no, Edelin got life in prison.

Two years later, when prosecutors sought capital punishment for Kevin Gray, convicted of 19 drug-related murders, and co-defendant Rodney Moore, found guilty of 10 killings, the jury deadlocked in the penalty phase, and the men got life prison terms.

"I believe that your office will continue to find it exceedingly difficult to get a jury of District residents to order the death penalty here," Norton wrote, saying "repeated prosecutions show neither a wise use of scarce resources nor a sensitivity to the needs of the communities of victims."

Selecting a "death qualified" jury -- 12 D.C. residents willing to vote for execution if the prosecution's evidence warrants it -- took a month in Gooch's case. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer has set aside 14 weeks on her calendar for the trial.

Many of the two dozen or so defendants indicted in the case have been convicted or have pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in exchange for reduced prison terms. The charges followed an 18-month investigation by D.C. police and the FBI involving undercover drug buys, wiretaps and hidden surveillance cameras in the neighborhood.

Gooch, on trial alone, is the only defendant facing a possible death sentence.

"Larry Gooch did not shoot anybody," defense attorney Thomas Heslep said yesterday in his opening statement. "He did not shoot at anybody. He was not a member of a drug conspiracy. . . . I'm not going to tell you he was an angel all of his life. . . . But he is factually innocent of this violence."

Soltys told a different story.

In the early hours of Aug. 1, 2000, the prosecutor said, Gooch and three other gang members visited the home of William Cunningham, a drug dealer with a stash of cocaine and cash in his apartment. They planned to rob him, Soltys said.

DOJ_NMG_0129391

"When Larry Gooch saw Will Cunningham as he opened the door, Larry Gooch shot and killed Will Cunningham with a single gunshot to the head," she said. Christopher Lane, a friend of Cunningham's, was staying in the apartment. One of Gooch's cohorts chased Lane into the kitchen and shot him in the head, Soltys said.

On a September night two years later, when Miguel Miles, stoned on PCP, showed up on the gang's turf to buy drugs, he got out of a sport-utility vehicle and began behaving irrationally, flailing his arms and shouting. Soltys said Gooch ordered Miles to get back in the SUV, and Miles complied. When he got out of the vehicle again, still acting crazy, "Larry Gooch stepped off the curb and opened fire and shot Miles six times," Soltys said.

When a gang member was being arrested in a carryout restaurant in November 2002, she said, Gooch tried to distract police and help his friend escape by creating a disturbance outside. She said he fired a shot into a patrol car parked in front of the carryout, narrowly missing an officer.

Three months later, suspecting that Calvin Cooper and his girlfriend, Yolanda Miller, had been stealing drugs from the crew and cooperating with police, Gooch approached them on the street one night, Soltys said. She said he shot Miller six times, leaving her dead in a snowbank, then chased Cooper into an alley and shot him three times in the back.

"It was like a McDonald's drive-through," Soltys said of the street-corner drug trade controlled by the gang. "There was traffic all the time. . . . There were all these shootings, all this gunfire, people arrested with weapons.

"And there were murders."

Cuba Deports Top Colombian Drug Suspect (AP)

AP, February 8, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Cuba will deport reputed drug kingpin Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante to Colombia, which plans to extradite him to the United States, a government official told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

The Colombian official said Gomez was expected to arrive in Bogota on Thursday and would be held at its heavily fortified chief prosecutor's office compound before being extradited to the United States.

An extradition order has been signed, the official said. He spoke on condition he not be further identified because he was not authorized to divulge the information.

Gomez, an alleged top boss of Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel known by his alias "Rasguno," is wanted on a U.S. indictment in New York on drug trafficking, racketeering and money-laundering charges.

He has been held in Cuba since his 2004 arrest at a Havana airport on charges of carrying a false passport. He had fled Colombia after Washington offered rewards of $5 million each for the South American country's top drug traffickers.

Gomez would be the most senior reputed drug boss extradited to the United States since Cali cartel chief Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in March 2005.

Gomez's Miami-based attorney, Oscar Rodriguez, told the AP he had no information on the deportation and would not answer questions until he has had a chance to speak with his client.

The U.S. Embassy in Bogota had no immediate comment on the case. Cuban press officials and officials at the Colombian Embassy in Havana also did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

Cuba does not have diplomatic relations of any kind, including an extradition treaty, with the United States.

Shortly after Gomez's arrest, Cuban officials said he had been "in transit" and didn't intend to develop a local drug market in Cuba.

The Norte del Valle cartel, the most powerful traditional drug organization in Colombia, is believed to account for as much as 60 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. However, many of its top bosses have been captured in recent years and a campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department has frozen many of their assets, including front companies.

In 2004, Colombian authorities seized $100 million worth of Gomez's assets including 68 farms, 24 offices and 17 parking lots. According to prosecutors, he went from pumping gas in 1991 to declaring property worth more than $500,000 a year later.

House Republicans Urge Change In Afghan Counternarcotics Policy (AP)

AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP)— Four House Republicans on Wednesday urged the Bush administration to rethink its policy on opium production in Afghanistan, saying more needs to be done to counter the growing threat of narco-terrorism.

The lawmakers, in a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates, said the U.S. must end its dispute with Britain over opium eradication and design a uniform counternarcotics policy with the British and NATO.

DOJ_NMG_0129392

They also suggested a "ride-along policy" where Drug Enforcement Administration agents could join U.S. and international military forces in unsecured areas where the DEA is targeting illicit drugs and drug kingpins.

"It is time for some new thinking to ensure that Afghanistan does not fall into a failed narco-state status and become, once again, a safe haven for al-Qaida," wrote Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the top Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and Reps. Mike Pence of Indiana and Elton Gallegly and Dana Rohrabacher, both from California.

Their proposal included:

Appointing a high-level coordinator of overall Afghan narco-terrorism policy.

Doing more to extradite to the U.S. major drug kingpins and drug warlords.

Giving Colombia's National Police anti-narcotic unit a greater role in training their Afghan counterparts.

Promoting Afghan trade to provide alternatives to poppy farming.

Testing the use of herbicides that do not harm the environment or humans.

White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said he had not seen the letter. But he said the administration has undertaken a review of policy in Afghanistan "given the changed circumstances after five years of American assistance" and that President Bush has committed additional resources and personnel to the effort to establish a stable democracy there.

Ros-Lehtinen welcomed the administration's recently announced request for $10.6 billion over the next two years to improve Afghanistan's infrastructure, economy and security. But she said the threat from illicit drugs "will not be alleviated solely by investing more resources." The British, who are leading counternarcotic efforts in Afghanistan, have objected to U.S. eradication policy. They say it fuels the insurgency in a country where anywhere from 30 percent to 60 percent of gross domestic product comes from opium production.

An estimated 93 percent of the world's opium comes from Afghanistan. Trade in opium and heroin, much of it headed for Europe and Asia, brings in as much as $2 billion a year.

Proceeds from drug sales have allowed the Taliban and anti-U.S. forces to buy sophisticated weapons including night vision goggles and more deadly land mines.

The chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said in a statement that the U.S. and it allies should spend more to train police in Afghanistan and help authorities destroy drug labs and warehouses.

He suggested the possible use of U.S. military force "when necessary" against traffickers and kingpins.

Another Charge Against Gun Dealer (SEATT)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

Seattle Times, February 8, 2007

A federal grand jury has added another firearms-related felony charge against a Bellevue gun dealer once arrested as a material witness in the 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales.

Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan was charged Wednesday with unlawful possession of a short-barreled rifle, which carries a potential prison term of up to 10 years. Kwan earlier had been charged with possession of a machine gun.

Kwan has been scrutinized by the FBI and federal prosecutors because of evidence that he purchased two replacement gun barrels for a handgun like the one that was used to kill Wales. Kwan claims he recalls buying only one barrel, which he turned over to the federal agents. However, his attorney and court documents say he failed a FBI polygraph about the second barrel.

Agents with a task force investigating Wales' slaying say they do not think Kwan killed Wales. They are trying to determine whether he gave the second gun barrel to the person who did.

Wales was shot to death in the basement of his Queen Anne home Oct. 11, 2001. Bullets and shell casings recovered from the crime scene indicate the weapon was an Eastern European Makarov fitted with a replacement barrel. Only about 3,500 of the barrels were sold in the United States, and the FBI has been trying to find and test them all.

The task force has investigated hundreds of leads but has focused on a Bellevue airline pilot who Wales had prosecuted for fraud in the late 1990s. Those charges eventually were dropped and he was bitter over the ordeal, according to court documents.

In January 2005, Kwan was jailed for 23 days as a material witness in the case. An avid gun collector, agents searched his home and found more than 100 weapons, including an allegedly unregistered M-14 machine gun. Kwan is free but must wear an electronic monitoring bracelet.

Attempts to contact his Washington, D.C., attorney, Joseph Conte, were unsuccessful Wednesday. Conte has accused the government of trying to pressure Kwan to remember what he did with the second barrel.

DOJ_NMG_0129393

The new charge alleges he owned a Heckler & Koch VP70Z firearm fitted with a shoulder stock. Prosecutors allege the weapon is a short-barreled rifle and must be registered. Kwan's weapon was not registered, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Redkey said.

IMMIGRATION:

Panel: Few Changes In Asylum Procedures (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa

The AP, February 7, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A bipartisan commission says the agency in charge of securing U.S. borders is failing to protect asylum seekers from being wrongly deported or treated like criminals.

The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom said in a report released Thursday that the Homeland Security Department expanded expedited removal of immigrants _ against its recommendation _ and continues to jail asylum seekers with criminals.

The commission said few of the changes it had recommended to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have been made.

"Despite the passage of two years and a personal meeting with Secretary Chertoff and our expectation he would establish a system that both protects our borders and asylum, we are disappointed and dismayed," said Felice Gaer, the commission's chairwoman.

Stewart Baker, assistant secretary for policy at DHS, said several of the recommendations have been carried out but many "were not entirely realistic and very difficult to implement."

Asylum seekers are often detained while officials determine if their claim of persecution is credible. The commission found two years ago that some were shackled, kept in solitary confinement or strip searched.

Baker said building separate facilities only for asylum seekers and flying them to a better facility would be expensive and might serve as incentive for people to claim asylum.

The commission was required by Congress to study DHS and Justice Department asylum procedures. The 2005 study was significant because commission members were allowed to observe parts of the asylum screening process.

Mark Hetfield, director of the original study, said the commission found two years ago that DHS was not following special procedures Congress put in place to ensure legitimate asylum seekers weren't turned away as the country tightened immigration laws. Little has changed, he said.

"There's no mechanism to be sure DHS is following its own rules when it comes to asylum seekers. How do we know it's following its own rules when it comes to security?" said Hetfield, senior vice president of policy and programs at Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society.

The commission had recommended that DHS fix problems in the expedited removal process before expanding it. But DHS expanded the accelerated deportations amid growing calls for crackdowns on illegal immigration.

Under expedited removal, screeners at airports and other ports of entry can immediately send foreigners back to their country of origin if they decide the person does not have a credible fear of persecution.

"Expedited removal is probably one of the most important tools for controlling immigration that we have in our arsenal," Baker said. "It is something that has allowed us to get on top of or ahead of illegal immigration in the last two years."

DHS did create a senior adviser on refugee and asylum policy as recommended by the commission. But commission members said he hasn't been given enough authority or resources to carry out what they recommended. Igor Timofeyev, an attorney, was named to the position.

The commission praised some of the efforts by the Justice Department to carry out its recommendations, particularly efforts to provide money to train immigration judges.

The commission said it had trouble assessing some aspects of the asylum process because DHS would not provide it with requested information.

U.S. May Be Mishandling Asylum Seekers, Panel Says (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129394

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — A bipartisan federal commission warned on Wednesday that the Bush administration, in its zeal to secure the nation's borders and stem the tide of illegal immigrants, may be leaving asylum seekers vulnerable to deportation and harsh treatment.

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, which Congress asked to assess asylum regulations, found two years ago that some immigration officials were improperly processing asylum seekers for deportation. The commission, which also found that asylum seekers were often strip-searched, shackled and held in jails, called for safeguards in the system of speedy deportations known as expedited removal, to protect those fleeing persecution.

But the commission, which will issue its new findings on Thursday, says officials have failed to put into effect most of its 2005 recommendations. It says the failures come even as the Bush administration has significantly expanded efforts to detain and swiftly deport illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico without letting them make their case before an immigration judge.

"We are clearly concerned as to whether, in addition to prioritizing secure borders, the government is ensuring fair and humane treatment of legitimate asylum seekers," said Felice D. Gaer, who is head of the commission, which was created by Congress in 1998. "We are really quite disappointed and dismayed by the lack of a response."

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, the Connecticut independent who is chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, also expressed concern about the slow pace of change. Mr. Lieberman said he planned to introduce legislation by March to require the Department of Homeland Security to adopt several of the commission's main recommendations.

Officials from the Homeland Security Department emphasized that they had put into effect some recommendations, including naming the first senior adviser for refugee and asylum policy and updating training for immigration officers, detention workers and other personnel.

But they said many other recommendations were impractical given the challenges in trying to stop illegal immigrants from pouring into the country.

"We have taken their report seriously," said Stewart A. Baker, an assistant secretary of homeland security. "But some of their recommendations just weren't practical given the enormous flood of illegal immigrants that we deal with every day."

Mr. Baker said the department looked forward to working with Mr. Lieberman and would review his measure after it had been introduced.

In its report, the commission praised the Justice Department, which oversees immigration courts, for training immigration judges on asylum law, expanding the number of legal orientation programs for detained immigrants and trying to improve immigration court decisions.

But the commission was sharply critical of the Department of Homeland Security, whose border agents and immigration officers interview asylum seekers at airports or land crossings.

Domestic security regulations require that immigration officials refer an illegal immigrant for what is known as a credible-fear interview if the immigrant indicates "an intention to apply for asylum, a fear of torture or a fear of return to his or her country." The asylum seeker is then removed from the expedited removal process so an immigration judge can review the claim.

But the commission found no evidence that domestic security officials had taken steps to ensure that agents advised immigrants to ask for such protection or to ensure that agents did not deport immigrants who express fear of deportation.

The commission also found no indication that the Department of Homeland Security had taken steps to ensure that asylum seekers were not treated like criminals while their claims were being evaluated. Mr. Stewart said that it would be too burdensome to create a separate detention program for asylum seekers and that such a system might create incentives for people to claim that they were fleeing persecution.

Eleanor Acer of Human Rights First said the failure to address such problems promptly had "real human consequences."

"Asylum seekers continue to be jailed in these prisonlike facilities for months and, in some cases, for years," Ms. Acer said.

The commission also expressed concern that officials chose to expand the expedited removal process before addressing the problems in the handling of asylum seekers.

Nazi Hunters Pick Up The Trail Online (USAT)

By Oren Dorell, Usa Today

USA Today, February 8, 2007

Bill Gray was working as a student intern at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem when he decided to use the Internet to find fugitive Nazis.

Within a few hours he found five, all living in the USA.

"To think of the horrible crimes that these people committed," said Gray, 24, a Harvard student from Munster, Ind. "And to think that they were living in the United States for so long, so happily."

The Nazis whom Gray found were already known to the Justice Department. Some had been deemed too ill to prosecute, and Justice is taking a second look at the others, the center said.

Gray's use of Internet-based search engines and databases such as voting records comes at an important time. The Wiesenthal Center is making an intense push, known as "Operation: Last Chance," to find fugitives of the Holocaust and bring them to justice before they die. The center, renowned for finding scores of ex-Nazis, is also seeking collaborators, camp guards and leaders of paramilitary groups who helped round up and kill Jews and others during the Holocaust.

The effort has rolled across Europe and collected hundreds of allegations and names from Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Romania, Austria, Hungary and Germany. This year the program will expand to Argentina, Brazil and Chile.

The suspects are all older than 80, so any time saved by using the Internet is critical.

"It helps make my job easier," says the world's chief Nazi hunter, Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Center's Jerusalem office. "It helps me get up-to-date whereabouts on the current suspects."

That's what happened when Zuroff gave Gray, then a new volunteer, a list of people he had been searching for. Zuroff had compiled the list by cross-checking World War II-era U.S. refugee records with names of suspected war criminals. But Zuroff could find nothing on what happened to the people.

Gray had become familiar with search tools such as LexisNexis, Westlaw and Net Detective as a research assistant for Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz and as an intern for the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago. He thought: Why not try using them for this?

Gray took the names and birthdates and went to work. In his quest for a Lithuanian Nazi, he first searched death records. Nothing. He looked in property records and professional licensing data. Still nothing.

Within an hour, however, he found the woman's name in U.S. voting records. Those records included a list of addresses.

Gray got a "pretty decent picture" of what the suspected Nazi did during her time in the United States, which began in the 1940s.

"Her husband had a good job. They appeared to live a very comfortable lifestyle," he said.

The woman's name was not released because she is only a suspect. She has been reported to the Justice Department and may face charges on allegations by the center that she was involved in the extermination of Jews, the center said.

Of the other suspects, Gray found that some had died, one was missing, and four were in the USA.

Dershowitz says the Internet may revolutionize the search for perpetrators of the Holocaust.

"The days of hiding are basically over," he says.

Finding ex-Nazis is just the start, however. Zuroff says what happens with the evidence and documentation they collect depends on what country receives it.

"If it's in America, we know it's in good hands," he says.

The questions that surround people identified as suspects are seen in the case of Sandor Kepiro, an officer in a Hungarian police unit that rounded up and machine-gunned more than 1,000 Jews, Serbs and Gypsies in Novi Sad, a Yugoslav area occupied by Hungary in 1942. Kepiro was convicted in the massacre but freed by Hungary's fascist regime shortly after his trial in 1944. He fled to Argentina. In 1946, the communist government of Hungary tried him again in absentia and sentenced him to 14 years. He returned to Budapest in 1996 and has denied taking an active part in the executions.

Due to Operation: Last Chance, authorities are now deciding whether he should be re-arrested.

Zuroff says that over the years he has tracked down more than 2,000 people suspected of Holocaust crimes. He hopes that the new methods will help locate a notorious fugitive: Aribert Heim.

Heim was a doctor at the Mauthausen and Buchenwald concentration camps who was suspected of killing hundreds of inmates. He slipped from U.S. detention and was practicing gynecology in Germany until 1962 when state prosecutors issued a warrant for his arrest and he disappeared. A reward of more than $250,000 has been offered for Heim, who Zuroff believes is hiding in South America.

Gray says it should not matter that the suspects are old. Gray had two Jewish great-grandfathers who each lost siblings in the Holocaust.

"If they're healthy, I think that these bastards have to pay for what they've done," he says.

2-Party Talks On Budget Fall Apart Amid Friction (NYT)

By STEVEN R. WEISMAN

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — A leading Democratic senator said Wednesday that previously undisclosed behind-the-scenes bipartisan budget talks with the administration had collapsed because of comments by Vice President Dick Cheney and others in the administration.

The senator, Kent Conrad of North Dakota, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, also accused the administration of undercutting the possibility of talks by refusing to signal a willingness to compromise on taxes to save Social Security and Medicare or to balance the budget in the years ahead.

Mr. Conrad made his comments at a hearing with Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, who defended the $2.9 trillion plan that the Bush administration submitted on Monday. The proposal has deep spending and benefits cuts, increased military spending and a call for continued tax cuts.

The skirmishing between Mr. Conrad and Mr. Portman reflected the extreme sensitivity of a budget two years before a presidential election.

At its root is a Democratic strategy of saying tax increases, or rescinding tax cuts, are essential to solving many fiscal problems, but demonstrating reluctance to be first to offer a specific proposal.

More specifically, Democrats fear that if they propose, and pass, tax increases, they will be vetoed and Republicans will club them over taxes for the next two years.

Democrats say tax increases might come out of bipartisan talks like those under Presidents Bill Clinton and the first George Bush.

Republicans say Mr. Bush has taken hard criticism from the conservative wing of his party for even saying he would talk with the Democrats about the budget without preconditions like ruling out tax increases.

"The question I keep putting to you is, 'Is your side prepared to really compromise?' " Mr. Conrad asked Mr. Portman.

He said that Democrats had agreed to cut spending in popular retirement programs but that they needed Republicans to agree to tax increases to make possible a deal on saving them. Mr. Conrad said Mr. Portman was "divorced from reality" by not being willing to accept responsibility for tax increases.

Mr. Portman and other administration officials said afterward that there had been preliminary talks with Mr. Conrad and Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the ranking Republican on the budget panel, but that the talks had not gone far.

In a phone interview, Mr. Portman said Wednesday that President Bush had sought to help the atmosphere by rejecting "preconditions" for the talks. Mr. Portman said the demand for a signal of willingness to accept tax increases was such a condition.

"The president supports the idea of a bipartisan process to address the longer-term budget problems, including entitlements," Mr. Portman said. "I also commend Chairman Conrad and Senator Gregg for their interest, because when you start a process like that, it entails risks."

Mr. Conrad, also in a telephone interview, said that "back-channel communications" with Mr. Portman and Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. had made headway but that Mr. Cheney undercut progress by saying last month that the administration still opposed tax increases.

"We were very close to getting ready, at least on the Senate side, to be able to go forward," Mr. Conrad said. "Now what's happened, behind the scenes, is that the talks have collapsed." Administration officials said Mr. Cheney had meant only to say the administration had its own ideas, including preserving tax cuts and setting up individual investment accounts to replace Social Security for some future retirees.

Spratt Rallies His Team On Budget (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 8, 2007

House Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) is quietly and methodically laying the groundwork to build support across the Democratic Caucus for a 2008 budget resolution that he hasn't even written yet.

Given the difficulties both parties have faced in recent years getting their Members to support a single, expansive blueprint that provides plenty of room for disagreement, Spratt said he already has engaged Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) in his plan to convince the diverse Caucus to help him pass a five-year balanced budget plan this spring.

DOJ_NMG_0129397

"We've already started working the Caucus for support of a budget resolution, the concept of a budget resolution," Spratt said in an interview Tuesday. "As I tell my Democratic colleagues, 'If you can't budget, you can't govern.'"

Hoyer plans to sit in on meetings between Spratt and Democratic committee chairmen, which Spratt said would be his first priority. Spratt said he would be asking committee chairmen what they would like a budget resolution to facilitate as well as what kinds of revenue raisers — including possible tax increases — they might be able to draw up as part of a potential budget reconciliation package.

Meanwhile, Spratt will be meeting, as he usually does, with different Democratic Party factions such as the moderate-to-conservative Blue Dogs, the New Democrats and the Progressive Caucus to press them to support a budget resolution.

Those meetings will be key, he said, because he does not want to run his budget "up the flag pole" to see if it flies. "We'll do a lot of flag drills before we bring it to the floor," he said.

Spratt said his job is much harder this year because previous Democratic budgets primarily were used as documents to register the party's opposition to the former Republican majority's budget priorities and often they didn't even get the votes of all Democrats — a situation Spratt said he is determined to avoid this year.

"We're putting together a budget that's got to work," Spratt said. "This is not a statement or a symbol."

He said Democratic leaders would be key to passing any budget this year — a fact that has not been lost on Pelosi or Hoyer.

"Certainly, there's a realization that this budget is very different from budgets we put together in the past," said one House Democratic leadership aide. "There's a higher bar to reach. It's going to become law."

That's why Spratt said he's putting such a premium on his meetings with Democratic committee chairmen.

Tops on his list will be meeting with House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (N.Y.), considering Rangel likely will be charged with finding ways to save money under Medicare and Medicaid, as well as possibly drafting targeted tax increases.

Spratt said he would "like to do it without raising taxes," but acknowledged that may be hard to do. Still, he noted, "Nobody in the Democratic Party is pushing me to come up with new taxes to pay for a balanced budget."

He said he instead would be looking to reduce some Medicare payments to managed care providers as well as enacting some of the user fees proposed in the president's recently released 2008 budget.

Spratt said attempts by the White House and Republicans in Congress to frame the budget debate as one that challenges Democrats to balance the budget in five years without raising taxes — as the president's budget claims to do — is a red herring.

"It's not a real challenge," he said. "They haven't done what they're calling on others to do."

Spratt said the White House's refusal to include a permanent solution for the alternative minimum tax, which is increasingly ensnaring middle-income taxpayers rather than the wealthy ones it was designed to target, is just one example of how the president's budget does not live up to its hype. If a permanent fix for the AMT had been included, the president could not have counted as revenues the money those middle-income taxpayers will owe.

"They're booking those revenues and not acknowledging that it's a tax increase on middle-class" taxpayers, said Spratt.

Still, Spratt acknowledged that Democrats, and himself in particular, are going to have a tough time balancing the budget with relatively limited funds.

Spratt said the first problem for him is that he will not be following the president's budget, which assumes that revenues coming into the government will be higher than those projected by the Congressional Budget Office. He'll be using the lower CBO estimates, instead.

"Anyone who uses the CBO baseline is going to be at a disadvantage from the start," he said. In just the past year of the president's five-year budget, the difference between the White House's projected revenues and CBO's is a whopping $155 billion.

But he said that no matter the challenges to drafting a balanced five-year budget, he wants to do what Republicans were unable to do last year — get an actual budget passed through both chambers.

"We want to draw a distinction between us and them," he said.

Democrats Likely To Take Cue From Bush On Budget (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, February 8, 2007

Democrats were scathing this week as they grilled senior administration officials over President George W. Bush's proposal to balance the budget four years after he leaves office.

DOJ_NMG_0129398

Party leaders said the president's budget was filled with "debt and deception" and "disconnected from reality". But Democrats will almost undoubtedly mimic these alleged sleights of hand to conceal cracks in the US fiscal outlook when they present their own budget proposals next month.

Party strategists said their proposals were still taking shape and would not be agreed until key committee chairmen met to work out the details by March 15. The plans would again be overhauled after that to produce a budget for next year in time for the real work of appropriating spending that gets under way in June.

But the budget priorities emerging at this early stage in the process suggest the party will postpone tackling many of the most divisive fiscal dilemmas facing policymakers – including changes to costly entitlement programmes and the president's $1,700bn (£867bn) tax cuts.

Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, acknowledged on Wednesday that neither party appeared ready to discuss big tax reform. "In terms of fundamental tax reform, maybe we will get to do that in the next two years," he told a congressional budget committee.

But the Democrats are likely to quickly throw off many of Mr Bush's proposed spending cuts, including a below-inflation cap on discretionary spending increases of 1 per cent.

Steny Hoyer, majority leader in the House of Representatives, said: "A 1 per cent freeze on domestic spending is a cut in almost every item on domestic discretionary spending."

However, the Democrats are unlikely to dismiss the administration's proposal to reduce rapidly rising spending on healthcare by $100bn in the coming years.

They are likely to agree on the needs for cuts, but may spend the savings on health insurance programmes for poor children rather than a proposed $1,500 per person tax cut to encourage private medical coverage.

Senior party figures said Democrats' proposal would include two of the most heavily criticised aspects of the president's budget: the off-balance sheet treatment of future war costs and the omission of tax relief for the middle class – regarded as inevitable by both parties.

Mr Hoyer said "on those two at least we will probably track the president", adding the party would tell the public: "Look, this is not the way we ought to be doing it." This approach will do little to answer economists who question the reliability of Republican and Democratic claims to be able to balance the budget by 2012.

Budget Keeps Tabs On Computer Security Risks (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 8, 2007

When the president releases a new budget, Karen Evans finds herself in demand.

She draws a crowd because, as the government's high-tech policy chief, she oversees big money for computer systems and other information technology investments. The fiscal 2008 budget proposes spending $65.5 billion on technology -- a handsome chunk of change by almost any standard.

In recent days, Evans has briefed more than 150 industry executives on federal technology spending plans, provided budget highlights to congressional committees, talked to industry associations, and conducted press briefings for East Coast and West Coast publications. Another corporate briefing is being planned for tech executives who could not be crowded into the first session.

Yesterday, between rattling off budget numbers and explaining policy procedures, Evans, the administrator of e-government and information technology for the Office of Management and Budget, made clear that she's watching how agencies perform and stands ready to help any in danger of bungling projects.

For the first time, President Bush's budget includes a "management watch list" of technology projects that have been poorly managed or may be vulnerable to hackers or some other security problem, Evans said.

For 2008, 346 of 840 major technology investment programs and projects are on the watch list. Evans estimated spending on the 346 programs at $14.4 billion.

She has updated a lengthy list of high-risk technology projects, though some are included only because they require coordination among multiple agencies and need more oversight. The list includes 25 e-gov initiatives that have required additional discussions with the House and Senate Appropriations committees.

There is no estimate of how much these projects cost because agencies are still compiling data for the OMB. But Evans said the incomplete tally stands at $9.1 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0129399

The two lists have been compiled in previous years but did not become part of the public record until last year, when Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) pressed for their release. The management watch list for troubled projects, in particular, is no longer hidden, assuming budget-watchers make it to Chapter 9 of the "Analytical Perspectives" budget book.

In addition to the recurring concerns about whether big computer upgrades and other technology projects are running over budget or taking too long, the government had to deal with a series of high-profile data security breaches last year.

One notable case involved the theft of a Veterans Affairs Department laptop and external hard drive from an analyst's home, raising concerns that the burglary had put at risk the names and Social Security numbers of millions of veterans. Officials later concluded that the data had not been accessed.

Evans said yesterday that agencies are making progress on improving their cyber-security, at least from a statistical standpoint. The percentage of systems that have been certified and accredited for security controls and contingency plans has increased markedly, she said.

But reviews by agency inspectors general found 11 of the 26 agencies had not made satisfactory progress on their plans to resolve cyber-security problems or did not have an effective process in place to identify and correct security weaknesses, according to the OMB.

Overall, fiscal 2008 spending on information technology in the government is increasing 2.6 percent from what Bush sought in fiscal 2007.

Some agencies would get substantial increases: The budget calls for a 45.5 percent boost for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (to help find alternative energy sources) and a 23.4 percent boost for the Treasury Department (to improve tax collection systems).

But the technology budget would fall by 1.1 percent, to $4.11 billion, at the Department of Homeland Security. Evans said the $44 million reduction would not hinder the fight against terrorism because the department was given significant increases in previous years.

Under the president's budget, she said, the government would spend about $46 billion this year on maintaining technology systems that support agency missions, and about $20 billion on projects to modernize or develop computer systems.

EDITORIAL: Mr. Bush's Improbable Budget (NYT)

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

President Bush claims that his new $2.9 trillion budget request is a tough-minded plan for balancing the books by 2012. In reality, it's a smokescreen for making Mr. Bush's tax cuts permanent — and either hollowing out the government in the process or digging the country deeper into debt.

The budget is based on a series of improbable, if not dishonest, assumptions. To make it appear as if the tax cuts are affordable in the near term, it assumes that the Pentagon will not spend a single penny on Iraq or Afghanistan after 2009. It also assumes there will be no costs for fixing the alternative minimum tax after this year, even though Mr. Bush and virtually every politician in America is committed to such relief.

The new budget would also slash key entitlement programs and punish many of the country's most vulnerable citizens. Sharp reductions are envisioned for Medicare, with cuts of $66 billion over five years, and Medicaid, down approximately $11 billion. Some of the Medicare proposals could serve as useful starting points for a debate on controlling costs through such steps as raising premiums for high-income beneficiaries. But the Medicaid cuts would be largely counterproductive. At a time when the number of uninsured children is rising, the cuts would force many states to reduce their Medicaid rolls.

Mr. Bush's budget would also take an ax to most other domestic spending. One program that would be gone entirely in 2008 provides monthly bags of groceries, each worth less than $20, to 440,000 needy elderly people. The $99 million block grant to states to help pay for preventive health care would also be eliminated. Other cuts — in Head Start, veterans' health care, environmental protection, scientific research, low-income housing and heating assistance, to name a few — would start in 2008 and grow, totaling $114 billion over five years. Such cuts would be shortsighted and cruel. They would also be politically impossible to enact — further exposing Mr. Bush's budget as the sham it is.

Even if they were achievable, the proposed spending reductions would be grossly unfair. Government programs that serve middle-class and low-income Americans would be slashed to offset the cost of extending tax cuts that favor the rich. In 2012 alone, the president's new budget would cut domestic discretionary spending by $34 billion, while tax cuts for households with incomes above $1 million would total $73 billion. In all, by 2012, 20 percent of the tax cuts would go to that richest sliver of Americans; one-third of the benefits would go to households with incomes over $400,000.

Mr. Bush's new budget has a few worthwhile nuggets, like a proposed increase in Pell grants for low-income college students and a jump in the funds for AIDS treatment worldwide. In drafting a real budget, Congress can take those items from the president's version, and jettison the rest.

Bush's Course On Budget Parallels Iraq (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

The numbers in President Bush's budget add up -- arithmetically. If his assumptions come true, the deficit will evaporate in 2012.

But there are a lot of ifs -- if Iraq and Afghanistan cost only $50 billion in 2009 and nothing thereafter; if the president and Congress hold growth in annually appropriated domestic spending well below inflation; if they let the alternative minimum tax reach deeper into the middle class or raise taxes on others to prevent that; if Congress squeezes $66 billion (4%) from Medicare over five years.

OK. Give him a break. A presidential budget is an opening bid, not an attempt at stating a consensus.

But is it sound? If former Republican Treasury Secretary James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton led a budget commission like their Iraq Study Group, what would they say?

They would hardly need to rewrite their cover letter. "There is no magic formula … . However, there are actions that can be taken to improve the situation and protect American interests," they said in the Iraq report. "Many Americans are dissatisfied, not just with the situation...but with the state of our political debate … . Our country deserves a debate that prizes substance over rhetoric, and a policy that is adequately funded and sustainable."

William Gale of the Brookings Institution think tank -- populated by deficit-fearing Democratic wonks who have been trying to find common ground with deficit-fearing Republican wonks -- has been thinking a lot lately about the parallels between Mr. Bush on Iraq and Mr. Bush on the budget.

"The Bush administration's two signature policies have been the war in Iraq and consistent pressure for tax cuts," he argues. "On the surface, they look quite different and were advocated by different parts of the administration. Look a little deeper and some common patterns emerge -- so maybe this says something about the principles or management style of the Bush administration."

It is a provocative and illuminating exercise. Let Mr. Gale kick it off: The president took the U.S. into Iraq with "falsely rosy scenarios" about the post-Saddam landscape there, he says. Mr. Bush built his tax cuts in 2001 on a similarly unrealistic hope that the budget surplus was large enough to cut taxes without creating deficits.

Let us keep going. As Iraq proved different and more difficult than anticipated, and contingency planning was regarded by the Bush White House as a sign of weakness, rather than prudence, Mr. Bush vowed to "stay the course." When then-Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill and Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan argued for "triggers" to undo tax cuts if budget reality didn't match projections, the White House scoffed. Even when the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan drove spending on homeland security and the military far above projections, Mr. Bush didn't revisit his fiscal strategy.

Smart critics, even inside the administration, were disregarded and shunned. (Gen. Eric Shinseki on troops levels in Iraq, Treasury Secretary O'Neill on deficits.) Only true believers remained to give the president advice. Eventually, Mr. Bush changed his team -- hiring new secretaries of defense and Treasury -- but too late to get credit from the public or to forge bipartisan consensus in Congress.

Imagine what might have happened differently had Mr. Bush installed Josh Bolten as chief of staff, Rob Portman as budget director and Hank Paulson as Treasury secretary at the start of his second term, instead of waiting two years. Might the conversation on Mr. Bush's ideas for limiting tax breaks for health insurance be bearing fruit, not just taking shape?

Might overhauling the tax code be a legislative issue instead of the title of another report gathering dust on Treasury bookshelves? Might Mr. Bush have something besides scars to show for his call to fix Social Security? Might he have a shot at leaving the nation's long-term fiscal health better than he found it, instead of leaving a deeper hole for his successors?

OK. Take a breath. The U.S. economy is not Iraq, and today's headlines are upbeat: The economy's vigor is producing tax revenue that is keeping today's deficits in check, and the unabated willingness of foreigners to lend to the U.S. is keeping interest rates down.

But look ahead, and there is an unwelcome parallel between Iraq and the budget. Current policy is unsustainable, but there is no easy way out. Extend the president's tax cuts beyond their scheduled expiration in 2009 and 2010, and the fiscal hole is enormous. Let them expire, and the tax increases could derail the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0129401

Messrs. Baker and Hamilton had little apparent effect on the president's Iraq policy. Maybe they would have better luck on economics.

Earmarks Under Fire (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, February 8, 2007

Senate Republican budget hawks are urging President Bush to use an executive order or presidential signing statement to block some of their fellow lawmakers from adding earmarks or pet projects to the fiscal 2007 continuing resolution.

The Senators' call for help from the Bush administration comes as Senators, House Members and K Street lobbyists have begun pushing agencies to ensure funding for earmarks included in appropriations bills passed by the two chambers last year but never sent to the president.

In a Feb. 7 letter to Bush, the group of fiscal conservatives led by GOP Sens. Jim DeMint (S.C.) and Tom Coburn (Okla.) urged Bush to make good on his State of the Union pledge to oppose earmarks.

Noting that Bush "articulated a forceful policy to reform non-legislative earmarks" in future appropriations bills, the letter calls on the "administration [to] take an equally strong stance with regard to [the CR], to clarify that agencies of your administration will not be bound or give any preference to earmarks contained in committee reports or in direct communications from Members of Congress or their staff."

The group has asked Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman in private meetings to urge Bush to use either an executive order or signing statement to explicitly prohibit agency officials from using funds in the CR to pay for these projects and programs unless they are in the national interest, an aide to one of the lawmakers said.

It is highly unusual for Members of Congress to seek a signing statement essentially undercutting the efforts of their colleagues, and it comes at a time when Bush's use of the controversial tool is under intense scrutiny in the House and Senate.

DeMint told reporters Wednesday that he and other conservatives have become increasingly concerned with the likelihood that Members will use their influence with federal agencies to "back-fund" earmarks included either in committee reports last year or multiyear earmarks that were included in the fiscal 2005 or fiscal 2006 spending bills.

DeMint said discussions with Portman and other administration officials led the group to "feel confident they will not honor nonauthorized earmarks." But the conservative lawmakers also are asking for direct involvement from the White House to make clear that the administration's policy is to oppose earmarks in general, he said.

DeMint acknowledged that blocking funding for earmarks included in committee reports from last year — which were written while both chambers were controlled by the GOP — could be politically costly in Republican-leaning states and districts. But he said this step is necessary to restore the integrity of the federal appropriations system, regardless of the near-term political pain. "Whether it's Republican or Democrat, a lot of us feel this had gotten so far [out of control] ... that we just felt we had to stop it."

An aide to Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) dismissed the bid, noting Byrd and House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) wrote the CR to eliminate earmarks and that they expected no funds to be used for them. "Sen. Byrd and Congressman Obey made it clear ... that there are to be no earmarks in this legislation," the aide said, adding that there is "no expectation that earmarks from previous years will continue" under the bill.

Meanwhile, it appears unlikely that Republicans will mount an effort to filibuster the CR over the next week and a half, although several lawmakers are expected to use procedural moves to drag out debate up to the Feb. 15 deadline for passing the measure. Despite dire warnings over the past week from Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) that the GOP would attempt to block the bill, lawmakers and leadership aides said no such move is in the offing.

One GOP leadership aide said that while Coburn and at least one other Member could use procedural hurdles to slow consideration, the Republican Conference has no interest in forcing a showdown with Reid that could result in a repeat of the 1995 government shutdown that hurt Republicans politically.

"Shutting down the government always goes really well for us," the aide quipped.

House Readies A Tax Compromise (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Democrats are preparing a $1 billion package of small-business tax breaks to be paired with an increase in the federal minimum wage, hoping to break a stalemate with the Senate over one of their top legislative priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0129402

In doing so, the House is likely to avoid many of the revenue increases passed by the Senate in its small-business tax package, increases that have caused heartburn for business groups and lawmakers in both parties.

The House package is far smaller than the $8 billion, 10-year package of tax breaks the Senate approved last week as part of its minimum-wage-increase package. Still, it represents a nod by the House to the Senate's insistence that tax breaks are needed to get Republican support sufficient to enact a phased-in, $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage.

The House Ways and Means Committee is set to consider the package as early as Monday, which could pave the way for full House action later in the week. Passage of a tax bill in the House would solve a major procedural issue that had been holding up progress on the minimum-wage increase.

The House package also moves the two chambers closer on substance, although many differences remain. In January, the House easily passed a minimum-wage increase without any tax breaks, and many Democrats there had said the Senate ought to do the same.

The House's tax breaks would be offset with revenue increases, House aides said. But, in a bright spot for business groups, the pared-down approach means the House will be able to avoid many of the Senate-passed offsets that businesses are lobbying against, such as new limits on the amount an employee could place in certain tax-deferred-compensation plans. Some House lawmakers, including Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.) and Rep. Jim McCrery (R., La.), have been leery of the some of the offsets passed by the Senate.

The House package is still in flux, House aides said, but it will propose from $1 billion to $1.5 billion over 10 years in breaks for small businesses affected by the minimum-wage increase. Among the tax sweeteners being considered: an extension of a credit for companies that hire disadvantaged workers and an extension of more generous expense write-offs. Another provision the House may consider would use a tax credit to offset the extra income tax that restaurants would pay on workers' tips if the minimum wage increases.

To pay for such changes, it's also likely the House will look to reduce the so-called "tax gap," the amount of revenue the government is legally entitled to collect but doesn't.

Along with the Senate-passed changes in the tax treatment of executive pay, the House is also likely to avoid a restriction on a tax shelter known as a "sale-in, lease-out," or SILO transaction. In SILO transactions, a tax-exempt entity such as a city government sells property to an investor and then leases the property back for use. The investor, in turn, can take advantage of tax breaks associated with the property that wouldn't benefit the seller.

The Senate restriction would have hit banks that have entered into such transactions.

Sudden Reversal (WSJ)

By Mitch Mcconnell

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

The Medicare drug benefit that Congress passed in 2003 and which took effect last January has exceeded every expectation. Not only is the program more popular than we imagined, it is also more flexible and less expensive. Of the 39 million seniors with prescription drug coverage, about 24 million have already signed up for the benefit, called Part D. Many of the remaining 15 million get an indirect subsidy from Part D through their pre-existing plans. Four out of five enrolled say they are satisfied, and why wouldn't they be? Monthly premiums, expected to cost $37, average $22. Part D is honored at 55,000 neighborhood pharmacies nationwide. Those who prefer home delivery can arrange for that, too. And critically, it covers nearly every drug approved by the FDA.

Nevertheless, some in Congress want to make over Part D to resemble the drug benefit program of the Veterans Administration, where the government sets a price on drugs that it can get at the cheapest rate and limits access to those it can't. As a result, the VA benefit excludes three out of four drugs available through Part D, including some of the most innovative treatments for arthritis, high cholesterol, breast cancer and other ailments. Retired veterans who want Crestor, Humira or Revlimid have to go elsewhere or go without. It also takes three years for new drugs to make it onto the VA's list; and enrollees can only directly fill prescriptions at about 350 government-run facilities nationwide. No wonder more than one million retired veterans have signed up for Medicare in the last year alone.

Why the difference between the programs? Unlike the VA benefit, Part D partners with a number of private-sector drug plans that were already negotiating prices with drug makers in other markets. Costs are then driven down even further from competition among plans. The savings flow not just to seniors, but to every taxpaying American. Part D has already cost $7 billion less than originally expected. It is now projected to cost another $113 billion less over the next 10 years. When was the last time a government program ended up costing less than projected?

DOJ_NMG_0129403

All of which brings us back to the Medicare bill that Democrats recently passed in the House, which would scrap the competitive pricing mechanism that has made Part D such a success. The Democrats' Senate version is short on details; but its call for senators to express their "sense" that Part D should be changed is a clear sign of what's in store. This, despite the findings of the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, along with every other major study of the issue, which say that fixing prices won't lead to lower costs -- just fewer options.

Both parties used to oppose rationing. For example, Tom Daschle, the former Democratic Senate Majority Leader, proposed a reform in 2000 that called on health plans to bargain on behalf of seniors. Bill Clinton's Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala argued for the same thing.

The sudden reversal is a mystery. Are Democrats unaware of their history on the issue? Are they unaware of the facts? Ultimately, the answer to these questions doesn't matter. More than 30 million seniors say they are happy with the drug benefit we put together four years ago, and Republicans are eager to defend it. Even if we can't imagine why it's being threatened in the first place.

Mr. McConnell is the Senate Republican leader.

Faculty Resists Vote On Bush Institute (NYT)

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

The Faculty Senate at Southern Methodist University in Dallas rejected a proposal yesterday for a faculty referendum on plans for an independent policy institute on campus that would accompany President Bush's future library and museum.

The university learned on Dec. 21 that it was the favored site for the Bush library, museum and policy institute. Then in late January, more than 170 faculty members, about a quarter of the full-time professors on campus, signed a petition calling for a referendum because the proposed institute would be controlled by the Bush Foundation, not the university.

But after extensive debate largely on procedural matters, the call for a referendum failed with some original petitioners voting against it.

Other faculty members and many students have expressed support for the institute and library.

Last week, the university's chapter of the Young Conservatives of Texas student group gathered nearly 700 signatures in support of the Bush library.

Controversy Clouds Pelosi's Air Travel (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

Washington — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's people say she just wants to get home to California now and then and would like to do it in a plane that can make it all the way without stopping to refuel.

Pelosi's conservative critics say the San Francisco Democrat is abusing the perks of power by attempting to commandeer a fancy jumbo-size military jet with a "distinguished visitor compartment with sleep accommodations."

The flap over how the House speaker gets around has been circling over Washington since last week, but was largely ignored until Wednesday when, as things tend to do on a slow news day in the nation's capital, it exploded.

"Flying Lincoln bedroom," Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri cried in an story stripped across the top of the conservative-leaning Washington Times.

"Pelosi One," Republican Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina quipped in the same article.

"Ridiculous," countered Brendan Daly, Pelosi's chief spokesman, after his boss was peppered with questions at the tail end of an event that was supposed to be a photo op with Iraq war veterans.

At issue is what kind of aircraft the House speaker -- second in line to the presidency -- should use to get around the country, a question that was a lot less complicated before Sept. 11, 2001. For years, speakers flew commercial like everybody else in Congress. But after the terrorist attacks it was deemed that anyone two heartbeats away was important enough to warrant a military jet.

Until now, the only speaker affected was Republican J. Dennis Hastert, who commuted to his Illinois district in small executive-style military jets.

But Pelosi has to go all the way to San Francisco, and the executive jets can only make the trip without refueling if weather conditions are ideal.

The only military passenger plane that can make the flight in any weather and also provide the communications necessary to stay in contact with the White House is the bigger and costlier C-40 -- described by the Air Force as an "office in the sky" with beds, two galleys and business-class seating.

DOJ_NMG_0129404

It's this plane that critics have flogged for a week in an attempt to paint the wealthy speaker as a San Francisco elitist who wants to fly around in splendor with her family and friends.

"Pelosi's abuse of power continues," McHenry thundered in a news release, "now she's exploiting America's armed forces and taxpayers for her own personal convenience."

So far, Pelosi hasn't used one of the big jets that has caused all the fuss.

In her single trip home as speaker since being sworn in Jan. 4, she flew commercial to San Francisco and took a military 12-seater back to Washington. It made it without refueling, thanks to headwinds, officials said.

She did, however, ask to use a military plane to go to a recent retreat of House Democrats in Williamsburg, Va., less than a three-hour drive from the capital. The request was denied and Pelosi took the train with everybody else.

The controversy caught up with Pelosi Wednesday when a photo session intended to discredit President Bush's planned troop buildup in Iraq backfired and she was forced to address a subject she would rather have ignored.

"That has nothing to do with family and friends and everything to do with security," a perturbed Pelosi explained. "It's a question of distance."

Then her aides cut off questions.

The Defense Department delivered a letter to Pelosi late Wednesday that "offers her, as a courtesy, the same provisions to travel that speaker Hastert had," said a senior Defense official who spoke on background because he did not want to anger the speaker. The official said that Pelosi would be offered the use of available aircraft, which could sometimes include the larger plane.

Daly would not elaborate on the letter, saying it was being "reviewed."

Military officials said in interviews that there are more VIPs looking for rides than there are planes available to carry them. There is, after all, a war on.

"It's not that the Air Force doesn't want to fly the speaker," said an Air Force officer who declined to be named because she didn't want to appear to take sides in a political fight.

Air Force officials say at least 21 people can theoretically request to use the C-40s. There are only four of the planes. The 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force Base near Washington has two and the Air National Guard also has two.

Those who want them include: the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Cabinet secretaries and the seven commanders who oversee military operations around the world. In addition, the planes are regularly used to fly congressional delegations to military theaters.

One reason to fly the speaker of the House in a military plane, according to the Pentagon, is to enable her to stay in touch with the White House.

Hastert flew in the military's smaller jets: the C-20, a version of a 12-seat Gulfstream; the C-21, a version of a six-seat Learjet; and the C-37, a version of a 12-seat Gulfstream. But those planes can only make it cross-country nonstop under ideal weather conditions, with no serious headwinds.

Hastert, according to a military official, usually traveled with up to three staff members and two members of the Capitol Police. Occasionally his wife, Jean, came along, too, Air Force officials said.

Pelosi supporters charge that the controversy is being fueled by GOP opponents who are still burning over an election loss that stemmed from Pelosi's charges of a "culture of corruption" in Congress.

"It's one of the things they are still very raw from ... and that's part of the root of this -- to make her the symbol of Democratic entitlement, Democratic abuses," said Anita Dunn, a Washington Democratic strategist.

But it was under Pelosi's leadership that the House banned the use of corporate jets at bargain prices by lawmakers as part of its much-touted ethics reform package, leading critics to brand her a hypocrite.

Pelosi said Wednesday she would just as soon fly commercial, but security rules won't allow it. Aides note that she is so mindful of not misusing the powers of office that when she recently encountered a wild bird in her Georgetown condo, she called the super rather than the security detail downstairs. In fact, they noted, the speaker herself caught the bird in a brown bag.

The House sergeant-at-arms originally advised Pelosi that Hastert had used a military plane and recommended that she use one that didn't need to refuel. That prompted her office to request clarification of the rules, Daly said, noting that she never actually requested a specific plane.

Daly acknowledged, however, that Pelosi has inquired whether family and friends can fly with her on business travel. A mother of five and grandmother of six, Pelosi's family often accompanies her on the road.

The flare-up clearly rankled Pelosi and her staff Wednesday.

When the Los Angeles Times asked for copies of correspondence between her office and relevant agencies about any transportation requests, Daly's e-mail response was curt: "no."

Republicans Balk At Pelosi's Request For A New Plane (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - Everybody, including the woman who's at the center of Washington's latest tempest in a teapot, agrees on this much: The Pentagon was considering a request to give House Speaker Nancy Pelosi access to a bigger Air Force jet than previous speakers had.

From there, the story lines diverge, much like flight routes heading east versus west.

Republicans charge that she's trying to abuse the privileges of office. Pelosi, a California Democrat, denies doing anything wrong and says such slurs could be coming only from the White House.

"It has nothing to do with family and friends and everything to do about security," Pelosi said Wednesday.

Still, it's a potential image problem for the first female speaker - already caricatured for her wealth, love of designer clothes and chocolate obsession - to be portrayed as thinking she deserves her own Air Force Three.

Rep. Adam H. Putnam, R-Fla., the chairman of the House Republican Conference, wants an investigation. "It's an extravagance of power the taxpayers won't swallow," he said.

Republican complaints about Pelosi's jet draw on recent articles in The Washington Times, a conservative newspaper in the nation's capital, that cited unnamed sources.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, the chairman of the Republican Study Committee, isn't waiting for an investigation. His group sent out a news release with a photo of a C-32 jet, the military version of Boeing's 757-200 jetliner, and this question: "During a week in which Democrats are pushing a resolution that states, `it is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence in Iraq,' they believe that securing Speaker Pelosi the military plane pictured below . . . is in the national interest?"

Pelosi denies any impropriety.

"The only misrepresentations could be coming from the administration and one would only have to wonder why. . . . I know it's not coming from the president of the United States because he has impressed upon me over and over again the need for me to have the security that I need," she said Wednesday.

Pelosi and her aides said 12-seat Air Force jets - the kind that Republican former House Speaker Dennis Hastert used to get home to Illinois - can't always get to California without refueling, a claim confirmed by an Air Force official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivities involved.

Pelosi also says that not flying commercial is a matter of personal and perhaps national security, as the House speaker is second in the line of succession to the presidency, after the vice president.

Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon said Wednesday night that the Defense Department has notified Pelosi in writing that she would have access to the same jet service as Hastert had.

"She will be offered shuttle service for no more than 10 passengers between Washington and San Francisco only based on aircraft availability," Gordon said. "This does not guarantee nonstop transport."

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said the speaker's office was reviewing the letter and that it appreciated "the Defense Department's continuing concern for the speaker's security."

It's unclear whether the Defense Department's letter ends the issue or whether negotiations would continue.

Publicly, the White House took a stance somewhere between neutral and supportive of Pelosi. White House spokesman Tony Snow said that after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the White House and Defense Department agreed that House speakers should have military transport.

"And so what is going on is that the Department of Defense is going through its rules and regulations and having conversations with the speaker about it."

Murtha said he'd sought jet privileges for every Democratic House speaker since Tip O'Neill, D-Mass., in the late `70s, and never threatened anyone.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said the speaker had used an Air Force jet only once to fly back from California and "she never asked for supporters on the plane."

Pelosi requested a jet to fly to a Democratic retreat last week in Williamsburg, Va., saying she thought that Hastert had used a jet similarly, but her request was rejected.

Pentagon Limits Pelosi Jet Size (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

The Department of Defense yesterday sent a letter to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that puts limits on the size of the plane she may use to travel across the country and restricts the guests she can bring, The Washington Times has learned.

A congressional source who read the letter signed by Assistant Secretary of Defense Robert Wilkie said it essentially limits her to the commuter plane used by former Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, which requires refueling to travel from Washington to Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district. A second source, in the Bush administration, confirmed the contents of the letter.

The Washington Times first reported last week that Mrs. Pelosi's staff was pressing the Department of Defense for an Air Force aircraft large enough to fly nonstop to San Francisco. She also has pressed to be able to include other members of the California congressional delegation, her family members and her staff on the plane.

"It's not a question of size. It's a question of distance," Mrs. Pelosi told reporters yesterday. "We want an aircraft that can reach California."

Earlier, Mrs. Pelosi did not comment on the matter but yesterday began a counteroffensive accusing the Bush administration of twisting the story.

These "misrepresentations could be coming from the administration," she told reporters yesterday.

"One would only have to wonder why," she said, though adding that she did not suspect President Bush "because he has impressed upon me over and over again the need for me to have the security that I need."

The letter from the Pentagon yesterday cites specific U.S. Code that government policy does not include the routine use of military aircraft for the speaker of the House.

"Nonstop service is not guaranteed, meaning she's getting Hastert's plane and nothing bigger," the congressional source said, referring to the commuter jet Mr. Hastert began using for security reasons after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

But the administration official said Mrs. Pelosi "wanted to be able to fly between Washington and the West Coast nonstop."

The letter leaves open the possibility that Mrs. Pelosi may get a larger plane that does not require refueling if one happens to be available in the 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force Base. But, generally, the larger military passenger jets are in high demand, especially due to the Iraq war.

In addition, the letter stipulates that the Air Force will only fly her between Washington and her San Francisco district and places limits on who can travel with her.

The Washington Times reported earlier this week that the Pentagon denied a request by Mrs. Pelosi to fly on a military aircraft to last weekend's Democratic retreat in Williamsburg, a two-hour drive from Washington.

"Non-governmental personnel, i.e. political supporters and contributors, may not fly," the congressional source said yesterday, paraphrasing the letter sent to Mrs. Pelosi. "The plane may not ferry her to any political events and other members may only accompany her after approval by the House ethics committee, which means Republicans would have to OK it."

Immediate family members who fly with her must pay the U.S. Treasury for the flight.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly acknowledged the letter but declined to get into specifics about it.

"We appreciate the Defense Department's continuing concern for the speaker's security," he said. "We are reviewing their letter."

Mr. Daly said the negotiations with the Pentagon and the Air Force over using a larger plane is a matter of security based on her position as second in line to the presidency.

"The military is saying she needs this for her security," he said yesterday afternoon. "She's the speaker of the House."

But the congressional source noted that no speaker of the House has ever succeeded to the presidency.

"Just because she's second in line to be president does not entitle her to a military taxi service around the United States," the source said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said yesterday that while negotiations were continuing between Mrs. Pelosi's office and the Pentagon, she would ultimately have some sort of military transport at her disposal.

"The Department of Defense is going through its rules and regulations and having conversations with the speaker about it," he said. "So Speaker Hastert had access to military aircraft, and Speaker Pelosi will too."

In an interview on Fox News, Mrs. Pelosi said the plane request was not hers.

"I wish I didn't have to have so much security, because I like my freedom of mobility," she said, adding that she would be willing to fly commercial aviation. "I'm not asking to go on that plane. If you need to take me there for security purposes, you're going to have to get a plane that goes across the country."

But Mrs. Pelosi's requests for the larger jet still has drawn ridicule from Republicans, who have dubbed the requested plane "Pelosi One."

DOJ_NMG_0129407

It's especially galling, they say, since Mrs. Pelosi and her fellow Democrats ran on campaigns to clear out many of the perks provided to lawmakers.

One of the first changes she made to the rules governing House members was to ban free air travel by members of Congress on corporate-owned or chartered planes.

The "jumbo request," as one Republican called it, also comes at a time when Democrats are trying to push through Congress a resolution that sending 21,500 reinforcement troops to Iraq "is not in the national interest of the United States."

"So let's get this straight," Republican Study Committee spokesman Brad Dayspring said in a statement yesterday that reproduced a picture of a transcontinental U.S. military jet. "During a week in which Democrats are pushing a resolution that states, 'it is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence in Iraq,' they believe that securing Speaker Pelosi the military plane pictured below for luxury flights is in the national interest?"

Bush White House Guest Was Indicted N.J. Lawyer, Records Show (BLOOM)

By David Voreacos And David Glovin

Bloomberg, February 8, 2007

Feb. 8 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush invited an indicted New Jersey lawyer to a White House holiday party less than two months after the attorney was charged with immigration fraud, court records show.

Jonathan Saint-Preux was indicted on Oct. 5 with his wife, Michele, and another man on federal charges that they submitted fraudulent documents to help hundreds of undocumented immigrants stay in the U.S. Saint-Preux, who pleaded innocent, attended the White House party on Nov. 30, said his attorney, Patrick Toscano.

U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden in Newark, New Jersey, signed an order granting permission for Saint-Preux ``to travel to Washington DC to attend a function at the White House at the request of President and Mrs. Bush." A Justice Department prosecutor consented to the trip, court records show.

``He was at a Christmas party," Michele Saint-Preux said in an interview yesterday at her husband's office in Irvington, New Jersey, where she is the manager. ``He's been doing political work with the White House for years."

Inside the law office were separate framed photographs of Saint-Preux with first lady Laura Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Democratic New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Michele Saint-Preux said her husband also did political work to support former President Bill Clinton.

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore didn't have details on why Saint-Preux was invited to the party. ``Thousands of people attend the White House holiday parties," she said.

Bush Not Aware?

``I doubt very highly that if the president was aware that Mr. Saint-Preux was having legal problems here in New Jersey, he would have been invited," Toscano said in an interview yesterday. ``It wasn't Mr. Saint-Preux's intent to cause problems for anybody."

Toscano and Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Lurie signed a consent order that allowed Saint-Preux to take the trip. Hayden approved that order on Dec. 1. Saint-Preux is free on $250,000 bail and is not supposed to leave New Jersey without a judge's authorization. It wasn't clear why Hayden signed the order on Dec. 1, the day after the party.

``This is the sort of request that we get routinely from defense lawyers wanting to relax the bail restrictions because of business, family, or social reasons," said Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie in Newark.

According to the indictment, Saint-Preux, his wife, and a man who recruited clients for him, Naranjan Patel, lied on immigration documents. They claimed the immigrants had lived continuously in the U.S. from before 1982 until at least May 1987, prosecutors said. Prosecutors claim the ruse was intended to help immigrants qualify for legal residency under a U.S. amnesty program.

False Documents

The indictment, which accuses Saint-Preux of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. and seven counts of submitting false immigration documents, cites seven unnamed ``cooperating witnesses" who have provided evidence to prosecutors.

Saint-Preux, then 44, was arrested on Oct. 12. Toscano said plea negotiations are underway. ``We're hoping to amicably resolve this," he said.

Saint-Preux donated $1,100 to New Jersey Republicans in 2004 and 2005, according to opensecrets.org, a Web site.

``I know that Jonathan was active in political circles, but I can't speak to how he was invited to the White House Christmas party," Toscano said.

DOJ_NMG_0129408

On Nov. 30, Bush met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al- Maliki in Amman, Jordan, before returning to Washington. The buffet menu at the holiday party included sugar cured Virginia ham and chicken fried beef tenderloin, according to the White House Web site.

The case is U.S. v. Saint-Preux, 06-CR-813, U.S. District Court, District of New Jersey (Newark).

House Committee To Examine Recent Performance Of S.B.A. (NYT)

By Ron Nixon

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

A House committee is holding the first of several hearings today to discuss the Small Business Administration, an agency that has come under criticism for its disaster relief program in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, as well as its operating, lending and contracting practices.

Representative Nydia M. Velásquez, Democrat of New York and chairwoman of the House Small Business Committee, said that the hearings would look into other issues, including recent disclosures that federal investigators have accused a lender in an S.B.A. program of falsifying information on 76 loans with a value of nearly $77 million over six years.

The administrator, Steven C. Preston, is scheduled to appear at today's hearing, which will also address budget and staffing issues. An internal memo prepared by the agency's chief financial officer in January said that the S.B.A. had dropped below its minimal staffing levels because of budget shortfalls.

Since 2001, the budget has declined by more than 37 percent. But the agency announced Monday that its 2008 budget request is a 5 percent increase over its 2006 budget. The 2007 budget for the agency was not passed.

"This is a very different budget than what you've seen in recent years," Mr. Preston said in an interview. "We will have money to run the agency and expand on what we do, including hiring new people."

But Ms. Velásquez said the figures actually showed a decline.

"In fact, the request cuts funding for a number of the agency's core programs, including initiatives that provide technical assistance for low-income entrepreneurs, business development for minorities and contracting opportunities in distressed areas of the country," Ms. Velásquez said in a statement.

President Bush's fiscal year 2008 operating budget for the agency is $464 million, down from $624 million last fiscal year, she said.

Michael L. Stamler, a spokesman for the S.B.A., said that the agency compared its new budget request with the 2006 budget because it was the last time a budget was passed.

Mr. Stamler also said that although budget documents show the agency's budget dropping from $533 million in 2006 to $463 million in the 2008 request, almost $90 million of the 2006 funds were what is known as earmarks.

"These are items inserted into the budget by lawmakers," Mr. Stamler said. "These are dollars that are designated for specific projects in their home districts. This is not money to fund the operation of the S.B.A."

A spokeswoman for Ms. Velásquez said the committee would question Mr. Preston about the differing views of the budget.

The S.B.A. under Mr. Preston, who took over the agency in July, has taken steps to address much of the criticism of the agency. Mr. Preston announced several initiatives during a news conference last week.

First, he said, the agency has revamped its disaster loan program by assigning a case manager to each borrower and added plans to enlist the private sector in case of another Katrina-like disaster.

Also, to ensure that companies receiving small-business contracts are actually small, the S.B.A. recently adopted a rule to require businesses to recertify their size as genuinely small after the fifth year of a contract and immediately when a company changes ownership.

Mr. Preston said the new rule would make federal contract reporting more relevant and increase opportunities for small businesses by encouraging federal contracting officers to expand their search for qualified contractors.

The agency is also working with the Office of Management and Budget to fix coding errors in the federal database of contracts. All federal agencies have been asked to review all 2005 and 2006 small-business contracting information for accuracy.

The S.B.A. is establishing a program to help contracting offices better identify qualified small businesses. The agency also intends to hire additional workers to help with oversight of contracting.

While giving Mr. Preston credit for his efforts so far, Ms. Velásquez says she still intends to provide aggressive oversight of the agency.

"We look forward to working with the agency to address these issues, whether S.B.A. can do that on its own," she said, "or if Congress needs to step in, that remains to be seen."

Congress To Revisit Foreign Deals (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Senior House members signaled intention to push forward with legislation tightening U.S. scrutiny of foreign-led transactions, despite Bush administration concerns over a potential chilling effect on the nation's investment climate.

In testimony before the House Financial Services Committee, Clay Lowery, the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for international affairs, said the efforts on Capitol Hill are being closely watched abroad, especially in the wake of last year's tumult over a Dubai company's bid to take control of several American port operations.

"It is important we get this right," said Mr. Lowery. He said some foreign investors may be asking whether the U.S. is "closing its borders" to investment and competition. "We all realize our primary goal is to protect national security. But we also need to protect open investment in the United States."

House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (D., Mass.) said he intends to move legislation, which has wide, bipartisan support, through his committee next week, and to the House floor soon after. He suggested action could calm concern in the business community over the issue and bring certainty to the marketplace by clarifying how deals would be reviewed.

No major bill has yet emerged from the Senate, which last year had introduced a stringent bill on the issue. But Sen. Chris Dodd, the Connecticut Democrat who heads the Senate Banking Committee, "intends to address this issue once again," said his spokesman, Marvin Fast.

Lawmakers' determination to push ahead on this issue underscores the toughened environment toward trade and international investment in Washington. Democrats are also questioning the administration's broader trade agenda, as they push for greater protections for American workers hurt by globalization.

The House measure is focused on the review of certain foreign-investment deals by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. CFIUS, a secretive panel represented by 12 government agencies led by the Treasury Department, was set up in 1975 to review the national-security implications of foreign deals. The House bill would require CFIUS to conduct an extended, 45-day investigation, beyond the standard review, of all deals involving companies controlled by foreign governments.

Currently, deals are subject to a 30-day review, with some undergoing an additional 45 days if there are security concerns that need more scrutiny.

Mr. Lowery yesterday agreed that deals involving foreign government-controlled companies "should be given higher scrutiny." But he suggested a specific mandate goes too far, exposing "routine transactions" to drawn-out investigations.

He said the Bush administration has already taken steps to improve CFIUS's operations, including creating a more-formal role for the intelligence community to evaluate foreign deals, and pushing final decisions higher up the chain of command within the agencies involved in CFIUS.

The goal is to win back "the American people's confidence" that security is being protected, he said. Other agencies represented in CFIUS include the departments of Homeland Security, Defense and State.

The CFIUS panel approved the Dubai deal after giving the transaction a standard review. The move outraged lawmakers, who said the administration had failed to grasp the danger of giving an Arab firm a role in managing U.S. ports in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The company, which is owned by the government of Dubai, the Persian Gulf emirate, eventually divested itself of the U.S. assets acquired in the deal.

The uproar highlighted U.S. public unease with foreign investments, and led to efforts in Congress to strengthen accountability and disclosure within CFIUS.

Ailing Norwood Heading To Hospice (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 8, 2007

Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.), who has been hospitalized as he battles complications from a debilitating lung disease and lung cancer, has decided to forgo further medical treatment in Washington, D.C., and will return to his Augusta home for hospice care.

A statement released Wednesday by the seven-term Congressman's office said that Norwood will leave Georgetown University Medical Center, where he was transferred last week, as soon as an air ambulance flight to Georgia can be arranged. Norwood had been receiving chemotherapy treatments since last fall that have caused him to become extremely ill.

"He's really throwing in the towel on the traditional hospital treatment and he's just going to go home," said Norwood spokesman John Stone.

Although Norwood is leaving Washington, Stone said he does not intend to resign his 10th district seat.

DOJ_NMG_0129410

"He's just been sick as a dog since November battling this thing," Stone said, adding that his boss is looking forward to returning to his own bed, his La-Z-Boy and his wife's cooking.

While those close to Norwood continue to dismiss any talk that he might resign, the Congressman's ailing health has led to subtle, and not so subtle, speculation back in his Northeastern Georgia district about who is interested in succeeding Norwood should he not seek another term in 2008.

Norwood, 65, was diagnosed with idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis in 1998. The condition causes scarring in a person's lungs. There is no cure and the only treatment available is a lung transplant.

Norwood underwent a single lung transplant in October 2004. The immune system-suppressing drugs the Congressman took following the transplant made him more prone to developing lung cancer, and in November 2005 he had a small malignant tumor removed from his nontransplanted lung.

Stone said Norwood felt good for much of 2006 — he visited Iraq and also played a major role in the House debate over reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act last summer.

But in November, doctors discovered that the non-small-cell lung cancer had spread to his liver and metastasized. He has been undergoing chemotherapy since that time and has remained hospitalized almost since the start of the 110th Congress.

Norwood had received treatments at Inova Fairfax and Inova Mount Vernon hospitals, but was transferred to Georgetown last week, where he was evaluated for Cyberknife laser surgery to remove the tumor in his liver. He declined to have the procedure.

On the political front, Republican state Reps. Barry Fleming and Ben Harbin and former state Sen. Brian Kemp (R) are mentioned as possible candidates to succeed Norwood.

Harbin is the chairman of the state House Appropriations Committee and may not want to relinquish that perch.

In his early 40s, Kemp has been viewed as one of the brightest rising stars in Georgia GOP circles and his political career appears far from over despite his unsuccessful primary bid for state Agriculture Commissioner in 2006. In the state Senate he represented a Democratic-leaning district in Athens, which could also not translate well into winning a Congressional primary.

The district is anchored by Augusta and Athens, a liberal bastion that includes the University of Georgia. Although Athens was put back into the district when GOP legislators redrew district lines in 2005, the 10th still heavily favors Republicans, and the Democrats are not likely to mount a serious challenge if there is a vacancy.

While Norwood has missed nearly all floor votes since the 110th Congress convened on Jan. 4, Stone said that Norwood has continued to direct his staff and has been involved in legislative discussions "and will continue to now, for as long as the good Lord sees fit to let him."

Congress Has So Little To Do, And So Much Time To Do It (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Is there no rest for the weary lawmaker?

"Members Resist Five-Day Workweek," one of the Capitol Hill newspapers proclaimed on its front page yesterday. Senators were "ready to revolt" and House members were "simmering" over their legislative demands.

The poor dears.

Consider yesterday's schedule for the people's representatives. Not only did they have to pass H.R. 99, "commending the University of Nebraska-Lincoln volleyball team," but they had to do it immediately after passing H.R. 72, celebrating the achievements of meteorologist Max Mayfield. Then it was on to legislation in support of the African American spiritual, remembering a deceased NASCAR driver, naming a courthouse in Duluth, Minn., and honoring the grandfather of two congressmen.

That left time for a full debate over the day's signal legislative achievement: H.R. 130, congratulating the Indianapolis Colts for winning the Super Bowl.

"I won a deep-dish pizza, a pound of cheesecake, and a bunch of DVDs for our troops," reported Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.).

"Go, Colts," contributed Rep. Steve Buyer (R-Ind.). Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) asked for "unanimous consent to add to the Congressional Record the names of all the members of the Colts offense, defense, substitutions and the coaching staff."

Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.) tried to crash the Hoosiers' party. Colts quarterback Peyton Manning, he said, "is married to a Chattanooga girl."

The new Congress has a problem. The just-empowered Democrats have declared that lawmakers will work five-day weeks like most other Americans. But, at this early date, there isn't much legislation ready for passage -- so what little there is has to be stretched out to fill the week.

DOJ_NMG_0129411

The House, which will hold its Iraq war debate next week, will extend that discussion by giving five minutes of floor time to all 435 members. And in the Senate, the pace is so lethargic that Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) told colleagues late Tuesday that he would give them an extra week of vacation if they would take up the legislation he wants.

Senate Republicans blocked a debate on the Iraq war on Monday, but because the lawmakers have no other legislation ready to consider, they spent the past two days talking about it anyway. One by one, Republicans took to the Senate floor yesterday to plead for the debate they had blocked.

"I'm disappointed . . . we're not having the Iraq debate," said Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

"We should have found a way to go forward," concurred Trent Lott (Miss.), the No. 2 Republican.

"We need to debate this issue now," said David Vitter (La.).

The discourse was little more elevated in the other chamber, where the delegate from Guam was delivering the unhappy news that "heart disease is becoming a problem for islander women."

Fortunately, members did not have long to wait before Rep. Tim Mahoney (D-Fla.) brought up his legislation honoring meteorologist Mayfield on his retirement from the National Hurricane Center. "The U.S. Department of Commerce has recognized Mr. Mayfield with gold medals for his work during Hurricanes Andrew and Isabel, and a silver medal during Hurricane Gilbert," Mahoney read.

This raised the question of why Mayfield came up short during Gilbert. But the lawmakers did not dwell on this.

"In Congress we think we are busy, and indeed we are," added Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.). "But I understand that in the thick of storm season, Mr. Mayfield sometimes did more than 100 interviews in one day. Now, that's busy."

Ehlers was being modest. Mayfield had nothing on these busy legislators.

After the Mayfield resolution, Ehlers and his colleagues moved quickly to the volleyball vote. "The Huskers rallied to defeat Stanford, 3-1, for their third NCAA Division I women's volleyball championship," Ehlers reported. "My only regret, since I enjoy playing volleyball myself, is I never had the opportunity to watch them play in person."

The speaker called for the yeas and nays. Ehlers was the only one who called out "aye" -- but because there were only three members on the floor and the two others were silent, the resolution passed.

The discussion then turned to a resolution "recognizing the African American spiritual as a national treasure." Members recalled such favorites as "We Shall Overcome," "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and "Gospel Train."

"I recall my family -- we had a number of musicians in the family -- very frequently were singing their Negro spirituals in groups at church," reminisced Ehlers, who is not African American.

This time, a roll-call vote was ordered; the spirituals were upheld by a vote of 426 to 0.

The hard work continued. Noting the passing of NASCAR's Benny Parsons, honoring the grandfather of Reps. Mario and Lincoln Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.), and naming the Gerald W. Heaney courthouse.

"Many have made light of the schedule we have had for the past few weeks, the grueling schedule of naming a lot of federal buildings," acknowledged Rep. Sam Graves (R-Mo.), speaking in favor of the Heaney courthouse. "It doesn't mean any of these individuals are any less deserving or shouldn't be honored."

Indeed not. The harried lawmakers gave Heaney his courthouse.

Miss America, With Poise to Spare in Wonkland Central

Okay, Chris Matthews , we take it back. Once you meet Lauren Nelso n , you kind of get why she's Miss America.

After eight days of nonstop travel since being crowned in Vegas last week ("I won't go home until March"), the Oklahoman touched down in D.C. Tuesday to attend the Washington Press Club Foundation congressional dinner and managed to appear radiant and alert and genuinely interested through three hours of oxygen-depleting insider banter between Washington scribes and political types.

(Did it help or hurt that she wasn't drinking? At 20, she's the youngest Miss A. in more than a decade.)

Her host, Congressional Quarterly, sat her with a formidable group: Daryl Hannah , talking about human trafficking and an upcoming trip to Budapest and how "I should really go say hello to Teddy" (Sen. Kennedy , that is); Hannah's escort, California artist John Quigley , talking about his environmental work; and a Roanoke, Va., fellow named Dave "Mudcat" Saunders butting in to ask, "Are yew one of them damn Democrats?" Quigley was. "So am I," said Saunders, a strategist for John Edwards , and he whisked Quigley and Hannah away to meet Sen. Jim Webb.

Which left Miss America at the table with a clatch of gossip and society writers. So, awkward question time: How much do you hate it that everyone confuses you with Miss USA in this, her year of scandal?

"It's saddening," Nelson said warmly. "But I look at my year as Miss America as an opportunity to discuss the issues and explain the difference between the two, and how there is no relationship between the two organizations." Guess we weren't the first to ask.

The Washington Nationals Foundation claims developer Franklin Haney is ducking its attempts to serve him with a lawsuit that alleges he reneged on a $400,000 pledge. "He's doing all he can to avoid his day in court," said attorney Geoff Gitner . Haney -- who was bidding to buy the Nats at the time of the pledge but lost to the Lerner family -- has proven elusive to process servers and refused to sign papers sent by first-class mail, Gitner said. Haney's attorney, Larry Blust , said servers left papers at Haney's D.C. penthouse, but that the developer is a legal resident of Florida. "He's not dodging service. To my knowledge so far he hasn't been served." He said Haney "has been very reasonable in his settlement proposals" but would not elaborate.

Slowing Productivity Fogs Broader Outlook (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- U.S. productivity growth rebounded in the fourth quarter of 2006 but still appears to be slowing overall, clouding the outlook for economic growth, inflation and corporate profits in the months ahead.

Nonfarm labor productivity -- a measure of the average worker's output per hour -- rose at an annual rate of 3% in the fourth quarter, bouncing back from an unusual decline of 0.1% in the previous quarter, the Labor Department reported. Growth in labor costs per each unit of output, meanwhile, slowed to an annual rate of 1.7% in the quarter from the third quarter's 3.2%.

Rising productivity means companies are squeezing more output out of their workers. Those gains allow profit margins and wages to grow while minimizing the need to raise prices. That's why increased productivity is the key to higher living standards. Productivity also helps to determine how fast the economy can expand without igniting unwelcome inflation.

Advances in information technology, among other factors, have led to a decadelong surge in the nation's productivity. More recently, however, the surge has shown signs of fatigue.

For 2006 as a whole, nonfarm productivity gains slowed to 2.1% from 2.3% in 2005 and a recent peak of 4.1% in 2002. Economists say last year's productivity growth was probably even weaker, and they expect the revised figure to come in lower when the government issues an update next month. Meanwhile, unit labor costs rose 3.2% last year, up from 2% in 2005 and the biggest increase since 2000.

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.2

So far, slowing productivity growth and rising labor costs haven't crimped corporate profits, but that seems likely to change. Research firm Thomson Financial expects annual earnings growth among companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index to slow to 4.8% in the first quarter of 2007 from 10.6% in the final quarter of 2006. For 2007 as a whole, Thomson expects profits to rise 7.2%, less than half of last year's growth rate.

Whether the productivity growth reprises its fourth-quarter advance or continues its broader slowdown is also a major variable in the outlook for the nation's economic growth and inflation. Slower productivity gains would pressure businesses to raise prices, particularly since the strong labor market is making it harder to restrict workers' pay.

In a speech yesterday, Charles Plosser, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, warned that the recent signs of economic strength mean the Fed may not be done raising interest rates. "Additional monetary-policy action may be needed to keep us moving along the path to price stability," he said.

If productivity picks up, however, businesses may have more flexibility to absorb higher labor or raw-materials costs without raising prices, restraining inflation and lessening the need for higher interest rates.

Separately, the Federal Reserve said consumer-credit growth slowed sharply in December as credit-card and other revolving debt expanded at a slower rate. The nation's consumer credit outstanding rose about $6 billion, or 3%, in December to $2.401 trillion, after an upwardly revised $13.7 billion, or 6.9%, expansion in November.

Credit card and revolving credit grew by $608.9 million in December to $876.2 billion, down from a $9.9 billion expansion in November and the slowest since March, when revolving credit shrank.

For the whole of 2006, consumer credit grew 4.6%, compared with a 4.2% expansion in 2005. Revolving credit grew by 6%, while nonrevolving credit slowed to a 3.8% expansion in 2006.

Nasdaq Bounds; Dow, S& P Up Slightly (USAT)

USA Today, February 8, 2007

NEW YORK — Stocks ended slightly higher Wednesday after a midday retreat spoiled what had been shaping up to be a banner day.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed up 0.56 points at 12,666.87 after an early rally briefly pushed it above 12,700 for the first time. The Standard & Poor's 500 rose just 2.02 points to 1450.02 but still set a 61/4-year high. The Nasdaq composite turned in the day's best performance, rising 19.01 points to 2490.50 following better-than-expected earnings from tech barometer Cisco Systems late Tuesday.

Wall Street's love-hate relationship with falling oil prices continued Wednesday as a drop in crude prices hurt energy stocks, which in turn helped spoil the broader market rally.

Light, sweet crude fell $1.17 to $57.71 a barrel. Al Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards, says the slip in the Dow Wednesday reflects "a normal pause," and a pullback in the energy companies. "The price of oil dropped dramatically, and (oil stocks) tend to be major factors overall," he says. Among major oil companies, ExxonMobil fell 35 cents to $74.79, Chevron lost 73 cents to $72.64, and Schlumberger fell 42 cents to $64.45.

Highlights:

Cisco rallied 81 cents to $28.09 after the networking equipment maker said quarterly earnings rose 41%.

•Whirlpool sank $2.54 to $92.36. The appliance maker said its fourth-quarter earnings fell 14% as it recorded a loss from discontinued operations.

•Intevac jumped $6.23, or nearly 28%, to $28.80 and was the Nasdaq's second-biggest gainer. The maker of equipment used to manufacture disk drives said late Tuesday that its fourth-quarter profit more than doubled.

•Lazard advanced $2.37 to $54.60 after the advisory firm reported a 50% increase in fourth-quarter earnings, thanks to its best merger and acquisition results in six years.

•FEI climbed $7.11, or 28%, to $32.42 and was the Nasdaq's top gainer. The company, which makes microscopes to analyze semiconductors, projected first-quarter results ahead of Wall Street predictions.

•EGL skidded $6.25, or 17%, to $31.64 following news that General Atlantic has withdrawn its backing from a proposed management-led takeover of the freight forwarding company.

•SWS climbed $6.04, or 24%, to $31. After the close Tuesday the financial services firm reported a 59% jump in fiscal second-quarter earnings.

Industrials, Wilshire Near Record Levels (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

The stock market continued its broad march higher, with indexes of small and midsize stocks hitting records as investors continued to celebrate the combination of low interest rates and steady economic growth.

Several indexes, including the Dow Jones Industrial Average and the Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 total-market index, are sitting just short of records, and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index isn't far away.

The Wilshire 5000, which includes nearly all U.S.-based companies, stands just 70 points from the record close it last hit on March 24, 2000: 14751.64. Yesterday, it hit a seven-year high of 14681.86, up 0.24%, or 34.95 points and ahead 3% in 2007.

The blue-chip Dow industrials, less burdened with tech stocks during the long bear market, have hit 27 new records since the start of October. The industrials were virtually unchanged yesterday, up 0.56 point at 12666.87, just short of last Thursday's record 12673.68.

Stocks yesterday were reacting to upbeat quarterly profits from Cisco Systems, as well as news of strong fourth-quarter productivity gains and a fall in oil futures.

More broadly, investors are continuing to show optimism that a "Goldilocks" economy -- not too hot and not too cold -- will generate corporate profits and keep inflation low enough to ward off Federal Reserve interest-rate increases.

Although some analysts warn that stocks are overdue for a pullback, investors have been brushing off that concern.

During the day, the Dow industrials pushed above 12700 for the first time, to 12700.28, but then slumped. The gain was powered by the news that fourth-quarter productivity -- output measured in terms of hours worked -- came in much stronger than expected, while unit labor costs rose less than expected.

It appeared that, after all the records, some short-term traders were cashing in profits once the Dow hit 12700.

Some analysts noted that the $1.17 drop in oil futures to $57.71 a barrel weighed on Dow component Exxon Mobil. But the oil-futures decline, based on a report of strong oil inventories, was good news for most other companies and consumers.

Networking-systems company Cisco jumped 3% on its profit news and its upbeat sales projection for the current quarter, all released late Tuesday.

"Cisco touches a broad swath of tech, so its news affects a wide variety of stocks," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners.

Tech stocks were among the day's big gainers, with the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rising 0.77%, or 19.01 points, to 2490.50. It is up 3.1% so far this year, although it isn't back to its recent six-year high.

After regular trading hours, the market got more positive news: Walt Disney reported better quarterly profits than expected, sending the stock up 1.8% in after-hours trading and potentially helping other entertainment stocks today.

The broad S&P 500 finished at a fresh six-year high, 1450.02. It would have to rise just 5.3% to return to the record 1527.46 hit on March 24, 2000. Yesterday, it rose 0.14%, or 2.02 points, up 2.2% this year.

The resurgent Russell 2000 small-stock index jumped 0.71%, or 5.79 points, to a record 816.20, up 3.6% in 2007. The S&P's index of middle-sized stocks rose 0.39%, or 3.31 points, to a record 850.55.

The Dow Jones Utility Average also hit a record, at 469.80. The Dow Jones Transportation Average, at 4979.84, was short of Friday's record 5006.89.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.33%, or 0.81 point, to a record 249.43.

In the U.S., bonds gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.745%. The 30-year bond was up 9/32 to yield 4.852%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 120.61 yen, up from 120.12, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.3011 from $1.2981.

Developing Nations Poised To Challenge USA As King Of The Hill (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, February 8, 2007

Globalization long has been regarded as a made-in-America phenomenon, driven by Silicon Valley's technology, Hollywood's movies and Wall Street's cash. But suddenly, countries formerly on the periphery of world events seem poised to challenge American dominance of this age of global integration.

DOJ_NMG_0129415

It's not only that developing countries are proving to be white-hot investment opportunities, though they are: the Morgan Stanley Emerging Markets index gained 242% the past four years. It's also that emerging markets, once known dismissively as the Third World, are now central to Americans' lives.

Not long ago, these countries were of interest only to the Peace Corps. Now, everything from the financial lifeline that makes possible the modern American lifestyle to the identity of your next boss, customer, competitor or cultural trendsetter likely can be found in the developing world.

"We're in the middle of the biggest shift in 200 years — since the Industrial Revolution. It's really that big," said Antoine van Agtmael, the investment manager credited with coining the term "emerging markets" in 1981.

The new prominence of emerging markets represents a sharp departure from the flurry of financial crises that tore through Mexico, Asia and Russia in the 1990s. Since then, scores of developing countries have cleaned up their balance sheets, slashed inflation rates and accumulated enormous stockpiles of hard-currency reserves. China alone sits atop a $1 trillion mountain of cash. Russia, Mexico, India and South Korea also are swiftly building their cash hoards, according to Treasury Department data.

Developing nations have gone from beggar to banker. The U.S. must borrow enormous sums each day to finance the gap between its anemic national savings rate and its consumption. Increasingly, those funds — largely raised by selling Treasury securities — come from poorer nations.

Through November, the most recent data available, more than 29% of the $806 billion in net securities purchases came from developing countries compared with just 5% in 1998, according to Bank of America. The river of capital flowing into the U.S. economy enables Americans to continue consuming beyond their means. But some analysts find it worrisome that the world's wealthiest nation now depends on loans from some of the globe's poorest countries.

"The average American doesn't realize where this liquidity comes from. Capital is supposed to flow from rich to the poor," says Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist for Bank of America.

For the USA, the danger is that an unexpected development could cause emerging nations to retrench on purchases of dollar-denominated assets. What could trigger such a pullback? A sustained oil price decline that pinches Middle Eastern oil producers, a global economic slump or an outbreak of protectionism in the USA, says Quinlan.

For more than half a century, Americans could take for granted that the world economy would orbit around them. No longer. The USA today produces about 30% of world output at market prices. That figure already is down significantly from about 46% in the aftermath of World War II, when European and Japanese factories lay in ruins. And it is headed lower still as China and India continue their ascent.

Over the next generation, fast-growing developing nations are expected to see a significant uptick in their share of world output from 23% today to about 33% in 2030, according to a recent World Bank study.

That shift has enormous consequences for Corporate America. "The change is from globalization going one way to globalization going every way. It's as much about what developing countries are doing as developed countries," said Mark Foster, a London-based Accenture consultant.

Assuming continued economic growth in the developing world, the ranks of the global middle class are expected to triple by 2030 to 1.2 billion, according to the World Bank. Today, a bit more than half of that free-spending group resides in developing countries. By 2030, almost all of it, 92%, will call the developing world home.

For multinational corporations, that means paying ever more attention to what's happening outside the United States and especially in Asia, Latin America, parts of the Middle East and Africa. Procter & Gamble CEO A.G. Lafley said in a Jan. 30 conference call that in the past several years, the company has "added about 1 billion consumers" to the ranks of those who have ever used or purchased its products. "We think we can add another 1 billion consumers over the next three to five years, and most of them are going to come from developing markets," Lafley added.

In the most recent quarter, P&G's developing-country sales outpaced its overall 8% sales growth. Examples: Sales of Crest toothpaste rose more than 10% in Russia, while Duracell batteries posted a 20% gain in Latin America.

Likewise, at PepsiCo, two-thirds of revenue growth is coming from the company's international operations and 60% of that from emerging markets, says Michael White, chief executive of PepsiCo International. "We've seen a real, material change in the performance of our emerging markets, and I expect it to continue," White told a recent panel at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Those aren't isolated examples. FedEx, Manpower and Caterpillar all report impressive growth in their developing-world business. By 2010, GE wants emerging markets to account for 30% of its sales, twice the current level. "America is realizing for the first time that globalization is a two-way traffic," says Azim Premji, the billionaire chairman of Indian software firm Wipro.

As the developing world's purchasing power grows, it is likely to exercise greater influence over global tastes. To date, U.S. brands such as McDonald's, Nike or Apple mesmerize overseas consumers. By 2030, when the World Bank estimates that the number of middle-class consumers in China will exceed the entire U.S. population, Americans might be on the receiving end of as many trends as they start. Zhang Yimou, not Clint Eastwood, might direct the world's most-popular movies. Fast-food dumplings might rival burgers and fries. "New fashions, new trends … are just as likely, indeed more likely, to start in China and India or Brazil as they are today (to start) in Europe or the United States," says Uri Dadush, director of the World Bank's international trade department.

That's in the future. But already, Americans are being affected by the rise of multinational corporations based in the developing world. Once regarded as second-tier manufacturers of shoddy goods, companies in the most mature developing countries are making their presence felt by acquiring companies in the developed world. From computer research centers in North Carolina to steel mills in Oklahoma, American workers are finding their new boss often hails from far, far away.

Among the best-known acquisitions: Chinese computer maker Lenovo's 2005 purchase of IBM's personal computer business. But there have been plenty of other deals.

Last month, Mexican bank Banorte bought UniTeller, a U.S.-based remittances company. That deal came two months after Banorte snapped up INB Financial of McAllen, Texas. Russia's Evraz coal and steel producer in January completed its takeover of Oregon Steel Mills of Portland, Ore. And in June, Brazil's Gerdau Group acquired Sheffield Steel of Sand Springs, Okla. European companies, too, are in the cross hairs: India's Tata Steel earlier this month purchased London-based Corus.

The dealmaking is among the first visible signs of the growing clout of emerging-market multinationals. In his new book, The Emerging Markets Century, van Agtmael profiles 25 companies — such as Mexican cement maker Cemex, whose U.S. operations produce more cement in the USA than any other company, and Indian generic-drug maker Ranbaxy — that qualify as genuine global powers.

To many Americans, the notion of innovative, market-leading companies based in areas where widespread poverty and disease still hold sway might seem extraordinary. But van Agtmael notes that, in fact, it was the Western world's 20th-century economic dominance that was unusual.

For centuries, trade and commerce were rooted, not in the USA or Europe, but in more distant parts of the globe. In 1820, for example, today's "developing" countries were the acknowledged economic powers, accounting for 68% of the world economy, according to economic historian Angus Maddison. As late as 1870, the Chinese economy was almost twice as large as that of the United States.

Viewed from this vantage point, the contemporary emergence of countries such as China or Brazil represents less a new phenomenon than a reversion to history's norm.

"We still hold onto notions that are dear to us but wrong," says van Agtmael. "We will not always be the center of the world."

Wal-Mart And A Union Unite, At Least On Health Policy (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro And Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

They have established one of the fiercest rivalries in the American economy, attacking one another's organizations through dueling blogs, newspaper advertisements and news conferences.

But this morning, in an extraordinary meeting in Washington, the chiefs of Wal-Mart Stores and the Service Employees International Union stood together and agreed on a series of goals for achieving universal health coverage, according to people briefed on the matter.

The meeting between H. Lee Scott Jr., the chief executive of Wal-Mart, and Andrew L. Stern, president of the S.E.I.U., which capped months of secret conversations, could be the beginning, however tentative, of a détente between the nation's largest employer and its labor critics.

At least on one issue. But the issue — providing affordable health insurance — is arguably the biggest facing both Mr. Stern and Mr. Scott. Wal-Mart, which insures fewer than half its workers, has identified health care as potentially the biggest vulnerability to its image and business, and the S.E.I.U., one of the country's biggest unions, has called it the No. 1 priority for its members.

So during today's meeting, Mr. Stern and Mr. Scott announced a campaign to seek public acceptance of several principles of health policy. One goal is universal health coverage by a specific date, somewhere around 2012. Another is the idea of shared responsibility, emphasizing that individuals, businesses and government all play roles in financing health care and expanding coverage.

Executives from AT&T, Intel and several nonprofit organizations also participated in today's meeting.

The agreement is unlikely to end the rancor between Wal-Mart and unions, largely because the retailer's fiercest critic is the United Food and Commercial Workers, the union behind WakeUpWalMart.com.

DOJ_NMG_0129417

In a statement, WakeUpWalMart.com divulged last night for the first time that it had met with a Wal-Mart executive in December to discuss the company's health insurance, among other things, but decided the retailer was not serious about significantly improving its benefits.

"No one, in good conscience or without a real commitment from Wal-Mart to make substantive changes," the statement said, "could look the other way and ignore the awful fact that Wal-Mart still fails to provide company health care to over half of its employees."

Mr. Stern is likely to keep criticizing Wal-Mart on several fronts, according to people who work with him who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to talk publicly.

But the fact that Mr. Scott and Mr. Stern are speaking, let alone agreeing on something, is somewhat surprising.

In 2004, Mr. Stern authorized the creation of an S.E.I.U.-backed group, called Wal-Mart Watch, that has relentlessly criticized the retailer, leaked internal company documents to the news media and pressed it to change its labor policies.

Mr. Scott, in turn, has lashed out at union-backed critics like the S.E.I.U. and Wal-Mart Watch, calling them special-interest groups spreading misinformation and half-truths about the chain.

But in July, the icy relationship between the men began to thaw after Mr. Stern wrote an op-ed article encouraging large corporations to work with unions to create alternatives to the employer-based health coverage system, which he said was collapsing. Mr. Stern sent the article, by certified mail, to hundreds of chief executives seeking their help.

Mr. Scott, who has already expanded Wal-Mart's health care benefits, responded, beginning a confidential series of conversations that culminated in today's news conference.

Harley Shaiken, a professor specializing in labor issues at the University of California, Berkeley, said the meeting represented "a combination of pragmatism, idealism and desperation on the part of Wal-Mart and S.E.I.U; health care has become a devastating issue for both."

But Mr. Shaiken said that with Wal-Mart's reputation for fighting unionization and Mr. Stern's advocacy for the labor movement, the pair are unlikely to become the best of friends. Wal-Mart is not unionized in United States.

"Lee Scott is willing to sit in the same room with Andy Stern," Mr. Shaiken said, "he just doesn't want to sit across a bargaining table from Andy Stern."

Wal-Mart Calls For Change In Health Care (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, February 8, 2007

More businesses called for change in the health care system Wednesday when Wal-Mart, Intel, AT&T and Kelly Services joined with the leader of a large labor union in calling for "quality, affordable" health insurance for all Americans.

The groups did not offer details of how to change the system, laying out instead four broad principles: Every person must have insurance; businesses, government and individuals must help pay for it; people have a responsibility to maintain their health; and the health system must become more efficient.

The announcement, made in Washington where health policy issues have regained prominence after a long lull, brought together Wal-Mart CEO Lee Scott and Wal-Mart critic Andrew Stern, head of the Service Employees International Union.

That the two found agreement — even on broad principles — across quite a divide can't be ignored, says Len Nichols, a health economist at the New America Foundation.

"What Scott's reach does is give Republican moderates cover to do what they need to do, and Stern's reach gives moderate Democrats cover to meet the Republicans halfway and solve the problem in a way both can live with," Nichols said.

The groups said they would call for members to engage other business leaders, convene a national summit by the end of May and launch education efforts aimed at workers and customers.

While Stern signed on to the principles, the other major union that has been critical of Wal-Mart did not. The giant retailer has come under criticism by both unions over health insurance plans the groups say leave too many Wal-Mart workers uninsured.

Last month, Wal-Mart issued a report saying 47.4% of its employees were covered by its insurance. An additional 43%, the company said, got insurance elsewhere, such as through a spouse or parent.

But union critics say Wal-Mart should do more to cover its own workers. "If Wal-Mart is truly serious about universal health care, we challenge the company to provide universal health care to all of its uninsured employees and their families today," said Paul Blank, campaign director for WakeUpWalMart.com in a written statement.

Blank's group is funded by the United Food and Commercial Workers, which did not participate in Wednesday's press conference.

DOJ_NMG_0129418

Stern said he joined Wal-Mart and the other employers because America's health care system requires fundamental change.

"It's time to admit the employer-based health care system is dead," Stern said, according to the Associated Press.

Last month, Stern's group paired with AARP, an advocacy group for people over 50, and the Business Roundtable to urge Congress to take action to resolve health care and financial security issues.

The group said it believes all Americans "should have access to affordable health care."

Wal-Mart Joins Health-Care Call (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, February 8, 2007

An unlikely coalition of business and labor, including Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and the nation's biggest union, which has persistently criticized the retailer, called for affordable health coverage for all Americans by 2012, but offered no specifics on how to achieve the goal.

Yesterday's announcement in Washington united Wal-Mart Chief Executive H. Lee Scott and Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, who has criticized the Bentonville, Ark., retailer's pay and benefit policies. The inclusion of Wal-Mart, the nation's largest private employer and an industry bellwether, in any push to overhaul health care is significant.

"Our current system hurts America's competitiveness and leaves too many people uninsured," said Mr. Scott, who responded to Mr. Stern's invitation last year in letters to CEOs of every Fortune 500 company to revamp health care. "We put aside disagreements to drive this debate forward."

The campaign -- which is also supported by AT&T Inc., Intel Corp., staffing firm Kelly Services Inc., the Communications Workers of America and three public-policy groups -- comes amid a surge of interest in how to extend health insurance to the 46 million Americans without it. In recent weeks, proposals have come from the White House, Capitol Hill, the presidential campaign trail and a coalition of business, health and insurance groups. In some cases, parties that disagree on other issues have found common ground on health care.

While there is interest in doing something about the uninsured, consensus is lacking on what should be done, how much money to spend and how many Americans to try to cover. The new partnership offers no solution, only general goals, such as that individuals, business and government "all should contribute to managing and financing a new American health- care system." Wal-Mart remained noncommittal yesterday as to who should take the lead. "We have to work together -- business, labor, government and our communities," Mr. Scott said.

Members of the group, who met with lawmakers on Capitol Hill after the announcement, said they would recruit other business and labor and civic leaders to join the campaign, convene a national summit of the membership by the end of May, lobby national, state and local elected officials and launch initiatives to educate workers on health-care issues.

NEW PLAN

Principles of the "Better Health Care Together" campaign:

1. We believe every person in America must have quality, affordable health insurance coverage;

2. We believe individuals have a responsibility to maintain and protect their health;

3. We believe that America must dramatically improve the value it receives for every health care dollar; and,

4. We believe that businesses, governments, and individuals all should contribute to managing and financing a new American health care system.

Commenting on the new partnership, Sen. Ron Wyden, (D., Ore.), who has introduced legislation for a universal health-care plan, said, "Today, more employers and labor representatives are sending the message that our nation's health-care system is broken, and if we don't fix it, it will die under its own weight."

Several experts said it is hard to gauge the partnership's effect. "I'm skeptical that they at this point agree on anything other than broad general principles," said William Custer, an economist and professor of health administration at Georgia State University. "I do think it's going to have an effect because it's another fairly weighty voice entering the debate and pushing for something to be done."

Some labor experts suggested that at least part of Wal-Mart's motivation lay in an effort to deflect criticism from its own practices. "I would say probably half the announcement is public relations," said Gary Chaison, a professor of industrial relations at Clark University in Worcester, Mass.

Sarah Clark, a Wal-Mart spokeswoman, said the company didn't join the partnership to buff its image. "This is about engaging leaders at all levels to bring about real and meaningful change to the health-care system," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0129419

Wal-Mart said it recently made progress in health care, though critics say the factors behind the gains don't favor workers with above-average health-care needs. In January, Wal-Mart reported that 47.4% of its U.S. workers had enrolled in its health-benefits plans, up from 46% the previous year. The national average percentage of retail workers enrolled in company-sponsored health-benefits plans is 43%, according to the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation.

It was clear that Mr. Stern, who has been criticized within the labor movement for sometimes being too willing to collaborate with business, will need to walk a fine line while working with Wal-Mart.

Yesterday Mr. Stern, who is a board member of Wal-Mart Watch, an activist group backed by the SEIU, said the group would continue to draw attention to Wal-Mart's practices. "I think our members and most Americans expect us to stand up as an organization for people that work, and we will continue to do so," he said.

David Nassar, Wal-Mart Watch's executive director, issued a statement that both praised Wal-Mart but also criticized its current health-care plan, saying the retailer's "unaffordable plan" is part of the nation's health-care problem.

The partnership isn't likely to silence Wal-Mart critics. One of them, WakeUpWalMart.com, which is funded by the United Food and Commercial Workers union, called Wal-Mart's support for universal health coverage "disingenuous."

The group released a statement that also carried an implicit criticism of Mr. Stern: "What is surprising is how anyone, in good conscience, would give Wal-Mart a stage to make empty statements that will not give health care to one more uninsured Wal-Mart worker."

Wal-Mart, Union Join Forces On Health Care (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui And Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Two once-implacable foes in the business world found common ground yesterday, at least for a few minutes, as they publicly pledged to work together for the first time to fix what they called the nation's health-care crisis by 2012.

At a news conference on Capitol Hill, Wal-Mart chief executive H. Lee Scott sat at one end of a table and vowed to put aside differences to "drive this debate forward." On the other end was Andy Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) and frequent Wal-Mart critic, declaring he had made a "tough choice" in the goal to improve coverage.

How this unlikely alliance came about illustrates the deepening concern that businesses, labor groups and lawmakers have over skyrocketing health-care costs. The issue has divided the nation's largest retailer and the SEIU, which founded a group called Wal-Mart Watch that has harshly criticized the company's wages and benefits. But yesterday they said they could come together under the broad umbrella of universal health care. And each realized it could not be achieved without the other's help.

"That's what makes it powerful," Stern said in a phone interview. "It's risky, and it's right."

Wal-Mart used to be noticeable for its absence from business coalitions calling for government help with the health-care crisis. As the rising cost of employee medical care staggered other large companies, Wal-Mart, which did not provide health coverage for the majority of its employees, was silent. But during a national crisis over the growing ranks of uninsured workers, Wal-Mart quickly became a target.

The barrage of criticism over the past two years by the SEIU's Wal-Mart Watch and another group, Wake-Up Wal-Mart, backed by the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, has frequently put the retailer in the hot seat. Maryland's Fair Share Health Care legislation, nicknamed the "Wal-Mart bill," was crafted with input from the unions and required large companies to spend part of their payroll on health coverage or contribute to a state fund for the poor, giving rise to similar initiatives in more than two dozen states even though the law was eventually struck down. The union groups have galvanized political and grass-roots opposition to Wal-Mart through bus tours and nationwide conference calls.

The dispute left Wal-Mart increasingly isolated, particularly as it tried to move into urban areas critical to its growth. Public outrage from Southern California to the East Coast prompted local and state governments to block the company from planting superstores in one metropolitan area after another.

"Wal-Mart has actually been defeated in metropolitan America," said labor historian Nelson Lichtenstein of the University of California at Santa Barbara. "It makes a lot of business sense for them to try to get health care off the table."

Change began in 2005 after Wal-Mart created a health-care plan with premiums of $11 per month. In a speech to the National Governors Association a year ago, Scott announced other major concessions, including reducing the eligibility requirement for part-time employees from two years to one and adding coverage for their children. But he also wanted help from government leaders and other groups to make substantive changes to the country's health policies.

The speech caught Stern's attention. He was also impressed by Wal-Mart's efforts in environmental sustainability, in which it had worked with activist groups such as the Rocky Mountain Institute and TransFair USA. He took it as a sign the retailer was committed to changing not just its reputation but its practices.

"This was a company that was willing to create partnerships with people they might not normally agree with," Stern said. "It's always important to me that people don't just say things, they do things."

In his 2006 book, "A Country That Works," Stern wrote admiringly of how Dennis Rivera, president of the New York City Health Care Workers Union 1199, "taught us a great deal about how to tango" when he sent his members to join hospital operators in persuading the New York state legislature to raise insurance reimbursement rates. While the hospitals' pleas were viewed as self-serving, the workers won over lawmakers. Those billions of dollars of reimbursements found their way into better wages and "the gold standard of benefits for the hospital workers," Stern wrote.

In July, he wrote an opinion article in the Wall Street Journal declaring the death of employer-based health coverage and urging businesses to look for new solutions. Stern followed up with a letter to each head of a Fortune 500 company. Over the next few months, he received responses from many of them. By December, he was in discreet talks with Wal-Mart on ways they could reach a consensus on the problem of health care, if nothing else.

"We've disagreed on many issues in the past, and I'm sure we will disagree on others going forward," Sarah Clark, a spokeswoman for Wal-Mart, said yesterday. "However, resolving America's health-care crisis is so important to this country that we're willing to put aside our differences and work together."

In addition to Wal-Mart and the SEIU, the coalition announced yesterday includes other groups that historically have been at odds: AT&T, Intel, the Communications Workers of America, the Howard H. Baker Jr. Center for the Public Policy and Kelly Services. The coalition issued a statement decrying the state of the nation's health-care system and outlining four principles for an alternative, including ensuring that everyone has quality and affordable coverage.

But not everyone is convinced the coalition will be effective. Gerald M. Shea, the AFL-CIO's head of health policy, said he was concerned about the lack of detail in the coalition's plans.

"Their public positioning campaign is one thing. What they do is another," he said. "They want a solution by 2012 -- that's too far away from our point of view. What are you ready to do now?"

The UFCW had met with a Wal-Mart executive in December to discuss health care but decided the company was not taking enough steps to significantly improve its employee coverage. And it came out swinging again yesterday, with members handing out fliers from Wake-Up Wal-Mart denouncing the company at the news conference.

"Why Wal-Mart would want to look for a partner to cover up its health-care crisis is obvious," said Paul Blank, director of Wake-Up Wal-Mart. "But why anybody would decide to give a disingenuous player that stage is unconscionable."

Stern said the SEIU's Wal-Mart Watch will continue to speak out against the retailer as it sees fit. But now he has his eyes on bigger fish. The coalition spent the afternoon making rounds at Congress, stopping at the offices of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), among others.

"We're way past the question, 'Can an employer solve this problem?' " he said. "We're at a point where the country has to solve the problem."

Wal-Mart, Unions Unite On Health Care (WP/AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Executives from Wal-Mart and three other large U.S. employers on Wednesday joined union leaders in calling for "quality, affordable" health care for every American by 2012.

However, they did not propose any specific policies to achieve this goal, or commit to spending any extra money in the near-term to provide health coverage to more workers.

Joining Wal-Mart Stores Inc. CEO Lee Scott and Service Employees International Union leader Andrew Stern at a Washington press conference were top executives from Intel Corp., AT&T Inc. and Kelly Services Inc., a temporary staffing agency. Yet some critics of Wal-Mart's health care policy remained unsatisfied.

"2012 is a still long way away. What about now?" said Dana Rezaie, a widow with three children who works nights stocking shelves at a Wal-Mart store in Fridley, Minn.

The partnership of business and union leaders laid out four main goals, including universal health-care coverage for all Americans and boosting the value of every U.S. dollar spent on health care. The business and union leaders' coalition, dubbed "Better Health Care Together," pledged to convene a national summit by the end of May to recruit others from the private sector, labor, government and non-profits.

"Government alone won't and can't solve this crisis," Scott said. "By following this campaign's common sense principles, we believe America can have high quality, affordable and accessible health care by 2012."

DOJ_NMG_0129421

But Scott and others did not provide a detailed plan. In response to a reporter's question, Scott said Wal-Mart is not committed to spending more on health care or making any immediate promises to provide health coverage to more workers.

The business executives did say that any universal coverage in the U.S. must be flexible enough to give consumers choices about their coverage, unlike plans in some foreign nations.

Stern said the SEIU would continue to fund its Wal-Mart Watch campaign, which as recently as last month said Wal-Mart's health plans were a raw deal for employees. Stern said he expects to be criticized for teaming up with Wal-Mart, but that he felt it was in the best interest of workers who lack coverage, and their families.

Stern said he and Scott first met face-to-face to discuss the partnership "around the holidays."

Joseph T. Hansen, president of the United Food and Commercial Workers union, was critical of other union leaders for teaming up with Wal-Mart.

"It's not appropriate to take the stage with a company that refuses to remedy its mistreatment of workers," Hansen said in a prepared statement. The union he represents funds the WakeUpWalMart campaign, which challenged the company to immediately provide health care to all of its uninsured employees and their families.

The Bentonville, Ark.-based company, which employs more than 1.3 million U.S. workers, has made several changes to its health care policy since 2005, including lowering premiums and shortening eligibility periods.

Yet Scott said Wednesday he would not withhold financial support from lawmakers and candidates who oppose universal health care. WakeUpWalMart spokesman Chris Kofinis called that stance "hypocritical," pointing out that Scott blamed politics as the main reason the nation lacked universal health care.

"Anybody can say they support something. They need to show they really do," said Rezaie, a six-year Wal-Mart employee who says she cannot afford the company's existing health plan and instead relies on state-funded care. WakeUpWalMart supplied Rezaie's name to The Associated Press.

Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a longtime universal health care advocate, said the coalition's announcement was further evidence of broad agreement on the issue.

Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, which studies health policy, was more sanguine. "This is a historic collection of strange bedfellows that have united behind a set of principles, not a concrete plan," Altman said.

John Podesta, president of the Center for American Progress, a member of the coalition, said business and union leaders already plan to meet with officials at the White House, on Capitol Hill and with state governors to transform its principles into action.

Shares of Wal-Mart closed unchanged at $48.58, while AT&T slid 35 cents to end at $37.16, both on the New York Stock Exchange. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, shares of Intel gained 20 cents to finish at $21.51, while those of Kelly Services rose 24 cents to $31.24.

In GOP Presidential Race, McCain Slips; Giuliani Gains Luster (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON

In polls, the top two contenders for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination have long been Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

But pundits have tended to discount Mr. Giuliani's chances, given his liberal stands on social issues such as abortion and gay rights. Now, a combination of factors is forcing a new look at both Senator McCain's vulnerabilities, particularly over his steadfast support for an unpopular Iraq war, and Giuliani's potential to overcome weaknesses.

For the first time since October 1999, McCain's favorability rating among American voters has dropped below 50 percent. A Gallup poll taken last month showed him at 48 percent, down 6 points from November, and down from a high of 67 percent in February 2000. Giuliani, in contrast, has held above 60 percent favorability in Gallup polls, most recently at 62 percent. Now that Giuliani has signaled a serious intention to run, stating on Monday "I'm in this to win" as he filed papers with the Federal Election Commission, the comparisons grow in importance.

For Giuliani, winning over enough of the conservative Republican base to secure the nomination has long been seen as a potentially insurmountable task. But now, analysts say, it's possible that Republican-leaning independents could make the difference in the early GOP primaries.

"I tend to think if Giuliani catches fire, he could win" even the South Carolina primary, says Dick Bennett, a nonpartisan pollster based in New Hampshire, who has been polling in early nominating states. The key is that South Carolina has an open primary, meaning that independents can vote.

DOJ_NMG_0129422

In an interview with Fox News on Monday, Giuliani stood by his support for abortion and gay rights, but not gay marriage. He said he would nominate Supreme Court justices similar to those President Bush selected, meaning Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

For Giuliani, the appeal to a broad swath of Republican primary voters would be centered on the leadership aura he gained from his post-9/11 performance as mayor of New York.

In a head-to-head matchup against McCain in a Gallup poll of Republicans and Republican "leaners" taken Jan. 25-28, Giuliani beat the Arizona senator handily in most categories: better public speaker, more likable, better chance of beating the Democratic nominee, would run a more positive campaign, would perform better in debates, would do more to unite the country, would manage the country more effectively, would be better in a crisis, better understands the problems faced by ordinary Americans, and strength of leadership.

McCain beat Giuliani handily in only three categories: more qualified to be president, higher ethical standards, and would work better with Congress.

But with 11 months to go before the Iowa caucuses, the first nominating contest, analysts caution against reading too much into polls. Most voters have not given much thought to the choices. And many are unaware of the facts. Gallup found in early January that 16 percent of Republican primary voters believe Giuliani is "pro-life;" 64 percent are unsure.

Still, the early polling is crucial to candidates' ability to attract funding, top staff, and media attention. Now that Giuliani has declared he's in, he will face a higher level of scrutiny than in the past. He is also just now beginning to put together the infrastructure of his campaign, something McCain has been working on for months and years.

Despite Giuliani's slow start, he now regularly beats McCain in head-to-head matchups. Gallup in early January had Giuliani beating McCain 50 to 42 among Republican primary voters.

The problem for McCain is that he has lost some of his luster as the "maverick" who nearly felled the party favorite for the GOP nomination eight years ago, then-Texas Gov. George Bush. That is hurting him in particular among independents, says Mr. Bennett. The problem is Iraq.

"They view McCain and Bush in the Iraq situation together," he says. In New Hampshire, "there's no excitement for him [McCain]... And I hear from people who are with McCain, 'I wonder if I made a mistake.' "

Giuliani holds a similar position on Iraq, supporting Bush's decision to send additional US troops there, but as an outside-the-Beltway figure, he is not lashed to the future of the war the way McCain is.

Regardless of who wins the GOP nomination, Iraq could be central to his chances in the general election.

"What happens in Iraq will determine whether Republicans have a very steep uphill fight or a fighting chance," says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "Even though both McCain and Giuliani have roughly the same position, McCain's is so much better known and integrated into his persona than is Giuliani's. I think that's what's taken some of the air out of his balloon."

For McCain, too, conservative skepticism toward him over his support for campaign-finance reform and lack of reliability on tax cuts has never disappeared. McCain is also still working to address longstanding animosity from some Evangelicals. So it may be a combination of factors hurting McCain, analysts say.

"Is it that Republicans are saying to themselves, 'McCain is too close to this unpopular president and this unpopular war'?" says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. "Or are they saying, 'I never liked McCain, I can't swallow him, he has too many problems, like age and temper, and I've always liked Giuliani'? I think it's a bit of everything."

"It's very revealing – the intensity of anti-McCain sentiment out there among Republicans," Mr. Sabato adds. "I encounter it whenever I give a talk."

Mormon Candidate Braces For Religion As Issue (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — As he begins campaigning for the Republican presidential nomination, Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, is facing a threshold issue: Will his religion — he is a Mormon — be a big obstacle to winning the White House?

Polls show a substantial number of Americans will not vote for a Mormon for president. The religion is viewed with suspicion by Christian conservatives, a vital part of the Republicans' primary base.

Mr. Romney's advisers acknowledged that popular misconceptions about Mormonism — as well as questions about whether Mormons are beholden to their church's leaders on public policy — could give his opponents ammunition in the wide-open fight among Republicans to become the consensus candidate of social conservatives.

DOJ_NMG_0129423

Mr. Romney, in an extended interview on the subject as he drove through South Carolina last week, expressed confidence that he could quell concerns about his faith, pointing to his own experience winning in Massachusetts. He said he shared with many Americans the bafflement over obsolete Mormon practices like polygamy — he described it as "bizarre" — and disputed the argument that his faith would require him to be loyal to his church before his country.

"People have interest early on in your religion and any similar element of your background," he said. "But as soon as they begin to watch you on TV and see the debates and hear you talking about issues, they are overwhelmingly concerned with your vision of the future and the leadership skills that you can bring to bear."

Still, Mr. Romney is taking no chances. He has set up a meeting this month in Florida with 100 ministers and religious broadcasters. That gathering follows what was by all accounts a successful meeting at his home last fall with evangelical leaders, including the Rev. Jerry Falwell; the Rev. Franklin Graham, who is a son of the Rev. Billy Graham; and Paula White, a popular preacher.

Mr. Romney said he was giving strong consideration to a public address about his faith and political views, modeled after the one John F. Kennedy gave in 1960 in the face of a wave of concern about his being a Roman Catholic.

Mr. Romney's aides said he had closely studied Kennedy's speech in trying to measure how to navigate the task of becoming the nation's first Mormon president, and he has consulted other Mormon elected leaders, including Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, about how to proceed.

Mr. Romney appears to be making some headway. Several prominent evangelical leaders said that, after meeting him, they had grown sufficiently comfortable with the notion of Mr. Romney as president to overcome any concerns they might have about his religion.

On a pragmatic level, some said that Mr. Romney — despite questions among conservatives about his shifting views on abortion and gay rights — struck them as the Republican candidate best able to win and carry their social conservative agenda to the White House.

"There's this growing acceptance of this idea that Mitt Romney may well be and is our best candidate," said Jay Sekulow, the chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, a conservative legal advocacy group, and a prominent host on Christian radio.

Mark DeMoss, an evangelical public relations consultant who represents many conservative Christian groups, said it was "more important to me that a candidate shares my values than my faith," adding, "And if I look at it this way, Mr. Romney would be my top choice."

Mormons consider themselves to be Christians, but some beliefs central to Mormons are regarded by other churches as heretical. For example, Mormons have three books of Scripture other than the Bible, including the Book of Mormon, which Mormons believe was translated from golden plates discovered in 1827 by Joseph Smith Jr., the church's founder and first prophet.

Mormons believe that Smith rescued Christianity from apostasy and restored the church to what was envisioned in the New Testament — but these doctrines are beyond the pale for most Christian churches.

Beyond that, there are perceptions among some people regarding the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, as the church is formally known, that account for at least some of the public unease: that Mormons still practice polygamy (the church renounced polygamy in 1890), that it is more of a cult than a religion and that its members take political direction from the church's leaders.

Several Republicans said such perceptions could be a problem for Mr. Romney, especially in the South, which has had a disproportionate influence in selecting Republican presidential nominees.

Gloria A. Haskins, a state representative from South Carolina who is supporting Senator John McCain for the Republican nomination, said discussions with her constituents in Greenville, an evangelical stronghold, convinced her that a Mormon like Mr. Romney could not win a Republican primary in her state. South Carolina has one of the earliest, and most critical, primaries next year.

"From what I hear in my district, it is very doubtful," Ms. Haskins said. "This is South Carolina. We're very mainstream, evangelical, Christian, conservative. It will come up. In this of all states, it will come up."

But Katon Dawson, the state Republican chairman, said he thought Mr. Romney had made significant progress in dealing with those concerns. "I have heard him on his personal faith and on his character and conviction and the love for his country," Mr. Dawson said. "I have all confidence that he will be able to answer those questions, whether they be in negative ads against him or in forums or in debates."

DOJ_NMG_0129424

Mr. Romney's candidacy has stirred discussion about faith and the White House unlike any since Kennedy, including a remarkable debate that unfolded recently in The New Republic. Damon Linker, a critic of the influence of Christian conservatism on politics, described Mormonism as a "theologically unstable, and thus politically perilous, religion."

The article brought a stinging rebuttal in the same publication from Richard Lyman Bushman, a Mormon who is a history professor at Columbia University, and who said Mr. Linker's arguments had "no grounding in reality."

Mr. Romney is not the first Mormon to seek a presidential nomination, but by every indication he has the best chance yet of being in the general election next year. His father, George Romney, was a candidate in 1968, but his campaign collapsed before he ever had to deal seriously with questions about religion.

Senator Hatch said his own candidacy in 2000, which was something of a long shot, was to "knock down prejudice against my faith."

"There's a lot of prejudice out there," Mr. Hatch said. "We've come a long way, but there are still many people around the country who consider the Mormon faith a cult."

But if Mr. Romney has made progress with evangelicals, he appears to face a larger challenge in dispelling apprehensions among the public at large. A national poll by The Los Angeles Times and Bloomberg News last June found 37 percent said they would not vote for a Mormon for president.

Mr. Romney offered assurances that seemed to reflect what Kennedy told the nation in discussing his Catholicism some 50 years ago. Mr. Romney said the requirements of his faith would never overcome his political obligations. He pointed out that in Massachusetts, he had signed laws allowing stores to sell alcohol on Sundays, even though he was prohibited by his faith from drinking, and to expand the state lottery, though Mormons are forbidden to gamble. He also noted that Mormons are not exclusively Republicans, pointing to Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic majority leader.

"There's no church-directed view," Mr. Romney said. "How can you have Harry Reid on one side and Orrin Hatch on the other without recognizing that the church doesn't direct political views? I very clearly subscribe to Abraham Lincoln's view of America's political religion. And that is when you take the oath of office, your responsibility is to the nation, and that is first and foremost."

He said he was not concerned about the resistance in the polls. "If you did a poll and said: 'Could a divorced actor be elected as president? Would you vote for a divorced actor as president?' my guess is 70 percent would say no. But then they saw Ronald Reagan. They heard him. They heard his vision. They heard his experience. They said: 'I like Ronald Reagan. I'm voting for him.' "

Romney's About-face On Campaign Funding (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 8, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who strongly criticized campaign-finance regulations in a private meeting with House conservatives last week, once touted dramatic restructuring measures such as taxing political contributions and placing spending limits on federal campaigns.

Romney's past positions on campaign-finance regulation, anathema to many social conservatives who believe such rules place unconstitutional limits on free speech, could complicate his ongoing efforts to court conservative leaders.

Romney already has had to explain his past support for abortion rights, another volatile issue among conservatives. At a private meeting with conservative House Republicans in Baltimore Friday, Romney devoted much of his time to explaining how his stance on abortion has evolved, said a conservative who attended.

While several Republicans who attended the Republican Study Committee (RSC) retreat greeted Romney's remarks on abortion with skepticism, his condemnation of changes to campaign-finance rules struck a positive chord with the entire audience. Romney specifically criticized the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act sponsored by his rival for the GOP presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

"Referring to the bill, [Romney] called it 'one of the worst things in my lifetime,'" one conservative Republican said. "The place erupted. That was by far the biggest applause line."

Romney also has criticized McCain on campaign finance while stumping in South Carolina, where President Bush turned the tide against McCain in the 2000 GOP presidential primary.

A South Carolina-based publication, The State, recently reported that Romney highlighted McCain's support of campaign regulations in order to draw a contrast with his rival.

"That's a terrible piece of legislation," Romney said, according to the report. "It hasn't taken the money out of politics … [But] it has hurt my party."

DOJ_NMG_0129425

A review of Romney's public statements from his 1994 senatorial and 2002 gubernatorial campaigns reveal that he once touted stringent campaign-finance modifications.

A Boston Globe article from July 1994 reported that Romney publicly advocated placing spending limits on congressional campaigns and abolishing political action committees (PACs).

McCain and his allies on campaign finance included similar proposals in the first campaign-finance reform package they introduced in Congress in 1995, said Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, who was at the center of the fight to pass the changes. McCain and his allies later dropped the spending limits and PAC ban because they proved to be too controversial, she said.

During remarks before the Burlington (Mass.) Business Roundtable in 1994, Romney spoke like the committed reformers who later enacted sweeping national reforms in Congress.

"I understand Ted Kennedy will spend about $10 million to be reelected — he's been in 32 years, $10 million. I think that's wrong because — and that's not his own money, that's all from other people," Romney said during the 1994 presentation, which was aired by C-SPAN. "And to get that kind of money you've got to cozy up as an incumbent to all the special-interest groups who can go out and raise money for you from their members. And that kind of relationship has an influence on the way you're gonna vote."

Romney lost his race against Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). When he ran for governor eight years later, Romney again proposed dramatic changes to campaign-finance rules.

The Quincy Patriot Ledger and the Worcester Telegram & Gazette reported in the fall of 2002 that Romney proposed taxing political contributions to finance publicly funded campaigns.

"Mr. Romney campaigned in favor of clean elections, which provides public money to candidates for state office who meet strict fundraising requirements," the Telegram & Gazette reported. "But he suggested an alternative funding method. Instead of providing campaign funds from state coffers, his plan would tap 10 percent of the fundraising of candidates who choose to raise money privately."

Kevin Madden, Romney's campaign spokesman, declined to comment about campaign finance proposals his boss made in 1994 and 2002.

"He believes there ought to be transparency and disclosure in a way so the public knows who's raising money and who's contributing money," said Madden. "Right now I can say we make every effort that the campaign adheres to the disclosure and transparency requirements of campaign finance law now; 1994 was 15 years ago."

Madden reiterated Romney's belief that the 2002 campaign law hindered public participation.

Public-financed elections are an idea that Democrats in the Senate and House are planning to push this Congress; the idea is strongly opposed by conservative leaders.

Tom McClusky, the vice president of government affairs for the Family Research Council, an influential Washington-based grassroots advocacy organization representing evangelical Christians, said public financing of elections would distance lawmakers from voters.

"For groups like ours that work directly with the grass roots, it hurts us because the distance [to lawmakers] grows larger and larger," said McClusky, who argued that if legislators did not have to make fundraising appeals, they "would no longer have to be worried that they're answerable to their constituents."

McClusky said he did not know whether Romney since had shifted his stance.

"Of course, this was Mitt Romney in 2002. Who knows? He might have changed his mind on that," he said. "He always seems to want to come back to the table."

Jeff Mazzella, the president of the Center for Individual Freedom, another conservative advocacy group, has published harsh criticisms of McCain because of his support for various campaign regulations. He was surprised to hear of Romney's past positions.

"I was not familiar [with] Romney's positions referenced in the articles you stated," Mazzella said in an interview. "We're adamantly opposed to the idea of taxing campaign donations, or eliminating PACs or any abridgement of the people's right to assemble or speak."

It remains to be seen, however, whether Romney will face as much skepticism on campaign finance as he has on abortion.

One House conservative who met with him last week noted disapprovingly that Romney freely admitted that he has been firmly opposed to abortion rights for only two and a half years. He was also unenthusiastic about what he called Romney's cumbersome explanation.

"He spent a significant portion of his speech trying to convince members that he was pro-life now," he said. "But on an issue like that is, it shouldn't take a lot of time to say, 'I'm pro-life.'

DOJ_NMG_0129426

"The fact that it took paragraphs and paragraphs of explanation, and never had a hard-and-fast 'I'm 100 percent pro-life from conception to natural death'" was disconcerting, the House Republican said.

Obama Preserves Public Financing Option (WP/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democratic Sen. Barack Obama is asking whether he can take money from donors who want him to be president, then give it back later. The Federal Election Commission said Wednesday that it will look into the novel question.

Obama is indicating that he wants to at least keep the option of using the public financing system for his presidential campaign if he becomes the Democratic nominee. To do so, the Illinois senator could not spend any money from contributors for political purposes, but instead use federal funding that is expected to total about $85 million for next year's general election.

"Senator Obama has long been a proponent of public financing of campaigns and we are asking the FEC to take a step that could preserve the public financing option for the party's nominees," said Obama spokesman Bill Burton.

Strategists from both parties estimate that the 2008 race could cost each nominee $500 million _ far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund can afford. It is financed through the $3 checkoff on federal income tax returns.

Obama has decided to raise unlimited private contributions for the primary and general campaigns, following the lead of chief Democratic rivals Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards. Edwards and Obama also say they won't accept money from lobbyists or political action committees.

But Obama's lawyer, Robert Bauer, suggested in an advisory opinion request to the FEC that Obama may want to participate in the public financing system for the general election if he's nominated and the Republican candidate agreed to do the same.

"Should both major party nominees elect to receive public funding, this would preserve the public financing system, now in danger of collapse," Bauer wrote.

But a Republican will not be nominated for president until next year and it's impossible to know whether the candidate will agree to public financing. So Obama wants to know if he can raise the general election money now and give it back later if an agreement is reached.

While both President Bush and Democratic challenger John Kerry rejected public funding for their primary campaigns in 2004, they did accept $74.5 million each for the general election campaign.

Three Republican and three Democratic commissioners have 60 days to respond, unless the FEC decides to honor Obama's request for an expedited response. At least one commissioner, Republican Michael Toner, appeared opened to Obama's idea but said he needs to examine the law to see if it would be prohibited.

"We're dealing with uncharted territory here," Toner said. "We have candidates that face unique fundraising challenges and political pressures in the 21st Century, and I think the law needs to adapt whenever possible to meet those challenges."

All other presidential campaigns would have the right to weigh in with their comments before the FEC makes a decision.

Obama established a presidential exploratory committee last month and plans to announce his candidacy on Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

Obama Proposes Candidates Limit General Election Spending (NYT)

By David K. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 — Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, issued an unusual challenge to his rivals on Wednesday. He proposed a voluntary agreement between the two major party nominees that would limit their fund-raising and spending for the general election.

Mr. Obama's suggestion is notable because the 2008 presidential election is widely expected to be the first campaign since President Richard M. Nixon left office that would be paid for mainly by private donors and waged without legal spending limits.

For the first time in 30 years, the leading candidates in both major parties have indicated that they will not accept public money through the presidential public financing system so that they will not be bound by its spending limits. In previous general elections, the system provided all the money for both major party candidates on the condition that they did not take private contributions.

But the money the public system is expected to provide in 2008 — about $150 million for a candidate's primary contests, nominating convention and general election campaign — cannot keep up with the flow of private contributions available to the candidates. If the previous patterns hold, the two major party candidates in 2008 could each raise more than $500 million from private contributors, overpowering a nominee who chose to abide by the public financing rules.

Those calculations have already set off a furious fund-raising scramble as well-financed candidates, notably Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, try to stockpile enough early money to scare off competition.

In a Feb. 1 filing with the Federal Election Commission that was made public on Wednesday, Mr. Obama said that he, too, would seek enough private donations to remain competitive, but with a twist. He asked the commission if he could begin soliciting private donations with the understanding that he might later return the money to his contributors. If he won the Democratic nomination, he could then strike a deal with the Republican nominee to return their private donations and use only public money for the general election. For 2008, that would limit each general election campaign to about $85 million.

"Should both major party nominees elect to receive public funding, this would preserve the public financing system, now in danger of collapse, and facilitate the conduct of campaigns freed from any dependence on private fund-raising," Mr. Obama's filing said.

It is unclear how plausible such a truce might be. A candidate with a much bigger bank account at the start of the general election would be reluctant to relinquish that advantage.

Mr. Obama's filing raises delicate questions for some of his rivals. Three of them — Mrs. Clinton and John Edwards among the Democrats, and Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona — have begun raising private contributions outside the public financing system. All three have said they value the public financing system and support updating it to keep it alive. Mr. McCain in particular has led efforts to tighten campaign finance laws.

On Wednesday, a spokesman for Mr. McCain suggested that Mr. Obama was trying to have it both ways, preserving the possibility of taking public money if he could not bring in enough private donations. "Is he asking for the option of whatever is the higher number?" Matt David, the spokesman, asked.

Although Mr. McCain's campaign has sought donations that would be illegal for a candidate who takes public money to accept, his aides have asserted that no decision has been made and said that the campaign might return the contributions.

Mr. Obama's inquiry appears to be a pointed response to Mrs. Clinton, whose campaign was the first to announce that it would forgo public financing for both the primary and general elections. A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment Wednesday.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Edwards, who said this week that he, too, would sidestep the public financing system, scoffed at Mr. Obama's proposal.

"That sounds a little optimistic to us," the spokeswoman, Jennifer Palmieri, said. "There are a lot of ifs there." At this point, she said, Mr. Edwards "is not prepared to do that."

Michael Toner, a Republican member of the commission, said Mr. Obama's inquiry "raises very novel issues."

Obama To Seek FEC Ruling On Financing (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) signaled yesterday that he will begin raising money for a potential general election candidacy, joining Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) in rejecting the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for better than three decades.

Even as Obama starts to collect donations for a general election account, he has asked for guidance from the Federal Election Commission on whether he could reverse course if he wins the Democratic nomination and his Republican opponent accepts public money.

Dan Pfeiffer, a spokesman for Obama, said the senator's filing is intended to "preserve the public financing option for the party's nominees." Other aides explained that the request is aimed at defining what Obama can and cannot do in a murky area of campaign finance law.

Until now, candidates have accepted that once they start to raise a separate pool of money for the general election, they have committed to running without federal matching funds. Obama's filing questions that assumption.

Federal rules state that once a candidate "accepts" donations for a general election run, he can no longer accept federal money. Obama asked the FEC to determine whether he could "receive" contributions, but later, if he were to decide to take public funds, simply return the money.

The leading Republican candidates -- Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani -- have not said whether they will take public funds. But it is unlikely they would agree to limit their spending if the Democratic nominee is unwilling to do so.

Stop Arm-twisting 'Support' (USAT)

By Mitch Mcconnell,

USA Today, February 8, 2007

The recent decision by a number of presidential aspirants not to dip into the public trough for campaign funds is a clear sign of just how expensive national elections have become. It's also a sign that the current system of public funding for private campaigns is on its way out.

This is as it should be. Those who support a candidate are free to contribute to his or her campaign. They always have been. But the idea that those who don't support that candidate should also contribute to his or her campaign is worse than nonsense: It's a coercive use of taxpayer funds.

Americans are in overwhelming agreement on this point. Every year, they're asked to check a box on their tax returns if they wish to send $3 from the U.S. Treasury to the national campaigns. In what amounts to an annual national referendum on the question, an overwhelming majority of taxpayers have always held back their pens.

The number of Americans who support the current system has long been in decline. At one point, nearly 30% of tax filers thought the public financing system was a good idea. But the percentage of us who checked the box fell to an all-time low of 9% in 2004, the most recent presidential election year.

A number of special-interest groups have recently registered their "concerns" about the future of the public financing system. They say the increasing lack of voter support suggests a lack of education. Yet this steady decline in support should suggest just the opposite: Many voters who once supported the public funding system have thought about it and changed their minds.

One group in particular recently said it would cost each American "just $6 per year" to subsidize political campaigns. That's $1.8 billion annually — $7.2 billion over a four-year cycle — in taxpayer funds that could be spent on national security, education or Social Security.

The current crop of presidential hopefuls are turning aside taxpayer-subsidized welfare for their campaigns. Congress should follow their lead — and that of nearly every American taxpayer— and do away with the current public financing system once and for all.

Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., is the Senate Minority Leader.

Presidential Candidates Flee Public Fund, Seek Big Bucks (USAT)

USA Today, February 8, 2007

Public financing for presidential candidates, in place since the post-Watergate reforms of the 1970s, is all but dead for most major candidates, done in by the fact that Hillary Clinton and John McCain and others seeking the White House will have to spend as much as $500 million each to be competitive. That's far more than the roughly $122 million the out-of-date public system would limit them to spending for next year's primary and general elections.

It's a serious loss. Price was evident at a party Tuesday at Sen. Clinton's Washington home, where she entertained about 70 well-heeled fundraisers, some of whom reportedly pledged to bundle as much as $1 million in individual contributions for her presidential campaign. Among those invited were lawyers, financiers and at least two partners from a Washington lobbying firm. If their largesse helps Clinton get elected, will these folks expect access and favors for themselves and their clients? Does anyone really think otherwise?

One might wish for candidates who are above such things, but Clinton is doing what most serious candidates from both major parties almost certainly will do — opt out of a voluntary public financing system that was designed in the 1970s and hasn't been upgraded to keep up with wildly expensive campaigns. Congress could fix this by changing the law. Instead, it's dropped the ball.

A key goal of the presidential fund was to free candidates from money grubbing and the corrosive ties that come with it. Raising the money for a credible run for the presidency puts a premium on donors who can write the largest legal checks: $2,100 each for the primary and general elections cycles. Statistics show that's fewer than a tenth of 1% of Americans. But they and the people who bundle those checks into million-dollar packages are the ones who will have first claim on the next president's time.

Taxpayers can underwrite presidential elections by checking the box on their tax forms that sends $3 to the election fund, but fewer and fewer do. It's tempting to view this as popular rejection of public financing, but that would be simplistic. Polling suggests that when voters know what it takes to get public money, support shoots above 70%.

DOJ_NMG_0129429

That's why seven states (Arizona, Connecticut, Maine, North Carolina, New Jersey, New Mexico and Vermont)and two cities (Albuquerque and Portland, Ore.) are using or preparing to use public funding for some or all races. Politicians who accept public funds must agree not to raise more money and to abide by strict spending limits.

Opponents of this practice — incumbents, lobbyists, others seeking power — make hay deriding this as "welfare for politicians." Hardly. Candidates can spend more time with voters, and those who win office don't have to check with moneyed interests before taking action.

Gov. Janet Napolitano, who won office under Arizona's public financing law, implemented a prescription drug discount plan on her first day in office in 2003. Had she run with contributions from donors such as drug companies, she said that year, she might never have been able to do that. Lobbyists would have tried to undermine it, threatening to back another candidate in the next election.

"None of that happened," Napolitano said, "because special interests had nothing to hold over me."

Law Professor Set To Fill Obama's Policy Bank For White House Bid (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 8, 2007

If the early knock on presumed presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), that he's long on style and short on substance, is true, then Seton Hall law professor Mark Alexander is going to have his hands full.

Alexander is signing on to Obama's 2008 presidential campaign as policy director, and he concedes that both he and the senator have a lot of work to do.

Alexander would not deny a report on PoliticsNJ.com that he told his law students to expect a new professor in coming weeks as he departs for his new endeavor, but when talking to The Hill Wednesday, he was careful not to put "the cart before the horse" in anticipation of Obama's forthcoming announcement.

That said, the Yale graduate and friend of Obama's for 10 to 12 years said he is "honored" to be joining the senator's campaign — again, assuming the campaign moves beyond the exploratory phase — and he takes issue with those who might question Obama's depth of policy knowledge.

"I don't think he's short on substance at all," Alexander said. "I guess I don't buy into that criticism."

Alexander acknowledged that, like many past presidential candidates who were relatively new to the national stage (think then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush as opposed to longtime Washingtonians Vice President Al Gore or Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry), Obama will have to go through "an intense period" of deep policy education in order to offer a "firm vision."

"I think, frankly, every campaign has to do that," he said.

Alexander wouldn't comment on recent conversations he and Obama have had on specific policy areas, except to say that much of the exploratory committee's purpose is "exploring the issues that are confronting the American people."

Alexander is not new to the intersection of policy and politics, having worked as issues director for then-Sen. Bill Bradley's (D-N.J.) 2000 presidential campaign. The professor also worked for Sen. Edward Kennedy's (D-Mass.) 1988 reelection campaign, and most recently served as general counsel to new Newark Mayor Cory Booker's campaign.

His primary areas of study lie in First Amendment free-speech issues, election law and campaign finance reform, the last of which led him to file a brief with the U.S. Supreme Court "defending the right of governments to limit campaign spending," according to his Seton Hall biography.

Whether or not a deep knowledge of campaign-finance reform will be an asset in a campaign cycle predicted to be the most expensive to date is not an issue, Alexander's colleagues say.

"He is someone who is just … always on top of the policy issues of the day," an associate law professor at Seton Hall, Baher Azny, said.

An associate dean at Seton Hall's law school, Kathleen Boozang, called Alexander a "quick study" and "pragmatic," two qualities she said will serve Obama well.

"He's able to take lofty ideas and translate them to solid ideas on the ground," Boozang said.

Boozang described Alexander as "charming" and "even-tempered" and added that his students and colleagues "adore him."

Though his academic interests are in the areas of the First Amendment and election law, Boozang said Alexander does care "passionately" about making his community a better place.

"He's an African-American man raising three kids, raising his family, which to me means he is incredibly attuned to social issues," she said.

With a crowded field that includes former first lady and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), as well as hefty-résumé-wielding candidates such as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Obama needs to avoid any early policy missteps lest his critics and opponents successfully paint him as too inexperienced for the job, according to political analyst Charlie Cook.

"When you've got a presidential candidate who has to dispel notions of inexperience … having a strong policy director that avoids mistakes and avoids painting the candidate into a corner is incredibly important," Cook said. "Obama can't afford any serious policy mistakes."

In early voting states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, shallow policy knowledge can — and more than likely will — be exposed by educated voters, often with a particular "axe to grind," according to Dante Scala, a politics professor at Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H.

"Preparing for New Hampshire is not like a multiple-choice test," Scala said. "It's much more open-ended than that."

Scala said it is nearly impossible for a candidate to do the homework necessary to know the answer to every question posed at the Granite State's rigorous town hall meetings, in which voters can be "very demanding" and often ask "a very particular question on a very particular subject."

"There's more potential for getting caught flat-footed in a New Hampshire campaign," he said.

Sen. Clinton's Bundles (WP)

The Washington Post, February 8, 2007

SEN. HILLARY Rodham Clinton had a party at her house the other night for an elite group: about 70 fundraisers who agreed to raise at least $250,000 -- and some as much as $1 million -- for her presidential campaign. That soiree and a meeting for lower-level fundraisers ($25,000 and up) prompts us to raise again the question that we couldn't get the Clinton campaign to answer the other day. What are the candidate's plans to release the names of her big bundlers? Will she meet the standard of disclosure set by President Bush and every 2004 Democratic presidential contender except John Edwards and make the fundraisers' identities available? So far -- though we've been putting this question to the Clinton campaign since last Friday by telephone and by e-mail -- we haven't gotten an answer.

Candidates are as indebted to big bundlers as they would be to big check-writers; the public deserves to know who's underwriting their campaigns. Disclosure of this sort should be a no-brainer. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has promised to release the names of his big bundlers. So has Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whose campaign told us of his promise yesterday. But Mr. Edwards won't say anything except that he'll abide by the law; voters might ask how his refusal to identify big-money bundlers squares with his populist message. Meanwhile, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani haven't responded to our inquiries.

Ultimately, the Federal Election Commission or Congress should require disclosure of this information and not leave it up to the whim and goodwill of individual candidates. In the meantime, voters have every reason to be suspicious of those who would be president but don't want to be transparent about how they're going to collect the cash they need to reach the White House.

Bring Bundling Into The Public Eye (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 8, 2007

IN CAMPAIGNING last year against the "culture of corruption," the Democrats who now control Congress set the stage for a bidding war between the House and Senate over ethics reform. So far it's been good for both chambers, not to mention the American public, but on one issue the competition could stand another round.

First the House approved a ban on members accepting gifts, meals and travel on corporate jets, shaming the Senate into following suit.

Then the Senate upped the ante by voting to deny future pensions to members convicted of serious crimes (an initiative quickly emulated by the House) and passing a measure requiring disclosure of the arcane but influential practice in which lobbyists "bundle" campaign contributions.

In some societies, "bundling" is the practice of betrothed couples chastely sharing a bed. In Washington, "bundling" takes place when someone — not necessarily a lobbyist — orchestrates and then takes credit for several contributions to candidates for Congress (many of whom, of course, are incumbents) or to party committees.

A bundler can be more than a collector of contributions; he can also stage the fundraiser at which donors are asked to help the cause. And bundling isn't confined to the raising of campaign funds. It also takes the form of lobbyists orchestrating fundraising for presidential inauguration events and presidential libraries.

Bundling by anyone goes against the spirit of federal election law, which encourages small contributions. But bundling by lobbyists also has the effect of increasing the clout of those who are in the day-to-day business of trying to influence legislation. Yet, unlike their other activities, bundling by lobbyists is not a matter of public record.

DOJ_NMG_0129431

It would be public under the Senate ethics bill and a similar House proposal by Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Martin Meehan (D-Mass.). This week, six campaign-reform groups, including Common Cause and the League of Women Voters, sent a letter to members calling bundling disclosure "essential" to lobbying reform.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has promised that the 110th Congress would be "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." She can make good on that pledge by steeling her colleagues to resist the importuning of lobbyists — and their own worse instincts — and join the Senate in shining light on bundling.

Democrat Leaders Back Edwards On Taxes (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 8, 2007

Democratic state chairmen yesterday said they support former Sen. John Edwards' plan to increase taxes on upper-income Americans if he wins the presidency in 2008, a plan backed by the party's House and Senate leaders.

Those who responded to a survey of Democratic chairmen across the country said they approved of the plan presented Sunday by the former North Carolina senator on NBC's "Meet the Press" to raise the top tax rates on salaries of more than $200,000 and possibly other tax levies as well.

But many state party leaders don't want to step into the politically charged issue of raising taxes, at least at this early juncture in the presidential-election cycle -- even if their party's congressional leadership has embraced the idea.

"Raising taxes is a really tough decision, but I think Edwards is just being realistic, considering the Iraq war costs and the war debt we've got. We've got to pay it," said Chris Wittington, the Louisiana Democratic state chairman.

"If he's starting at $200,000, there aren't many of those people at that level in Louisiana who would be affected by it. We're a poor state," he said. But he cautioned that just talking generally about raising taxes was politically risky.

"He's got to define his message to make sure he's clear about who will be affected. He needs to narrow it down to those who will be affected," he said.

When asked on "Meet the Press" how he would pay for his universal health care proposal, Mr. Edwards said, "We'll have to raise taxes."

Democrats ruefully remember what happened to former Vice President Walter Mondale, their 1984 presidential nominee, who lost 49 states to President Reagan after he called for raising taxes on anyone making more than $60,000 a year and imposing a 10 percent surtax on people earning more than $100,000.

While Democrats have criticized Mr. Bush's tax cuts since their enactment in 2001, collectively defining them as "tax cuts for the wealthy," they have not criticized the lower tax rates for low- to middle-income earners or the doubling of the $500-per-child tax credit for families. Democratic leaders have said they would only repeal the tax cuts for those earning $200,000 or more annually -- sharply higher than the near-middle-class tax threshold Mr. Mondale set in his ill-fated campaign.

"If Edwards is proposing to raise income taxes just on upper-level income people or doing away with tax breaks for the wealthy, there aren't that many out here in proportion to the number of middle-class people," said Patricia Waak, the Colorado Democratic chairwoman.

"It's the middle-income people who bear the brunt of high costs for things like food and gas prices. People in the Democratic Party feel that giving tax breaks to the rich is not a policy they want to pursue," she said.

Still, Miss Waak added, "I have not seen his proposal, so I would not want to speak to this for the people of this state."

"I don't think it's going to hurt Democrats to talk about paying for what you get. The vast majority of the American people believe that basic health care should be an American right," said Joe Turnham, the Alabama Democratic chairman.

"What you are seeing from the Democrats is a stand for fiscal responsibility that says that any new programs or tax cuts have to be paid for," he said.

Other Democratic presidential contenders had little to say about Mr. Edwards' plan, even though most of them have said universal health care should and will be a top priority during the 2008 campaign.

"I haven't read his proposal yet," said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who gave a speech on the issue two weeks ago.

"Regardless of what combination of policies and proposals get us to this goal, we must reach it. We must act. And we must act boldly," he said.

But Sen Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut dodged the tax question Monday night. "I don't know what's in it," he said. When pressed if taxes should be raised to pay for health care generally, he shook his head and said, "I haven't seen it. I'll look at it."

Mr. Edwards also was looking at other revenue-raising opportunities, saying that "we need to do a much better job of collecting the taxes that are already owed," including targeting what he said were large sums of unpaid capital-gains taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0129432

But the day after Mr. Edwards called for repealing the Bush tax cuts for people in the highest income brackets, conservative tax-cutters condemned his proposal.

"Americans don't want higher taxes. They said 'no' to Mondale in '84; they'll say no to Edwards in 2008; and they'll say no to any candidate -- Republican or Democrat -- who runs on a platform of more government and higher taxes," said the Club for Growth, a tax-cut advocacy group.
